Indian Newspaper Reports, c1868-1942
Part 7: Bombay, 1901-1921

Introduction

Bombay, known as Mumbai since 1995, is the capital of the state of Maharashtra. It is the world's most populated city, with an estimated population of 13 million and is the commercial and entertainment capital of India, housing the headquarters of the large Indian banks and Bollywood, India's Hindi film and television industry. The early decades of the twentieth century were very significant in shaping the future of this modern metropolis.

The town of Bombay was the East India Company's first port in 1668 and in 1687 became the Company's headquarters. During the American Civil War (1861-1865) the city became the world's chief cotton trading market and the opening of the Suez canal in 1869 transformed it into one of the largest seaports on the Arabian Sea.

By 1906 it had a population of one million, making it the second largest city after Calcutta. It was the capital of the Bombay Presidency and was a major base for the Indian independence movement – especially boycotts of non-Indian goods, the political activities of prominent moderates and their demands for Dominion status, the All India Home Rule League and the protests from the large migrant labour force such as the general strike of Bombay mill workers in January 1919. Later on, it was in Bombay that the Quit India movement was launched in August 1942. After India's independence in 1947 it became the capital of Bombay state.

Criticism of British rule, British agents and the administration of justice throughout the Bombay Presidency increased in the period after 1880. Lord Ripon's repeal of Lytton's Vernacular Press Act in 1881 saw the abolition of the Press Commissionership. The relaxation in the attempted exercise of political control by the British over the press in India opened the way for vigorous debate on the future of India. The writings of the Indian intelligentsia found their way into an increasing number of new newspapers, Anglo-Indian and Vernacular. The increasingly active independence movement later formed into two separate camps in 1907. There was the Garam Dal (the extremists or "hot faction") of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, who founded the Marathi daily Kesari (The Lion), and the Naram Dal of Gopal Krishna Gokhale (the moderates or "soft faction"). Gokhale was a champion of public education and a mentor to men such as Mahatma Gandhi and Mohammed Ali Jinnah, the future founder of Pakistan. Tilak was arrested and tried for sedition in 1908 after he had defended the Bengali youths who had killed a District Judge. "In spite of the verdict of the Jury, I maintain that I am innocent. There are higher powers that rule the destiny of men and nations and it may be the will of providence that the cause which I represent may prosper more by my suffering than my remaining free". These were his last words at his trial and they are now imprinted in the wall of Room No 46 at the Bombay High Court. The Press Act of 1914 only served to exacerbate problems with its imposition of even stricter censorship on the press. Any editor who disregarded the rules on what could be published was liable to find himself in prison.

These reports of the Bombay newspapers, 1901-1921 cover landmarks in India's history - the repercussions of Lord Curzon's arrival as Viceroy in 1899, the partition of Bengal in 1905, the founding of the Bombay Chronicle in 1910, the Press Act of 1914, Gandhi's arrival in Bombay in 1915, the new Government of India Act and Rowlatt Act of 1919, the Amritsar Massacre of the same year and the growth in the demand for Home Rule.

Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, founder of the Bombay Chronicle in 1910, and a member of the Bombay Legislative Council from 1893, is recognised as a significant figure in Indian history. He is known as 'the Father of Municipal Government in Bombay'. He had been municipal commissioner in 1873 and was chairman of the Municipal Council in 1884-5 and again in 1905. He had been responsible for drafting the Bombay Municipal Act of 1872 setting out the duties of the municipal corporation in key areas such as sanitation and health, the water supply, the creation and maintenance of roads, the management of hospitals, refuse collection and disposal, sewerage, cemeteries, crematoria, parks, public spaces, beaches and building works. When Gandhi arrived in India from South Africa, Mehta presided over the public meeting held to welcome him. He was twice President of the reception committee when the Congress sessions met in Bombay in 1899 and 1904. Mehta had also presided over the Congress meeting in Calcutta in 1890. In his dual role of political activist and newspaper owner Mehta made his English language weekly into an important nationalist voice of its time documenting the political upheavals of a volatile pre-independent India.

The Indian National Congress, formed in 1885, was comprised chiefly of members of the western-educated professional elite. The very first meeting of Congress was in Bombay. Public opinion had started to turn against the British government of India and it sought to represent the views of the populace from both urban and rural areas. There was an undercurrent of feeling that British rule was unfair and this is reflected in the newspaper reports contained in this collection. Agitation and disturbances in the streets were common and the media played a huge role in re-enforcing feelings of real and imagined grievances. Congress during the first two decades of the twentieth century continued to be a moderating influence with the professional elites keeping the upper hand.

During the First World War the newspaper reports provide a good indication of the mixed reactions to Indian involvement in the conflict. The Indian National Congress decided that the cause of Indian Independence would be best served by helping the British Empire as much as possible – but many people in India disagreed. Despite this, 800,000 troops fought in the various different theatres of conflict. Some 1.5 million volunteered to fight. Tilak was released from prison in Burma in 1914. He re-united with his fellow nationalists and rejoined the Indian National Congress in 1916.

With lots of Indian soldiers fighting on behalf of the British Empire there were growing demands for Dominion status for India. The All India Home Rule League was founded in 1916 by Annie Besant, Muhammed Ali Jinnah and Tilak to demand self government for India. Jinnah headed up the League's Bombay branch. Although Tilak was a critic of Gandhi's strategy of non-violence, in his later years he mellowed considerably and favoured political dialogue and discussion as an effective way to obtain political freedom for India. Gandhi paid his respects at Tilak's cremation in Bombay in 1920 along with 200,000 people.

The Government of India Act of 1919 was passed by the British to enable more Indians to participate in the government of India. The Act provided for a dual form of government whereby in each province some areas of government were answerable to a Provincial Council and other areas of government remained under the control of the Viceroy. The Indian National Congress was unhappy at these reforms and condemned them, believing they did not go far enough in political reform.

Mahatma Gandhi returned to India from South Africa in 1915. His struggle from this point to 1921, when he was invested with executive authority on behalf of the Indian National Congress, can be followed in these newspaper reports. He believed that Indian independence could be obtained not by violence but by non-cooperation and peaceful resistance and under his leadership the National Congress was reorganised with the goal of "Swaraj" (self rule). As part of his strategy he adopted the "swadeshi" policy, the aim of which was to boycott foreign made goods, especially British goods. He also encouraged Indians to wear homespun cloth (khadi) and to actually spin the material themselves in support of the independence movement. He took a major role as peacemaker after the Amritsar massacre on April 1919 when innocent civilians were massacred in the Jallianwala Bagh near the Golden Temple in the Punjab by British troops. After the disturbances at Chauri Chaura in Uttar Pradesh in February 1922 when Gandhi felt that his movement was becoming violent he called off the campaign of civil disobedience. He was arrested in March 1922 for sedition and was sentenced to six year's imprisonment of which he only served two owing to ill health. He spent most of the 1920s out of the limelight but returned to prominence in 1928 when he resumed his campaign for Indian independence and for Home Rule.

The Rowlatt Act of 1919 was passed by the British to extend "emergency measures" after the end of the First World War and was aimed at controlling public unrest. It singled out the Bombay Presidency and the Punjab as "centres of dangerous conspiracy". It had powers to imprison without trial any person suspected of terrorism in India. It caused great upheaval and Gandhi among other leaders was extremely critical of the Act. It was to lead to the massacre at Amritsar when two leaders of the Congress were arrested and a demonstration took place.

As well as much on political life in India, there is also lots of information to be found on advances in communications and living standards in the country which had begun in the late nineteenth century, with the construction of major roads linking the main cities and regions and the development of the railway system. An enormous amount of detail about the impact of the railways can be found in the newspaper reports together with information on the expansion of education, the increase in industrialisation, the growth of agriculture and the development of the first suburbs.

Indian Newspaper Reports

The Indian Newspaper Reports from the Asia, Pacific and Africa Department at the British Library, constitute an important series to be found in the Record Department Papers of the Oriental and India Office Collections. The reports consist of abstracts taken from Anglo-Indian and Vernacular newspapers for the various different regions of India.

The reports were completed weekly and consist of typewritten abstracts of the contents of Indian newspapers with some extracts, translated by an official translator whose name is given at the end of the week's report. An extremely wide variety of newspapers was looked at weekly, ensuring that a wide spectrum of ideas, views and politics was addressed. The reports list the languages of the newspapers, where the papers were published, with a note on the number of issues published, how often and the name, age and religion of the editor.

The newspaper reports for Bombay included in Part 7 cover the years 1901-1921 and complete those for Bombay started in Part 6. The abstracts and extracts contained in the reports will provide scholars with an invaluable insight into Indian social and political events, urban and rural conditions, criticisms of the British government, popular protest and the development of nationalist feelings.

The lists of Native Papers (from 1913 called Indian Papers) contain around 165 newspapers each week (over twice as many as those of the average list in Part 6), divided into the following languages: English; Anglo-Gujarati; Anglo-Kanarese; Anglo-Marathi; Anglo-Portuguese; Anglo-Sindi; Anglo-Urdu; English, Marathi and Gujarati; English, Marathi and Kanarese; Gujarati; Hindi; Kanarese; Marathi; Sindi; Urdu; Marathi and Kanarese; Marathi and Urdu; Portuguese and Konkani. The largest amount of papers consulted are in Marathi and Gujarati. In the early years of this part the report for each week has a list of the papers consulted but by the latter part the list is only given at the beginning of each year.

Extracts from the lists for the weeks ending 2 April 1910 and 29 March 1913 will give an idea of the names of papers listed, the editors and the circulation figures:

The contents of the abstracts for each week are divided into the following sections:

Politics and the Public Administration
Legislation
Education
Railways
Municipalities
Native States
Intelligence extracted from the Press

The early reports such as those for 1901 and 1905 contain mostly detail concerning social and economic conditions and give only an intimation of the problems to come. Topics include:

- Agrarian problems and news from the Forestry Department
- Bombay Legislative Council
- Indian National Congress
- Famine and orphanages
- Indian budget
- Indian census
- Spirit of Independence in European countries
- News on colleges and schools and related conferences
- Extravagance of native chiefs
- Land Revenue Bill
- Lord Curzon speeches
- Visit of Lord Northcote to Kathiawar
- Dacoities in Dharwar
- Visit of Prince of Wales
- Protest meetings against Lord Curzon's Convocation Address
- Railway grievances
- Housing problems
- Proposed demolition of Hindu temples by the Bombay City Improvement Trust
- Oppression of Muhammedans by the Hindu authorities of Mundi
- Riots by mill-hands in Bombay
- Complaints about British rule in India, the possibility of India's political regeneration and "Swadeshi" meetings
- Hospitals
- Sind politics – usually a large section dealing with all kind of matters relating to the area

- Partition of Bengal

By 1910 the topics to be found in the papers start to reflect wider feelings of unrest and the growth of discontentment against British rule in India with articles on topics such as:

- How can India be regenerated?
- Warnings to white colonials to beware of the future
- Workings of the new Press Act of1914
- Training of Anglo-Indian officials
- Treatment of political prisoners
- Oppression in the state of Idar
- Hostile attitude of Parsi newspapers to Moslems
- Disturbances at sittings of the All India Moslem League

By 1921, with the influence of Gandhi and the introduction of the Rowlatt Act, the amount of space devoted to political agitation, nationalism, Home Rule and Gandhi had expanded enormously and large sections under Politics on Non-Cooperation, British Rule, the Governor, Indian Reforms and the Press Act were featured. Subjects included are:

- Appeal to the public to agitate for the repeal of the Rowlatt Act
- Comments on letters from Gandhi to the press regarding agitation
- Comments by Tilak on non-Brahmin representation on the council
- Calls for the Press Act to be repealed
- Bombay's government's attitude to non-cooperation and their warnings of revolution in India
- Extracts from Gandhi's letters on a wide range of topics including non-cooperation, civil disobedience, the Afghan war, the moderates
- Reports on interviews between the Viceroy and Gandhi

The following extracts provide an idea of the richness of the material:

The report for the week ending 20 April 1913 includes the following comments from the Dnyan Prakash concerning the formation of a United India League:

"At the last session of the Moslem League held at Lucknow the Honourable Mr Shafi made a suggestion for the formation of an United India League wherein all creeds and castes would join hands. Now that the Honourable gentleman has addressed a letter to the press urging the same idea, we should like to point out that there is no necessity for organising a new body, for we have already amongst us the India National Congress which has been carrying on its propaganda on strictly constitutional and unsectarian lines. The Muhammedans would do well to join it in the interests of all concerned…."

The same paper in the newspaper report ending 27 May 1916 comments on home rule agitation which had grown during the First World War:

"…. Because small demands of the Congress and of other institutions were systematically ignored, the Home Rule agitation has received such an impetus now. So long it was said that political agitation was carried on by a handful of educated men but those who read the proceedings of the Congress and of the Legislative Councils will see the wide public character of our movement. Merchants want Home Rule for commercial purposes. Other professionals want Home Rule as it would encourage their professions…. The demand for Home Rule is becoming universal in this manner in India and the present war has made it quite an insistent question…."

The report for the week ending 14 March 1920 includes the following from the Gujarati concerning amendments to the Press Act of 1914:

"Commenting upon the assurance given in the Imperial Legislative Council by Sir William Vincent that the Press Act will be amended, the Gujarati remarks:The most objectionable portion of the Press Act is that section of it which enumerates the offences under the Act. As long as that section stands intact the Press will have to dance to the tune of the bureaucrats or the judges, in spite of any amendments that might be carried out as suggested by Sir Shivaswami Iyar…."

The report for the week ending 13 August 1921 includes the following from Young India giving Gandhi's views on the non-Cooperation movement and the use of violence:

"I have never believed and I do not now believe that the end justifies the means. On the contrary it is my firm conviction that there is an intimate connection between the end and the means so much so that you cannot achieve a good end by bad means…. I am fully aware that I am trying a most dangerous experiment – that of inducing thousands of Mussalmans and for that matter, Hindus too, to become and remain strictly non-violent…"

TECHNICAL NOTE

Our microform publications are prepared and produced in accordance with recommended and established guide-lines for the production of microform of superior quality. These conform to the recommendations of the standard guides to good microforming and micropublishing practice.

Attention should be drawn to the nature of the material. As with all printed sources the inking is variable. Darker and lighter inks, or a dark ink and a light pencil note, can appear on the same page. There are instances when the paper has been badly stained, discoloured, or faded with exposure to light over a period of time. Some pages are torn, crumpled or cropped. Occasionally volumes have been tightly bound and material is slightly obscured in the inner margin. The curvature towards the spine of such volumes inevitably results in some distortion of the text. Sometimes the original paper is quite thin and this results in showthrough which can make the print difficult to read. Every effort has been made to minimise these difficulties and some openings are microfilmed more than once in an attempt to bring out all the features of the original. Nevertheless these original characteristics present difficulties of image and contrast which stringent tests and variations of density cannot entirely overcome.

The most responsible care has been exercised in the filming of this unique collection and every effort has been made to ensure that this microform publication meets the standards established by the Association for Information and Image Management (AIIM), the American National Standards Institute (ANSI) and prevailing European standards.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the margin of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed in the report is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word as Arunodaya or the well-known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Reflections on Mr. Lionel Curtis' views about India.

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

1. "Mr. Lionel Curtis has begun work. The 'Problems of the Commonwealth' published—to use the Curtis phraseology—'over his name' had made educated India wonder whether Mr. Curtis was only another stormy petrel; but there is some hope at least in Mr. Curtis' protestations, if not in the motives which seem to underlie all his work. Mr. Curtis is wroth that a letter of his, marked 'private' mind you, has been intercepted. We condole with him in his misfortune, but now that he has given us a true copy of the letter from Government House, Lucknow, what else can we do, but look carefully into the scheme propounded by this Sir Knight of the Round Table? But the covering letter to the Press contains one admirable sentiment from Mr. Curtis, which ought not to escape attention. 'The possibility', says Mr. Curtis, 'that self-Government was not an institution appropriate only to European communities did not occupy my thoughts.' Ah! we live and learn; and Mr. Curtis may have learnt much, possibly after being present at Mr. Jinnah's presidential address. However, people, who even in letters marked 'private' can talk about British administration in India and British administration in Bechuanaland in the same breath are curiosities not to be neglected. We shall return to Mr. Curtis and his work in India on another occasion."

Indian Social Reformer (3), 7th Jan.

*2. "Nobody who reads his letter will doubt for a moment that Mr. Curtis' friends in this country did him a valuable service in advising him to come to India and study her conditions on the spot. His ignorance of India, and that of his collaborators, can be only described as colossal. They have published two volumes bearing on the reconstruction of the British Empire in evident ignorance of the fact that the conditions of India and Central Africa are not identical. This is the most important discovery which Mr. Curtis has made so far and he presses it on his colleagues with almost pathetic vehemence. He begs his colleagues to stay their hand or, at any rate, if they decide to lump India and Central Africa together and treat them on the same footing, to do so 'facing the fact that we cannot effect the changes advocated in the volumes already published without provoking in India an agitation, which, as I judge, might lead to bloodshed'. We hope Mr. Curtis will not mind our saying that both he and his critics in this country have attached a ridiculously disproportionate importance to his letter. Nobody in India would have cared what Mr. Curtis wrote if he had not introduced the names of some high officials—he is himself evidently aware of it—and we are bound to say that, in our opinion, Mr. Curtis was not making a legitimate use in his private correspondence of the names of the officials who extended to him their hospitality in this country. To plead that his letter was marked 'private' is no justification whatever for dragging into a political controversy the names of men whose position imposed on them the duty of conveying their views to the Secretary of State through constitutional channels. Neither the Viceroy nor the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces is entitled or is likely to involve himself in an agitation which may chance ultimately to be in conflict with the policy of His Majesty's Government. We cannot believe that any of the high officials named by Mr. Curtis took any more interest in his studies than they would in those of any other publicist who was equally ignorant and equally anxious to learn what Indian conditions are......... The feeling of most people who read this letter will be, we think, one of surprise that an Englishman of education should not hesitate to avow such complete ignorance of Indian conditions as Mr. Curtis does, even to make the part played by his friends appear in the most favourable light possible. Sir James Meston and the other officials, if they really wanted to carry on unofficially a political propaganda in England, as some critics of this letter seem to suggest,

Sir James Meston and the other officials, if they really wanted to carry on unofficially a political propaganda in England, as some critics of this letter seem to suggest, would easily have found some one with more pretensions to Indian experience. May we suggest to His Honour that he will do well to follow the example of Lord Willingdon and Lord Pentland whose names are conspicuous by their absence in the list of Mr. Curtis' official conductors in India?"

Kesari (95), 2nd Jan.; Mahrátta* (5), 7th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 6th Jan.

3. We do not think that Mr. Curtis will change his views as a result of his tour in India and we are afraid that he will leave the country with distorted information because he is touring with Sir Valentine Chirol. Even a child can tell what information Sir Valentine will give to him about India. And the worst of it is that Mr. Curtis, like Sir Valentine Chirol, is enjoying the hospitality of Governors and Lieut.-Governors and carrying on secret conferences with them and strengthening his case by the use of their names. The letter of Mr. Curtis was out at Lucknow on the day the question of Swarájya was taken up and it added fuel to the fire. Mr. Curtis' explanation which he has sent to the press is not very satisfactory and it would be good if he were to exercise some restraint in writing about India after the revelation of his doctrines. [The Mahrátta writes:—"Mr. Curtis does not profess to have studied India and yet he has made the assertion that India does not contain a sufficient electorate qualified to recognise and place in office Indians who are qualified to make and administer laws. We hope that Mr. Curtis' short stay in India has enabled him to see that there is here a sufficiency of men able to assume control of Indian affairs and that there is as sufficient an electorate here as there was in England some time before the Compulsory Education Act came into operation. Mr. Curtis credits his friends with having persuaded him to study India and to think of self-government in India as a possibility—if a remote one. We may admit this in entirety. It does not, however, help us to revise our belief that the friends are one with Mr. Curtis in the views regarding the future of India advocated in the 'private letter'. For what meaning, except the plain one, can we attach to the words: 'This letter, which has been revised in detail by them, may be taken as representing our joint view'?" The Dnyán Prakásh remarks:—Mr. Curtis himself fears that the changes advocated by him, if carried out, might lead to bloodshed. We trust that British statesmen will try their utmost to prevent such a catastrophe. India is not against giving the Colonies a share in the management of Imperial affairs. It only wants itself to be treated on a footing of equality with the Colonies, and there is no valid reason why the Colonies should oppose this claim. We earnestly hope that Mr. Curtis' arguments will not have an adverse effect, with regard to India, on British public opinion. We also must take proper steps in the matter and the Government of India too must help us in carrying on a vigorous agitation in England.]

Rást Goftár (28), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

*4. "That the author of the communication wants to be fair to the country in his collection of the materials on which he is about to enlarge and which he proposes to use as basis for his inferences is made clear from the letter that has incidentally found its way to the press, but it shows that he has allowed himself to be quite completely in the official sway, with the likelihood that impressions and opinions formed under such influence would affect his own judgment unless he supplements his inquiry very freely from private and non-official sources. Now that his mission is known, we with the rest of the public trust that Mr. Curtis would convince himself that there are two opinions in India vastly divergent—one of Anglo-Indians and the official bureaucracy, the other of educated Indians and non-official workers for the national cause. Since it seems he has learned enough from the first, we trust he will be at pains to learn from the other their own views of things and to verify his information from one or the other source before he allows himself to form his impressions or deduce his inferences...... ... And this he can achieve only by consulting and conferring as widely as he can Indian educated opinion, and by keeping an eye that is alert to find not only the dark but the bright spots in the life and affairs of the people."

Comments on Lord Sydenham's article entitled "The danger in India" in the Nineteenth Century and after.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 4th Jan.

5. Commenting upon the article contributed by Lord Sydenham to the Nineteenth Century and after, the Sánj Vartamán writes:—Does Lord Sydenham mean to render any service to the Empire by his article entitled "The Danger in India"? We record our emphatic protest against the article and declare that there is no likelihood of any danger arising in India. Such danger exists only in the brains of men like Lord Sydenham and Chirol. Lord Sydenham seems to have been alarmed by the memorial sent by the nineteen members of the Imperial Legislative Council to the Secretary of State. The fear entertained by the ex-Governor of Bombay is imaginary and the sad picture he has painted would tend to mislead public opinion in England. The article is full of exaggerations and erroneous statements and the only way to counteract its influence would be to send a deputation to England to prove the hollowness of the allegations made by Lord Sydenham and others like him and to enlighten public opinion in England. It is the first and most sacred duty of statesman like Lord Sydenham to remove the misunderstandings due to ignorance existing between the people of India and England. Instead of doing so His Lordship has assumed a path that will add to the misunderstandings and widen the gulf. People like him are guilty of the greatest disservice that can be done to the Empire.

Indu Prakásh (36), 5th Jan., Eng. cols.; Sandesh (103), 5th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 5th Jan.

6. Commenting on Lord Sydenham's article in the Nineteenth Century and After in which after condemning Indian University education as "shallow," he characterises the reform suggestions of the 19 elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council as "iconoclastic" and suggests that they should be "promptly and finally rejected if serious trouble is to be averted", the Indu Prakásh writes:—"We are more sorry for England than even for India for the iconoclastic comment passed by Lord Sydenham on English education and the legitimate and lawful aspirations which that education, coupled with natural evolution, has awakened. So what forms the best compliment to British rule is turned by Lord Sydenham's logic into its condemnation. Lord Sydenham's extraordinry contribution curiously proves the truth of the remarks of the President of the Congress that some of the present-day bureaucrats had found a 'chapter of mistakes' committed by their predecessors but that unfortunately it was not now possible to go back on what had been already accomplished.......... Any attempt to pervert the facts of the situation is as much an insult to England as to India. We only hope and pray that the English people will not allow their minds to be swayed by prejudiced reactionary epistles penned in leisure hours by some of the narrow-visioned retired satraps for whom we feel more sorrow than anger. Not to have known a country in spite of a number of years of residence in an official capacity is a mental deficiency which certainly deserves our sympathy." [The Sandesh says:—Have the countless millions of illiterate Indians given an authority to Lord Sydenham to represent their views? His Lordship says that the Indian Home Rulers are not leaders of the Indian public. Will he please tell us why they are so much honoured wherever they go? Whatever Lord Sydenham might say, Messrs. Tilak, Jinnah, Surendranath Bannerjee and Mrs. Besant know the hearts of Indians better than Mr. Curtis and Sir V. Chirol. We want Home Rule for both England's and India's benefit, and therefore, it is treason to oppose the movement. We would therefore, request persons like Lord Sydenham not to misrepresent matters. The Dnyán Prakásh also writes in condemnation of Lord Sydenham's article and declares that he has deliberately closed his eyes to the advance made by Indian aspirations in consequence of the encouraging utterances of men like Lord Hardinge and Mr. Asquith.]

Mahratta (5), 7th Jan.

*7. "The article is a very long and verbose production, and it carries poison in almost every line. Poor British readers who have to, or choose to, learn about India and things Indian from tutors of the Sydenham type cannot help being inoculated with feelings and sentiments which—if left to work their way through the [illegible]—official and unofficial—are sure to spell ruin to the Empire. Any rough handling and coercion of the natural leaders of the Indian 'millions' will serve day by day to throw increased numbers from amongst the millions into the camp of the discontented until a last a dismal catastrophe ensues—a result which cannot fail 'to crown' persistent adherence to Sydenhamite policy......... To given an idea of the angry Lord's poisonous writing we shall simply note down his important suggestions to the responsible authorities. 'Let it be announced by the Government in firm language which cannot be mistaken that the constitution of the Legislative Councils will remain unchanged.' 'If this course is taken,' continues the Lord, 'it will have a reassuring effect upon all the supporters of our rule.' We challenge Government to take this course upon the assurance of 'Sydenham of Combe'. India is rapidly ceasing to be a land of 'dumb-driven cattle'—the responsible authorities cannot afford to neglect this glaring, though it may be an inconvenient, fact."

Comments on the New Year's Day message from the Governor-General of Australia to His Excellency the Viceroy.

Message (6), 6th Jan.

8. "The message to His Excellency the Viceroy from the Governor-General of Australia will be read with much interest. The reciprocation of cordial greetings on the New Year's Day is a good sign of the change that is visible in the feelings between the Dominions and India. As His Excellency the Viceroy has stated in his message, we fully appreciate the warm tribute from Australia. But that appreciation on our side would be greater and more enthusiastic if the Dominions translate into action their high and noble sentiments. Without it, the greetings, however cordial, would merely be a matter of form......... When the war comes to an end the whole question of the position of the Indians in the Empire will have of necessity to come under review. It will be one of the first and foremost questions that will have to be solved in the internal problems of the Empire, calling for great sagacity, patience and statesmanship on the part of the Colonies as well as of India. We take it, therefore, that the message from the Governor-General of Australia is a fresh proof of Australia's sincere desire to help in the solution of that great and urgent problem, and, in that sense and so far, we heartily welcome the hand of friendship which has been extended across the seas."

Exhortation to the Parsis to take a more active part in the political activities of the country.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 4th Jan., Eng. cols.

9. The Praja Mitra and Pársi deplores "the very meagre and feeble part played by the Parsis in the national movements which are moulding the political future of India", and continues :—"Great credit is due to the Honourable Sir Dinshaw Petit for being present at the Congress, and speaking with fearless directness on the sitution which we are deploring. Sir Dinshaw had, of course, no formal mandate to speak on behalf of the Parsi community; but in speaking as he did we have no doubt all those who have the true interests of the community at heart will agree, that he rendered a great service to us. [Here the paper refers to Sir D. M. Petit's remarks that to his mind the interests of the Parsis would not suffer when self-Government came and that Home Rule would enhance the permanency of British rule, and then continues :—] These are notable words and they are eminently sensible. It would be mean to keep aloof from a great patriotic movement, because we are comfortable as we are......... As a community we are not only a minority, but a hopeless minority. It would be preposterous to suggest that either the Government or the nation should or would show the slightest regard for the opinions or interests of a few thousand Parsis, if they conflict with those of the millions of other Indians. But are our interests really in conflict with those of India as a whole? Would it be wise, even if it were possible, to go counter to the movement which is hurrying all India in one destined direction? So far as the movement itself is concerned, it is absolutely immaterial whether the Parsis as a community support it or denounce it......... If they stand aloof to-day, when the longed-for day comes—and it is bound to come sooner or later, looking to the reality and vitality of India's political consciousness to day, and the imperishable traditions of British statesmanship—when the day comes, the Parsis will find themselves undone. Fortunately, the work of the great Parsis (Sir P. M. Mehta, Mr. Dadabhai Nowroji and Mr. Wacha), whom we have named before, in the national cause, has already placed the Parsis in a line with the other great communities of India.......... We cannot live for all time on the credit of the past. It is mournful and humiliating that at the present stirring moment, when India is passing through a crisis, an educated, enterprising, and enlightened community should be content to be represented on the Congress platform, by two scions of a wealthy family, whose forte has been commerce and charity rather than politics. We are beholden to Sir Dinshaw Petit and Mr. Jehangir Petit for their public spirit." [The paper winds up with a exhortation to the educated young men of the community to rouse themselves and take more interest in the country's progress.]

The Brahmins would dominate over the non-Brahmin Hindus as well as the other communities if self-government were granted.

Islámic Mail (4), 31st Dec. 1916, Eng. Edition, and (121), 1st Jan., Urdu Edition.

10. "The Home Rule movement is well known to be initiated by the Brahmins for the benefit of the Brahmins in order to give the Brahmins the power which they wielded in ancient times. The easy way in which the Brahmins have so far succeeded in gaining their objects whether against the bideshi Mussalmans or against the bureacuracy has elated them to lofty flights of imagination and swaráj is taken to be within the easy reach of them. They know the non-Brahmins to be too backward in education to claim or secure any share in self-government.......... They rightly conclude that Home Rule, if secured, would vest into the hands of the Brahmins all authority and power and leave the educationally backward communities to toil and labour for their benefit. They think the Muhammadans to be the only stumbling block and expect an easy and complete victory by winning over the Muhammadans.......... There can be no gainsaying the fact that beyond the pale of the educated people the masses do not know much of the Western ideals of administration and unlike the lawyers, are too busy with their own avocations of life to think or work for the new political ideals. They have enjoyed the benefits of British administration since the date of their birth and are happy and contented with it. They have very few grievances beyond the hardships of trade and land taxation and little concern with the great political movements. They have perfect confidence in the justice, fair play, kindness and generosity of their rulers and dread restoration to the old conditions. British rule in their eyes is the panacea for all evils and they have very little faith in the hukoomat of their own countrymen.......... The Muhammadan youths will find it worse for them than for the low class Hindus because they are worse than the untouchables—they are regarded as malichs and bideshis—and cannot expect any mercy from them. They have been decoyed by two reasons: By the belief that they would fare better under Hindu patronage than under the patronage of Government which, they think, has deserted them, and by a feeling of desperation created by the treatment they received at the hands of Lord Hardinge and by the indifference shown to their religious feelings during the Balkan conflagration. But when they come to think of the whole situation in a cool and judicious manner they will come to the inevitable conclusion that they are sacrificing the real interests of the Muhammadans to a political chimera and would be obliged to take some such action as has just been taken by the non-Brahmins of Madras. [The paper here refers to the South Indian Association and quoting at great length from the Non-Brahmin manifesto issued by it, remarks that it voices the feelings of the bulk of the Indians, Muhammadans as well as Hindus, when it says that "not satisfied with the possession of the key to the present political position, the radical politicians who are apparently never so happy as when they ask for fresh political concessions, irrespective of their suitability to existing conditions, now ask for Home Rule, and from previous experience we fear that if a discordant note is not sounded at the proper time it will, of course, be made out that all India is keen about Home Rule". The paper then concludes :—] Will the Muhammadans have the courage to hoist their flag likewise and say fearlessly what they feel on the subject of the swarájya?" [The Islámic Mail (Urdu edition) writes about the rapprochement between the Congress and the League in the same strain, and it bases its opposition to the agreement on three grounds, namely, that a few Muhammadans who have taken part in it cannot voice the feelings of the entire Muhammadan community, that these few men themselves are not valued highly by the Hindus as evidenced by the latter's lack of enthusiasm when they appeared on the Congress platform, and that the Congress which is the stronghold of the Brahmins aims at domination over all castes and creeds as of old.]

The non-Brahmin manifesto.

Message (6), 6th Jan.

11. "The whole thing has been engineered, we have reasons to believe, by certain opponents of Indian aspirations, who playing upon the self-interest or credulity of some disappointed people have set them up to it, and, further, it appears that the movement may have behind it some Anglo-Indian bureaucrats. Who these officials are we cannot guess. It is regrettable that there should be people still who cannot see the real trend of things and who must needs play into the hands of the enemies of Indian aspirations. We have always had great regard for Mr. Thegaraya Chetty as a man of sound common sense and a stalwart Indian. We regret that he should have committed this error of judgment in lending his name to the movement."

The Indian Industries Commission should carefully consider the question of manning Indian industries by indigenous labour.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

*12. One of the most important questions which should be pressed on the attention of the Royal Industrial Commission which is holding its sittings at present is the training of Indian labour to a high pitch of efficiency. There should be a very thorough investigation into the possibility of starting new industries in this country without having to depend upon so-called foreign experts, and the ways and methods adopted for obtaining trained men in our own country. It has been demonstrated time and again that an Indian industry worked by Indians cannot long depend upon foreign workmen; the hope that these foreigners would teach Indian workmen who would replace the former in a few years' time has proved to be illusory; and it has also been shown that foreign workmen have no interest in making an Indian enterprise a success, and have no interest beyond filling their own pockets to the detriment of the business. If we want to start new industries in India we must sooner or later obtain trained workmen in India itself.......... It is conceded on all hands even by American and other foreign labourers who have been imported at great expense into this country that Indian labour is highly efficient and in no whit inferior to European labour. It is to be hoped that one of the results of the Industrial Commission's work will be the re-affirmation of the tribute which has been paid to Indian labour by some of the witnesses. We trust that the view which has been so long held, by Indian employers of labour especially, that Indian workmen are not so good as foreign workmen will be dissipated, and a more reasonable attitude will be adopted in this matter. There is no reason why Indians should not manage and work new industries in this country; many of them have gone to England and other countries of the west for scientific and technical training and obtained the highest qualifications. Such men ought not only to be employed but also encouraged by Indian employers. We sincerely trust that this question of the very great advantages of employing Indian labour, which has been only partially brought to the notice of the Industries Commission, will be thoroughly investigated, and public opinion will be roused to agitate for the recognition of Indian talent in Indian concerns."

Gujarâti (13), 31st Dec. 1916; Baroda Vartamân (53), 1st Jan.; Pârsi Sansâr (26), 30th Dec. 1916; Hitechhu (61), 31st Dec. 1916.

13. Referring to presidential address at the recent session of the Indian National Congress, the Gujarâti remarks that ten years ago this body begged for chaff and husks from its platform but to-day things are different and what was valued then is now regarded as trash and only one cry is heard, viz., India is fit for swarâjya and so it should be given to her. It points out that this aspiration for swarâjya is the net outcome of the British administration, that Lord Macaulay's anticipations have been fulfilled to-day and that it is an occasion for which England should be proud. It maintains that the day on which India will be placed on the level of the self-governing Colonies will be a day unique in the annals not only of India or the British Empire but of the whole world. Endorsing the remarks made by the President with regard to the working of the bureaucracy in India, the paper dwells on the alleged conflict between the desires of the officials and the public. According to it, the people ask if peace and "efficiency" cannot be maintained in the country by carrying on its administration in consonance with the will of the public, and it winds up its remarks in this connection by stating that ultimately the public voice is sure to prevail. The paper then goes on :—For the present situation the officials have nothing else to thank but their own greed in keeping all authority in their own hands. The least criticism makes them nervous and they run for help to the Press, the Seditious Meetings and the Defence of India Acts and try to check the public awakening. Government having once accepted the policy that education should be spread, the attempts that are now being made by them to arrest its progress, to make it more expensive and to impart it only through the medium of the English language can prove to be of no avail. Lord Curzon got the University Act passed, but it has only resulted in fanning public agitation. [The paper then proceeds to express agreement with Mr. Muzumdar's remarks to the effect that what the people want now is not a few more Indian bureaucrats but more of power and authority to be vested in their own hands and dwells on the supreme necessity of issuing a Royal Proclamation announcing that the grant of swardjya to India is the aim of British policy, that a scheme will be framed after the end of the war for taking preliminary steps in that direction and that the scheme will be put into execution within a particular period. Elsewhere the paper expresses its great joy at the rapprochement brought about between the Hindus and Muhammadans and remarks that both these Communities have now realised that in the present times religion has nothing to do with politics. Praying that their differences on the score of religion may cease for ever, it asks if there still remains in India any person with soul so dead, who does not daily say, "Lo! This is my mother"! [The Baroda Vartamán remarks that in his address the President has given a crushing rejoinder to those who, in season and out of season, base their argument against the grant of swardjya to India on the ground of the ignorance and superstition of the people. It observes that if, in view of the unflinching loyalty displayed by India during the present war, Government were only to declare now that India would some day be granted swardjya, such a declaration would be permanently recorded in letters of gold in the history of the British Empire. The Pársi Sansár congratulates Mr. Tilak on having forgotten the past and on taking part in the present Congress session. It lends its entire support to the President's address. The Hitechhu observes that Mr. Muzumdar's address has made it abundantly clear that the whole of India has made self-government its goal. The paper highly commends the speech and remarks that it is a very able and practical exposition of the whole question of swardjya.]

Comments on the proceedings of the Indian National Congress.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 1st and 3rd Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 1st and 3rd Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 4th Dec. 1916; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 31st Dec. 1916.

14. Dwelling upon the proceedings of the recent session of the Indian National Congress the Bombay Samáchár remarks that the great enthusiasm which prevailed among those present in the pavillion as a result of Sir James Meston's presence and his declaration that he sympathised with the Congress movement was only natural. It points out that His Honour's presence at the Congress session showed that the United Provinces Government were not at all inclined to create difficulties in the way of that body as the letter of warning addressed by the Commissioner of Lucknow Division was interpreted to mean in some quarters. The paper sets a high value on the sympathy of officials in the work of the promotion of public interests and observes that the fact that the various speakers spoke in a spirited manner, though with moderation, on the subject of the repeal of the Arms Act even in the presence of Sir James Meston shows that popular leaders can make demands for the just rights of the people

[illegible] The paper is in favour of conducting the [illegible] examination only in India if it be not feasible to hold simultaneous examinations in India and England. It also dwells on the desirability of repealing the Press Act at least after the close of the war and wishes that Lord Chelmsford would follow the sympathetic policy adopted by Lord Hardinge with regard to the question of the condition of Indians in British Colonies. [Referring, in its subsequent issue, to the resolution passed at the Congress urging His Majesty to issue a Royal Proclamation for the grant of self-government to India and remarking that the demands therein made for increasing the powers of the Government of India in the matter of nomination to the Executive and Legislative Councils only echo the desires of the people, the paper expresses its joy at the failure of Mrs. Annie Besant in the attempts she made in the Subjects Committee to get another clause added to the abovesaid resolution demanding that complete control should be given to India over her domestic affairs. It disparages the activities of those who are in hot haste to obtain "Home Rule" as calculated to retard the political regeneration of India and wishes that such people would be kind enough to carry on their work apart from the Congress. The Praja Mitra and Parsi refers to the heated discussion that took place in the Subjects Committee over the above resolution and attributes the fact of the Extremists ultimately yielding, to the chastening influence of the letter of warning issued by the United Provinces Government. It regrets, as being somewhat wide, the use of the word "demand," in the second clause of the resolution wherein it is asked that a definite step be taken towards self-Government by granting the reforms proposed in the scheme jointly prepared by the Congress and Moslem League Committees. In the subsequent issue the paper characterises the proposal brought forward by the extremists before the Subjects Committee, which was ultimately set aside, for holding the Civil Service examination only in India, as a visionary and thoughtless demand. It remarks that when opponents of India like Lord Sydenham have come forward to poison the ears of the British public at the present juncture when the British Government have become prepared to advance the political and economic progress of India it is but meet that the chairman of the Subjects Committee should rule out of order the proposal urging the recognition of a scheme for carrying on political agitation in England and India through the agency of the Home Rule League and its branches. The Jam-e-Jamshed gives preference to the original resolution asking for the grant of self-government to India within the course of a generation to the resolution actually passed by the Congress for conferring it "at an early date," as the latter phrase indicates a somewhat vague period of time. It remarks that much yet remains to be done by the Indians to effectively impress upon Government and the minds of the British public their fitness to enjoy swarájya. It points out that the Congress should exhort people not to neglect their civic duties in the matter of opening schools for imparting free primary education, providing sanitary abodes for the poor, starting free dispensaries, etc., and adds that instead of merely demanding that Government should annually open a particular number of new schools, those sincere-hearted persons who are burning with love for their country should also show something to their own credit. The paper then dwells on the desirability of starting a national fund but doubts if many of the the so-called patriots would contribute their share in a liberal spirit. The Kaiser-i-Hind congratulates Sir James Meston on his farsightedness in retrieving the mistake he had committed in sending the letter of warning to the Congress authorities by his subsequent presence at the Congress sessions. It welcomes the various resolutions passed in the Congress and remarks that now that the President has asked for the grant of swarájya within one generation there will remain no excuse for characterising the demand of the Congress as hasty.]

Mahratta (5), 7th Jan.; Gujaráti (13), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

15. "We have no doubt that our readers—who have been accustomed to think of the Indian Home Rule demand as a demand for the grant of certain rights to India within a definite time—have perused the actual Self-government Resolution with a beating heart— and have been thrown into sadness at finding no time-limit in it. The Congress asks for a Royal Proclamation announcing that it is the aim and intention of the British policy to grant self-government to India at an early date. Now a Royal Proclamation is a great thing. We have had such great things before and we have no objection to have one now. But frankly 'an early date' is nothing very definite. And 'self-government' is not such a hobgoblin as 'Independence' is. If the Jones Bill promising independence to the Philippines within four years did not pass the Legislature in America, the Philippines could not complain very reasonably and probably they did not complain very much. 'Independence' is a rather big thing to give. But self-government under the suzerainty of Britain—and that a very real suzerainty secured by special safe-guards—need not have been considered by our National Assembly as a boon too great to ask and to give. What prevented them from defining the 'early date' seems to us to be the lingering notion that the thing they demanded was rather too big to give. [Here the paper quotes approvingly from the Honourable Sir D. M. Petit's speech and goes on:—] Another Parsee gentleman, Mr. Jehangir Petit, was, in his enthusiasm, remarkably emphatic: 'If the Indian Nation is determined to have what is embodied in this resolution the only way to get it is to show to Government and the powers that the population of this great country is determined at all costs to have what is embodied in this resolution. What is it that secured for the Colonies their independence and self-government? By making the administration impossible they obtained self-government.' It must be admitted that the thing we are asking for, though not a heavy gift for paternal love to make, is certainly so for those in whom such love is naturally absent. And when there is a question of getting rights from rulers who are of a different nationality, a tough struggle must be expected. Especially when even the Colonies—the children of the mother country—had 'to make the administration impossible' to get a hearing, we may as well be prepared to bear disappointment if our half-hearted methods do not tell." [The Gujaráti observes:—"Whatever the fate of the scheme of reforms, it has assumed a definite shape and is now before the Indian and British public. That it will be ridiculed and subjected to adverse and even bitter criticism we have no doubt. For that Congressmen are quite prepared. But the enthusiasm that the subject of self-government evoked during the last session of the Congress was genuine and unbounded, and showed the spirit and temper of the Congressmen who had assembled at Lucknow. Self-government in a definite and concrete shape has now become part and parcel of the Congress programme and whatever the attitude of the present Viceroy or the Home Government or the Anglo-Indian Bureaucrats towards it, the Congress has, after mature deliberation, taken a step which cannot now be retraced. The advance must be along the lines chalked out by the Congress and the whole country is committed to the scheme jointly formulated and adopted by the Congress and the Moslem League. It is in this sense that the Lucknow session has attained to an historic significance of its own and all those who worked for achieving that end—Congressmen and members of the Moslem League—are entitled to the gratitude of the country and deserve the highest praise. We do not say that jarring notes will not still be heard. But the Congress and the Moslem League have effectually weakened their strength."]

Kesari (95), 2nd Jan.; Sandesh (103), 4th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 2nd Jan.

16. After describing the National Congress session at Lucknow as a "vast national gathering" to be "fitly compared" to "the encampment of an army bound for a national campaign", the Kesari writes:—In view of our present disarmed and pitiable condition, one may be disposed to smile at our calling the Congress gathering a military camp, but we may point out that the delegates who had assembled at Lucknow, though unarmed today, were the descendants of those who only a few generations ago had led campaigns, and fought battles and conquered and administered kingdoms, and that many of their kith and kin were today fighting on behalf of the British Empire and earning encomiums at the hands of British Generals. If the evil dream of an evil-eyed and insolent white colonial turns out true and there is an occasion for real war no one need have any doubt that hundreds and thousands of these men will be found prepared for war. The 29th of December 1916 will be reckoned as a red-letter day in the annals of the history of India, for on that day the flag of Swarájya was planted at Lucknow! Last Friday the whole nation gave expression with one voice to its hearty desire in such a loud tone as was heard throughout the world. Government pitied so long the Home Rulers on account of the internal splits among them. Now we shall have to pity Government itself for its helpless position. From the birth of the Congress the Hindu-Muhammadan split was brought into being and during the last decade a successful attempt was made to rally the moderates. Now all differences have disappeared and an immediate demand of swarájya was made by Hindus and Muhammadans at Lucknow and we give a plain warning to the bureaucracy that its days are numbered. The Anglo-Indian schemers who want to create a split in the nation have no other recourse but to resort to the uneducated and depressed classes, and even this refuge will not be of any avail to them for long. We do not say that the bureaucracy is an imposter; it is but doing its duty. So far as the rights of swarajya were concerned, it pitted one party against the other and thus kept both out of power. But when both the parties met together, the truth naturally came out. The Hindus and Muhammadans now seem prepared to tell the bureaucracy openly not to keep all power in its hands but to give it either to Muhammadans or Hindus. [Elsewhere the paper expresses its dissatisfaction that the Congress did not take up any executive function and appoint a committee to carry on the work of agitating for swarájya, but it is glad that it invited all the Associations including the Home Rule Leagues to carry on the agitation though some were against the invitation being extended to bodies not recognised by the Congress. [The Sandesh writes:—It is a remarkable fact that both the presidents of the Congress and the Moslem League and Mr. Surendranath Banerjee have studiously refrained from using the expression "Home Rule" in their speeches at Lucknow, and have all along used the word self-government. Though there is nothing in a name, the above fact shows that the conventionist Congressmen still continue to regard with some suspicion the Home Rulers. The Home Rulers, however, with a view to avoid a split, have accepted the term self-government and tried to put life into it by co-operation with the conventionists. Though the Congress has refused to recognise the Home Rule League as its own, the League will not fail to prosecute the work which it has taken upon itself to perform and the country will not thus suffer at all from the attitude taken up by some of the old Congress leaders who are hard to please. We hope that the All-India Congress Committee will now leave aside its narrow-mindedness and take a more rational view of matters. The Dnyán Prakásh, while declaring that the 29th of December should be considered a day fit to be inscribed in letters of gold in the history of Indian self-government inasmuch as its foundation stone was firmly laid in the Congress on that day, remarks:—Babu Bepin Chandra Pal and Mr. Tilak in the course of their speeches expressed their joy that the Congress was going to pass a resolution for that kind of Swarájya which they had been advocating for the last decade. The falsity of this statement was patent to those who knew what took place at Surat at the time of the split. We have shown it several times that the extremists then wanted unqualified Swarájya. The straightforward course would have been to acknowledge frankly the mistake they committed in the past or to keep quiet and not to allude to past events at all. It is very reprehensible that people were allowed to mislead the public from the Congress platform. Protests should have been raised then and there. As we have to work unitedly for the nation we desire that our differences should be buried and that the past should not be raked up.]

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

17. Young India quotes from the speech of Sir D. M. Petit at the recent Congress session the passage in which he sketches the future position of the Parsi community when India gets self-government and remarks:—"Indians will welcome with unaffected delight these sentiments expressed by one of the most distinguished Parsis of the day, when on rising to speak on the resolution on self-government he made the position of the Parsi community clear on this—the most vital of India's political issues. It could not have been otherwise. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that the great Parsi community which has taken such a large part in the development of industrial India will look with suspicion on a movement which will grant to every Indian citizen, to the domiciled European, to the Parsi, as well as the Hindu and the Muhammadan, the full enjoyment of his right as a self-respecting citizen of the British Empire. Where Dadabhai Naoroji and Sir Pherozesha Mehta led it should not be difficult even for the most commercially minded Parsi, with his profession of political apathy, to follow. This then is the dawn of hope—that after years of misunderstandings educated India has learnt to bear and to forbear and to achieve political unanimity as vital problems on the principle of give and take.......... But we are told, all this outcry for Home Rule is 'absurd'. 'I should be dishonest' said His Excellency Lord Chelmsford when he was performing in Calcutta the feat of replying to eleven addresses in one day, 'if I held out any hope, that progress will be rapid. Neither the British Consitution nor the British temperament is fond of catastrophic changes.' Well, let us first point out, that if the Indian people have any particular failing, it is their admiration for political honesty. They could show their admiration when a 'superior person' who had been to Korea, declared in a Viceregal address, that the East had no conception of truth. The Indian people admired the effrontery of the remark, and they can assure their Viceroys that they will never expect them to hold out 'dishonest' hopes. The 'catastrophic change' however will no longer be considered catastrophic when it comes. It is inherent in every condition of change that while a certain set of people stigmatise it as violent there are others who do not perceive it as a change at all. We can easily illustrate this by the mere mention of an oft-quoted saying, that the Briton never knows when he is beaten. That is how the Indian understands the British temperament, and his hope lies in the fact that a United India will achieve without catastrophic change what Britain had to achieve after a Revolution."

Message (6), 1st Jan.

18. In the course of its comments on the Arms Act resolution passed by the Indian National Congress, the Message remarks:—"How has the manhood of Indians disappeared? Hardly a hundred years have elapsed since the Mahratta battles were fought. The battles in the Punjáb are even of a later date. The war cry of Har Har Mahadeo was resounding in the ears of our grandfathers and invigorating them to heroic actions! The memory is still fresh, but its vibrations have become feeble, though not entirely absent. Where then and why has all this chivalry gone? The peaceful life of the last century has dealt a deathblow to the national heroism. The Arms Act has done it. As Mr. Lahiri so rightly observed in the Congress in the presence of Sir James Meston, it is the birthright of every man to possess arms for self-defence and self-protection. No citizen can rightly be called a free citizen unless he has this right. Queen Victoria very graciously proclaimed that Indians should be free citizens of India. Our present sovereign has also given special proof of his keen affection for this country in the memorable Guildhall speech which ought to be enshrined in the hearts of every Indian. But how far is the pledge kept? Every time the Arms Act reminds us that we are not free citizens......... And our manhood is not yet dead in spite of the bitter trials of the past hundred years. It still exists though in a potential form, and where the opportunity presents itself as in the case of the Sikhs, Gurkhas, and Mahrathas, it assumes the best form and again shines with its old lustre, be it in France or Mesopotamia. And not only the historically famous warrior races but even the Ganawalas can show their manhood on the battlefield amidst the roaring of guns though unaccustomed to it provided only an oppotunity be given to them. Why then not restore us our manhood? It can be very easily done. Repeal the Arms act and our children would soon grow accustomed to the historical traditions of their forefathers."

Comments of the ruling out of order by the Congress Subjects Committee of Mr. Tilak's resolution on the subject of political propaganda in England and India through the Congress.

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

[illegible] a keen sense of disappointment at the rejection of Mr. Tilak's proposal in the Congress Subjects Committee at Lucknow, regarding a scheme for political propaganda. Did Mr. Tilak ask the impossible? Not at all. He asked that the Congress should do officially, what, as a matter of fact, the late Mr. Gokhale was doing in England, whenever he had the opportunity to do so. Mr. Tilak put forward a scheme 'for carrying on political propaganda in England and in India through the Congress.' It suggested the raising of a fund and the appointment of small committees in various parts of India to make appeal to the public. The resolution which Mr. Tilak proposed was ruled out of order. This only shows that the 'Old Guard' in Indian politics have lost neither their numerical influence nor their capacity for blinking at facts. The idea that the Congress is essentially a Christmas activity, when the courts being closed the lawyers can be leagued together and asked to orate, has not yet lost its charm. The late Mr. Gokhale saw at once the fatuity of the whole business, and single-handed set to work. The Old Guard applauded the work but retained the machine of management in their hands. And it lies still in their hands. It is time now to bring our Samarths and our Setalvads to book and ask them what they propose to do during the 360 days of 1917."

Reflections on the result of the Conference between the representatives of the Congress and the Moslem League.

Gujarāti (13), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

20. "The close rapprochement of the leaders of the two communities and of the Congress and the Moslem League at Lucknow is an event of the greatest historic importance. It was an arduous attempt full of manifold difficulties, the more so in the United Provinces. The patience, good sense, toleration, foresight and the spirit of conciliation shown on both sides was highly commendable, not that there were no dark clouds on the horizon. Not that the deepest anxiety was not felt on certain occasions in the course of the discussions that took place at the joint meetings of Congressmen and the members of the Reform Committee appointed by the Moslem League. Not that the naughty 'younger brother' did not not seek to take advantage of the desire of the 'elder brother' to show a united front at this supreme juncture in the best interests of the country as a whole. But the outstanding fact remains that the most knotty and delicate questions were solved with success in a statesmanlike and patriotic spirit.......... It is a great triumph of which the whole country may well be proud. Their united demand cannot safely be treated with contempt in this country or in England, and it would be a thousand pities if it were received with scant courtesy. We trust such a fatal blunder will not be repeated either in India or England. The spirit and temper of the country has undergone a tremendous change and nothing would be more inexcusable than if the future administrative arrangements and Imperial readjustments were not made in conformity with the pressing exigencies of the new situation."

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

21. Under the heading "Congress Jottings" "A Delegate" writes in Young India:—"The Indian National Congress which met last week at Lucknow was in every sense the National Congress which it has always claimed to be. For the first time after thirty years, Hindus and Muhammadans found themselves united in common bonds of friendship and the esprit de corps which prevailed among them both was such as to evoke the admiration—may I say surprise—of a world which had been sedulously led to believe that India was a vast continent torn into pieces by differences of caste, colour and creed and ready to lose all cohesion the moment British overlordship was withdrawn from the land. It was indeed a sight for the gods to see, as Mr. Mazumdar remarked in some other connection, the very people, who were hitherto represented as being ready to fly at each other's throat at the slightest opportunity sitting on a common platform, hand in hand in a perfect spirit of camraderie. Moslem youths, young men coming from respectable families vied with each other and with their Hindu fellow volunteers in doing duty at the Congress Pandal during all its sittings with great heartiness and alacrity. Oh, what a change! Who would have dreamed in 1899 that such a beneficient transformation would have become possible?......... India is said to be a strange land and perhaps, the happy result which has been wrought on the banks of the Gomti will come to certain class of people, who had sedulously fomented bad understanding between Hindus and Muhammadans all these years as a shocking disappointment. Hindu-Moslem unity has become so not only in name, but in reality as well."

The Honourable Mr. Jinnah's address as president of the All-India Moslem League.

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

22. "Young India ought to be proud of the fact, that in the Honourable Mr. Jinnah it has found a leader, who labours under no illusions as to what United India ought to have. .... His presidential address does not give room for any equivocal comment. In his annual stock-taking he took occasion to define the 'fundamental object' for which the Moslem League meets annually, and went on to tackle the 'Indian problem' with a precision which we would have gladly welcomed in other presidential addresses......... We earnestly hope Hindu India will take to heart the wise words in which Mr. Jinnah couched his remarks on Hindu-Muhammadan relations. 'I have been a staunch Congressman,' he declared, 'throughout my public life and have been no lover of sectarian cries, but it appears to me that the reproach of "separation" sometimes levelled at Muhammadans is singularly inept and wide of the mark.'......... He referred to the unanimity of decision achieved by the Joint Conference in November last of the Congress and the League Committees in the matter of a scheme of reforms, and had a few words to say regarding the unfortunate controversy in the United Provinces over the passing of the Municipal Act. The decision of the thirty per cent. arrived at during last week will, we hope, make for a better understanding between the two great communities in the United Provinces. Mr. Jinnah voiced the Indian demand most clearly as regards the position of India in the Empire and with respect to allowing India her place in the Imperial partnership."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 3rd and 4th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 3rd Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 3rd Jan.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 4th Jan.; Mahrátta* (5), 7th Jan.; Gujaráti* (13), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

23. The Bombay Samáchár while endorsing the appeal made by the Honourable Mr. Jinnah as the President of the Moslem League for unity between Hindus and Muhammadans asks the Muhammadans to bear in mind the speech made by Sir Dinshaw Petit at the last session of the Congress to be prepared to make some sacrifices and suffer disadvantages for the welfare of the country and for advancing its interests. [The Sánj Vartamán takes note of the evolution of the League and the various questions referred to by Mr. Jinnah and congratulates the Congress and the League on the rapprochement that has been effected between them. In its English columns the paper writes:—"The address is notable for the dignity and the elegance of its style and for the force and spirit with which he has urged the claims of India to Home Rule within a specified period." The Hindusthán writes:—Mr. Jinnah has done a great service to India by asking Government to make a definite pronouncement with regard to the grant of swarájya to India within a definite period of time. Shri Venkateshwar is delighted at the clear pronouncement made by Mr. Jinnah and Mr. Rasul that India is fit for swarajya. The Bombay Samáchár in its issue of the 4th January takes note of the various resolutions passed at the League. It gives prominence to the resolution about self-government moved by Mr. Rasul in the presence of His Honour Sir James Meston and expresses hope that the resolutions which are jointly agreed to by the League and the Congress will receive the attention of Government. The Mahrátta says:—"The presidential address is worthy of the place the Honourable Mr. Jinnah holds in the advanced circle of Indian politicians and also worthy of the great community to which he has the honour to belong." The Gujarâti calls Mr. Jinnah's speech "a thoughtful and courageous pronouncement."]

Speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All-India Moslem League.
Bombay Samâchâr (55), 1st Jan.

24. The Bombay Samâchâr while taking an appreciative note of the speech made by Mr. Nabiullah, Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All-India Moslem League at Lucknow, remarks that the speech is an index to the awakening of the new spirit among the Muhammadans. It lays special stress on the appeal made by Mr. Nabiullah for the sinking of petty differences of race and creed and for concerted action by the Hindus and Muhammadans. While expressing its gratification at the gradual approximation of the ideal of the League to that of the Congress it asks the Moslems to completely identify themselves with the Congress by joining it at an early date while continuing to keep the Moslem League as a separate and independent body.

Comments on Sir James Meston's speech at the Moslem League meeting.
Mahrâtta (5), 7th Jan.

*25. Commenting on the speech made by Sir James Meston on the occasion of his visit to the Moslem League meeting at Lucknow, the Mahrâtta remarks:—"To advise, howsoever indirectly, the leaders of any community in India to place communal interests above the national is equivalent to attempting a division in the National camp. The Muslim leaders will of course take the official advice for what it is worth and will continue to make the Nation's advancement their primary duty. They cannot be fooled. The League cannot go back upon the lessons it has learned since its inception and the progress in political education which it has made during its ten years' career. Not even the 'fervent' advice of 'rulers' can persuade the self-conscious League and its self-confident leaders to turn their back upon Light and make a retrograde move......... It will do Sir James Meston great good to read Mr. Jinnah's disillusioning speech. The Muslim League has, under the guidance of its wise leaders, learnt to look upon the advancement of National interests as an aim not meaner but higher than the advancement of communal interests. And to expect the leaders—and the League under their care—to unlearn their wisdom only recently gathered is to expect the impossible. 'An old friend' of the Muhammadans ought to have rejoiced to see their advance in political insight. A benign ruler really interested in the progress of the large community under his rule ought to have felt happy to see that community climbing up the ladder of wisdom. Sir James, however, instead of showing any signs of satisfaction at the progress made by the Muhammadans, exhibited feelings which surely are not commendable in a ruler who only recently protested against the popular view that 'divide and rule' is the policy not unoften followed in responsible quarters. Sir James Meston seems to have plans of his own in connection with the readjustment of India's relations to Britain and appears to consider the present Home Rule agitation as a mischievous thing from the standpoint of his plans. Our readers have been told a little about the letter of Mr. Curtis of the Round Table." [Here the paper quotes the first paragraph of Mr. Curtis' circular letter and remarks:—] "That Sir James Meston should be a party to such an affair as has been brought to light by the publication of the private letter of Mr. Curtis is, to say the least, very impolitic. All the same, the letter is very useful to us as it gives an idea of the plans afoot and the support they are receiving and are likely to receive in high official quarters. Mr. H. L. S. Polak, a Colonial himself, characterised these plans as a deep-laid conspiracy to bring India under the domination of the Colonials. Sir James Meston is at full liberty to sympathise with his Colonial kinsmen and to work for their aggrandisement, but he must, then, be prepared to see himself roughly handled in the popular press, which will not fail to infer a connection of cause and effect between the plans revealed in Mr. Curtis' letter and the advice so fervently tendered by the United Provinces ruler to Muslim leaders on the occasion of his visit to the League on the 31st instant."

Very few Muhammadans attended the recent session of the All-India Moslem League.

Islámic Mail (4), 31st Dec. 1916, Eng. edition.

26. "Bulletin No. 2 of the Secretary, Moslem League, which was published in our columns last week contains a remarkable admission. It says:—'The session of the League this year bids fair to be of great importance and one remarkable feature of this year's session is that many Hindu volunteers have applied for the volunteership of the Moslem League.'.. ..... We doubt, however, if the fact of many Hindu gentlemen volunteering their services for the League will tend to add to the honour and reputation of the institution. It rather tends to show the complete aloofness of the Muhammadans from it......... A wire just received from our special correspondent in Lucknow says that very few Muhammadans of other Provinces attended the session and but for the Hindu attendance the League session this year would have been a fiasco. Mr. Wazir Hasan may glory in the cheap notoriety that he has secured, but if he is a true Muhammadan he would feel small pleasure at the split he has caused in the community."

India's representation on the Imperial War Conference.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 31st Dec. 1916; Bombay Samáchár (55), 30th Dec. 1916; Gujaráti (13), 31st Dec. 1916.

27. The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks that India would have no cause to complain if she had been represented in the Imperial War Conference by Lord Hardinge instead of by Mr. Chamberlain who, it writes, is a newly-appointed official without any experience of India and who, as a Conservative, holds narrow views in some respects. It also wishes that, instead of having two persons from India to advise the Secretary of State, Lord Hardinge had been appointed as the other Indian representative in the Conference. The paper observes that the object of this appointment will not be accomplished if mere ornamental figure-heads, drawn from among the Indian Princes or from the so-called great men who have rendered some services to Government, will be appointed to advise the Secretary. It then proceeds thus:—The time has now come for Lord Chelmsford to prove his mettle by adopting an independent attitude as Lord Hardinge had done with regard to the South African problem. His Excellency should, in the interests of India, exercise complete independence in the matter of the appointment of the two representatives above referred to, and, after consultation with the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council, his choice should fall on such persons as are enjoying the confidence of the public. Further, the position of these two persons should be defined beforehand and it should be so arranged that they may have the liberty of freely arguing with the other members of the War Cabinet. [The Bombay Samáchár considers the proposed representation of India at the forthcoming Imperial War Conference to be a happy augury for the future. It remarks that such honourable recognition of India at the hands of His Majesty's Government will not fail to strengthen her ties with the Empire and it will also tend to increase the prestige of Indians in the eyes of the people of those parts of the Empire where at present hesitation is being shown to recognise them as British citizens. It, however, remarks that to restrict the choice of the two advisers to be sent from India merely to the official class would be putting a very narrow interpretation upon the term "Indian representatives". It observes that persons drawn from the official class cannot see eye to eye with the people and even if they did they would have to act in conformity with the opinion of the Indian Government. It therefore, expresses the wish that Government may be kind enough to allow the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council to nominate an Indian who can independently voice the public feeling. The Gujaráti remarks that after all Lord Hardinge's assurance about India's representation in the Imperial Conference has come true. It refers to the points raised in some quarters to the effect that the forthcoming is a special War Conference and therefore the fact that India has been invited to take part in this special Conference is no guarantee that she should be allowed representation in the ordinary Imperial Conference for which the previous consent of the Colonies will be necessary, and tries to meet these two points by inquiring whether India would be [illegible] ordinary Imperial Conference when she has been thought [illegible] representation at a special Conference, and whether the Colonies would withhold their consent if His Majesty's Government were once to propose such a course. The paper, at the same time, expresses its surprise at India obtaining a place in the Conference even before obtaining self-government and, remarking that while the Colonial ministers are responsible for their actions to their people, the Secretary of State for India is not responsible to the Indian people and echoes the prevailing opinion in Britain, inquires if it is not expedient to remedy this anomalous condition.]

Gujaráti Punch (15), 31st Dec. 1916, Eng. cols.

28. "Every true son of this land will be gratified to find the status of India being raised to the level of the self-governing dominions in the British Empire. But we are afraid very few in this country will accept the theory that the present Secretary of State for India will be able to safeguard the real interests of the people of India in regard to the Imperial after-war settlement which must follow the close of the war.......... All the three points that are to engage the attention of the members of the Imperial Conference affect in one way or other the vital interests of Indian people and on their right solution will mostly depend the future progress of India as an integral part of the British Empire. We therefore heartily wish that the two gentlemen who are to be selected to assist the Secretary of State at the Imperial Conference may be chosen from among Indians of standing and reputation so that they may rightly advise the Secretary of State on questions which agitate the Indian mind to-day and voice popular Indian opinion as distinguished from the official before the highest council of the Empire."

Complaint about neglect to utilise India's vast man-power in the war.

Islámic Mail (4), 31st Dec. 1916, Eng. edition.

29. "No one in India could have read Mr. Lloyd George's message to the Princes and people of this country without a feeling of loyal enthusiasm to help the noble cause for which the Empire is fighting. Lord Chelmsford only voiced the feeling of the people in saying that India is ready to bear any sacrifice for her sovereign. She has so far done all that she could to mitigate the burdens of the British people. The people and Princes have both contributed very lavishly to the war funds and although no direct contribution has been given from the Indians, yet the indirect pecuniary assistance that has been given cannot compare unfavourably with what the Dominions and the colonies have paid. Her chief resource is, however, the supply of man-power which is of supreme importance just at present. But while tremendous efforts are made at Home to employ the man-power of Britain nothing is done to utilise the vast resources of India in this matter. France is utilising all its resources and if Germany had any colony left in her possession she would have certainly employed the Africans to assist in the campaign. But for reasons best known to the Cabinet Ministers themselves the vast treasures of Indian man-power are left untouched. A Bengali double company or a troop of Anglo-Indians does not by any means exhaust the resources of this great Empire. We can conveniently send as many troops as the Central Powers can put, and it is only a matter of painful surprise to us that with all declarations of confidence in our loyalty and admiration for our splendid devotion we are not yet given the opportunity of proving that India is the brightest jewel in the British Empire more transcendent in its shining lustre than even the colonies. We can send 50 million soldiers to fight the battles of the Empire. Who can do that?"

The Government of India should overhaul the various departments to see whether men of military age could not be released for service in the war.

Sind Observer (10), 20th Dec. 1916.

30. Under the heading "More men wanted for the war", the Sind Observer refers to the criticism in the English papers of the action of Government in exempting a large number of their servants of military age from service in the army at a time when there was a cry for more men on all fronts and continues:—"We think that in India there are some departments which could be greatly reduced and men of military age permitted to join the army instead of continuing to draw pay from the civil department at a time of financial stringency. The Engineering Department is one which the Government should not delay in examining for eligible men. Owing to the war public works have been cut down everywhere. Very little money is being spent, at least so we understand is the policy of Government, but we have not heard that any steps have been taken towards reducing the number of men employed by the Public Works Department. A few have been allowed to place themselves at the disposal of the military department, but a good number yet remain, and we notice that the system of employing temporary engineers has been reverted to. We should like to know what new works under construction or in contemplation justify this expenditure. It was decided after the outbreak of war that temporary engineers of the Public Works Department should be given their conge, so little was the need for their services, and the progress of the war should, we opine, have made evident the necessity for retrenchment."

The New Year and prospects of peace

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 1st Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 1st Jan.

31. The Praja Mitra and Pársi makes the following observations on the New Year day:—The peace note sent to the Allies by America and other neutral nations is actuated by self-interest and reminds us of the interference of the Great European Powers after the victory of Russia over Turkey in the year 1876-77 and that of all the great European Powers except England after the war between China and Japan. We will anxiously await the fate of the demand of America and other neutral nations that peace should be made. But for the present we would only remark that whatever the terms on which peace is made it would be futile to expect permanent immunity from war through it. Only a nation that is always prepared for war and can depend on its own people for its defence can be assured of peace. We hope, therefore, that the experience derived from the war will lead our Government to give us military training so that the Empire may be fully prepared for the combination of any number of nations against it and that there may be no repetition of the sad waste of men and money we are now witnessing. [The Akhbár-e-Islám remarks:—Let us hope for peace, but it should be a peace that will put an end to the militarism of Germany. It is the earnest wish of every Indian that the new year may bring success to our rulers and the Allies. We hope the new year may be fraught with success and prosperity to our country.]

There would have been no harm if the proposal of Germany to discuss peace terms had been accepted by the Allies provisionally.

Sind Advocate (8), 21st Dec. 1916.

32. In the course of its comments on the offer of peace made by Germany, the Sind Advocate writes:—"But we wonder why the offer, with whatever motive made, should not now be accepted by the Allies, tentatively subject to modifications including an indemnity by Germany and a complete status quo, especially when the German Chancellor has stated in the Reichstag that the terms will be such as to secure a lasting peace as the civilised world too desires. We do not know if the German offer is sincere, but if it is not, all the more desirable is it for the Allies to entertain it provisionally and then set about discussing it, and if Germany rejects reasonable conditions the world will condemn her. If, on the other hand, the Allies apparently refuse to entertain the offer on any account, which could not be their intention, then Germany will continue to blame England forgetting of course her own initial crime of invading France suddenly and through neutral Belgium, and invading Russia similarly without warning. Let us hope the counsels of His Holiness the Pope and of Mr. Wilson of America will succeed in bringing about a satisfactory solution of the difficulties."

Comments on the Allies' reply to the German peace note.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 6th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 2nd Jan.

33. The Bombay Samáchár approves of the clear terms in which the Allies have repudiated the overtures of peace made by the enemy through President Wilson. The paper is of opinion that Germany is feeling the strain of exhaustion caused by costly victories and that it is, therefore, desirous of concluding peace with a view to avoiding a disgraceful defeat. [The Sánj Vartamán also approves of the reply and while dilating upon the perfidious nature of the Germans believes that the Allies will no more be deceived by the enemy and that they will not listen to any peace proposals unless they receive reliable guarantee of good faith and full reparation. It opines that as such guarantees will not be forthcoming, the peace movement will come to nothing and war will continue.]

Comments on His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's replies to the addresses presented by the Central Muhammadan Association and the Bengal Moslem League at Calcutta.

Islámic Mail (4), 31st Dec. 1916, Eng. edition.

34. "We do not know what ground is there for the disappointment which appears to have been created among our co-religionists by the words of the Viceroy's reply to the Central Muhammadan Association of Calcutta. It is not of course quite so hopeful as we expected it to be....... . Taking all things into consideration the Viceroy's reply as a whole is far from discouraging and acknowledges in plain terms the unique services rendered by the Mussalmans to the British cause. He also acknowledged that the Indian army depends for a large proportion of its recruits upon the Mussalman population of this country and in the almost world-wide conflict that still rages they have fought most gallantly and many of them have, alas, sealed their allegiance and their loyalty with their life's blood. Replying to the Bengal Moslem League he remarked: 'Let me assure you that your interests will not be forgotten and that through allegiance to British Crown you will secure your hopes of advancement'. This is all that we want. We have given up everything before our duty to our sovereign and we hope, when time comes to reward the services rendered by the different parts of the Empire, our humble yet supremely loyal services would not be forgotten. The Mussalmans in Bengal did well not to formulate any demands just at present. But our needs are too well-known to need any particular mention."

Appreciation of the honour of the Crown of India bestowed upon Her Excellency Lady Willingdon.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.; Rást Goftár (28), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

*35. "The Honours List this year contains one name which is so endeared to the people of this Presidency that it attracts the first notice. The decoration of the Imperial Crown of India which has been so fittingly bestowed on Her Excellency is no doubt well deserved, and we most humbly beg to congratulate her on this recognition of her great services to the people of this Presidency. Lady Willingdon has won the hearts of all with whom she has come into contact by her genuine interest in the welfare of the people and her great refinement and cordiality. She has done very useful work during the war, and her interests in charities and charitable work of all kinds has been most unflagging and unremitting. The great War Sale and Fete in Bombay which proved such a huge success was a testimony to her great ability and indefatigable work. We are sure that Lady Willingdon's decoration with the C. I. is certainly the most noticeable item in the Honours List, and Bombay is proud of having such a distinguished lady as the wife of the Head of the administration." [The Rást Goftár also congratulates Her Excellency on the honour bestowed upon her and remarks:—"Her Excellency has been ever ready to identify herself with charitable movements which need the support of her name and position, and we are not wide of the mark when we say that the consorts of few Governors had been so popular as Lady Willingdon is in the Bombay Presidency."]

The New Year's Honours List.

Gujaráti* (13), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.; Message (6), 2nd Jan.

36. "The New Year's Honours list is not a long one nor is it particularly noteworthy. In these days of demand for self-government for India, the list is open to the criticism that exclusive of the titles conferred upon chiefs and princes, the higher services have, as usual, monopolised the principal distinctions and honours. The preparation of the Honours list is virtually a family arrangement so far as the higher titles are concerned.......... As we have already remarked, some of the recipients of honours and distinctions are really deserving of them and the present list contains some worthy names. The Honourable C. H. A. Hill earned a high reputation in Bombay. It remains to be seen how far he will be able to maintain it unimpaired or add to it by his statesmanlike appreciation of the problems of New India. He stands first on the list and is made a K. C. S. I.......... Colonel Hojel, I.M.S., whose name was well known in Bombay as a skilful physician before he retired from India, has received the C. I. E. for his valuable services in the hospital for Indian troops. But Dr. Bhajekar, Honorary Medical officer, Lady Hardinge War Hospital, must rest content with becoming a Rao Saheb only.......... Dr. Harold Mann has received the Kaiser-i-Hind Gold Medal. As a devoted scientific agriculturist and educationist and as a zealous advocate of temperance he is well known in this presidency, but the distinction conferred upon him is a poor recognition of his merits and services. This instance shows how other than administrative services are not sufficiently appreciated and rewarded. There is one name in the list that will attract special attention and that is Her Excellency Lady Willingdon's. She has been appointed a Lady of the Order of the Crown of India and the honour is well bestowed. Since her arrival in Bombay she made her influence felt in a variety of directions even before the outbreak of the war. The scheme for the better training of Indian midwives was inaugurated by her. The Women's Branch of the Bombay Presidency War and Relief Fund owes its signal success to Her Excellency and has helped in relieving the soldiers' sufferings and hardships. .... Lady Willingdon has thrown herself ino the movement with such zeal and energy that its great success has evoked expressions of wonder and gratitude in all parts of the presidency. She has proved a source of inspiration to all who have co-operated with her or under her guidance and the graceful recognition she has received at His Majesty's hands will gladden the hearts of all. Indian ladies who have come in contact with her have admired her simplicity, the cordiality of her manner and the open-mindedness and sympathy she has uniformly exhibited in her relatios with them......... We offer our hearty congratulations to Lady Willingdon on her new decoration and also to the other ladies who have received recognition for their splendid war work." [The Message also offers its sincere congratulations to Her Excellency Lady Willingdon for winning such a well merited and distinguished honour.]

Rást Goftár (28), 7th Jan., Eng. cols. ; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

*37. "The Honours List published last week is a tame and insipid document. It shows that the pains devoted in the selection of names is directed to finding out men from the nooks and corners of public life rather than from its broad and open highways. Officials whose merits are known only within the four walls of their office rooms muster strong on the list whereas non-official workers for the public cause are relegated to the very background. The more distinguished among them are conspicuous by their absence save for stray exceptions here and there." [The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks :—" The knighthood of the Star of India bestowed on Sir Claude Hill, who was formerly a member of the Executive Council in Bombay is a reward for hard work in this Presidency and as a member of the Imperial Council. The Hononrable Mr. Hill was a very well-known figure in Bombay and there was much regret when his translation to Delhi was announced."]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 4th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 3rd Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 3rd Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 3rd Jan.

38. A large majority of the honours falls to the lot of officials and those who have rendered services in connection with the war. No honour worthy of note has been conferred upon any member of the general public. However, the people of Bombay would rejoice at the honour done to Lady Willingdon. Her Excellency fully deserves the " Crown of India " bestowed upon her. [The paper then proceeds to dwell upon the services rendered by Lady Willingdon in connection with maternity hospitals and war hospitals and takes appreciative note of the honours bestowed upon the Maharajas of Navánagar and Bhávnagar and several recipients of minor honours. The Praja Mitra and Pársi and the Jám-e-Jamshed congratulate Lady Willingdon and others on the honours conferred upon them. The Akhbár-e-Islám writes :—The Honours List is disappointing as usual and the higher honours fall to the share of Europeans. We are sorry to see that not a single Muhammadan lady has been deemed worthy of the Kaiser-i-Hind medal.]

Comments on the proposed grant of administrative and fiscal autonomy to Portuguse India.
Message (6), 5th Jan.

39. "Reports received in Goa from Lisbon state that a decree will be shortly promulgated, conceding adminstrative and fiscal autonomy to Portuguese India. Further it is stated that the present Governor-General for Portuguese India will be granted a further term of office in view of the above circumstances. The Phillippines got Home Rule; Goa is promised it! Why should India lag behind? Are Indians behind the Phillippinos or their Goa neighbours in point of civilisation or fitness for self-government?"

Comments on the Government of India's decision in connection with the inquiry regarding the election of the Honourable Mr. Jinnah.
Message (6), 5th Jan.

40. "It is announced by the Government of India that the report of the officer appointed to enquire into Mr. Jinnah's election to the Imperial Council fully exonerates him from the charges brought against him and that there was no ground for any imputation with regard to the propriety of his conduct. So far so good. But who was responsible for making unfounded charges against Mr. Jinnah, thus putting both Government and Mr. Jinnah to unnecessary trouble and expense? What steps do Government intend to take to bring to book those responsible for the charges? We think the public is entitled to know this and trust Government will condescend to vouchsafe the information."

Comments on the forfeiture of the security deposited by the Jain Vijaya Printing Press of Surat.
Rást Goftár (28), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

41. "For the Press Act to be inoperative for a long time would be almost tantamount to administrative stagnation as matters stand at present. As the proof of the pudding is in the eating so the proof of the Press Act is in its working. The latest instance is that of the Jain Vijaya Printing Press, Surat. A security of Rs. 500 was taken from it. This has been now forfeited and the keeper of the press has been ordered to deposit a fresh security of Rs. 1,500. He petitioned the Bombay Government that the forfeiture of the first security might be treated as a warning and fresh security dispensed with. The petition has been rejected. If the press has now to close down, it will mean Rs. 500 to the good so far as the Bombay Government is concerned and another press less. The fewer the printing presses the better for the peace of the country."

Complaint about the entire absence of Parsi holidays on the list of holidays to be observed in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind during 1917.
Pársi Sansár (26), 23rd Dec. 1916.

42. Pársi Sansár regrets that there should not be a single Parsi holiday on the list of holidays to be observed in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind during the current year, although there are five such holidays on the list of Bank holidays sanctioned by Government. It points out that as the result of past agitation on the subject, the Judicial Commissioner was considering the advisability of cutting down some of the other unnecessary holidays and including the Parsi holidays in the list of holidays for his Court, but that he was deterred from doing so by a representation on the subject from the Sind Muhammadan Association. It often happens, the paper continues, that Parsi jurors are asked to attend on Parsi holidays, and it is for their convenience and for that of the Parsi members of the Court establishment, if not for that of the few Parsi lawyers practising in the Judicial Commissioner's Court, that the Parsi holidays should be recognised as Court holidays. The paper hopes that the matter will again receive the attention of the Judicial Commissioner. The paper does not wish that the holidays of other communities should be cancelled for the benefit of the Parsis. It only means that some arrangements should be made to give the Parsis their holidays.

EDUCATION.

Comments on the Government Resolution on the report of the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, for the year 1915-16.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 1st Jan., Eng. cols.

43. "The Government Resolution on the report of the Director of Public Instruction on the progress of education in the Bombay Presidency during the year 1915-16 is a somewhat melancholy document. Instead of marking the progress made, and inspiring hope of further progress to be made, the report mournfully speaks of arrested progress in all the branches of public instruction. Arrested progress due to the financial situation is the prevailing note of the Resolution; and as that situation is not likely to be relieved while the war lasts, and for some time after, we are afraid the Director of Public Instruction will have to continue to sing in this melancholy tune for some years to come. It is most unfortunate that the hands of Government should be tied by want of funds, at a time when there is a greater awakening of the people all over the country in the matter of education. All the Indian communities are being roused to the necessity and benefits of education, as is eloquently testified to by the number of educational conferences which are meeting everywhere several times in the year. While we admit the undoubted stringency of the financial situation, we are not by any means sure that it is insurmountable. In any event we do not think that this policy of starving education, and postponing needed reforms, can be long pursued without producing very undesirable effects. To what extent educational progress in the Presidency has been checked by lack of funds will appear from several passages occurring in the Resolution.......... It is generally recognized, and the Resolution itself notes it, that one of the most pressing educational needs of the Presidency is the provision of a large number of trained teachers for schools of all grades. But nothing could be done to supply this want. As a result, the development of the schools continues to be retarded by the lack of trained masters, and constant changes in the staff.......... Financial stringency is a very real and very unfortunate fact; but the public welfare demands that education should be the last department of public administration to suffer from it.......... With regard to Muhammadan education, the conclusion arrived at by Government on the question of adopting Urdu Standards, based as it is upon actual experience of two years, appears to us to be quite sound. It is more than doubtful whether, except in those districts where Urdu is the mother tongue of the people, the vernacular of the district is not a more suitable medium for instruction than Urdu; and many enlightened leaders of the community hold the same opinion. [The paper then refers to the complaint in the Resolution that many of those attending the College of Commerce have no real intention of following a business career and remarks:—] We agree that it is not desirable that the only institution for commercial training in the presidency should be overcrowded by people who have no intention of following the commercial career. But before we blame young men in this country for not having clear intentions with regard to their future careers, is it not necessary to see that there is real scope and opportunity for all careers that may be desirable? We should like to know if Government, or the various commerce associations in our city, have taken any steps to ensure a reasonable commercial career to the students who pass out of the College of Commerce. In the absence of scope for all, it is no use blaming young men for not exactly knowing their minds, or wavering in their decisions with regard to their future careers."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 30th Dec. 1916.

44. Commenting upon the Report on Public Instruction in the Bombay Presidency for the year 1915-16, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that the Resolution the local Government has published on the said report affords melancholy reading. It is of opinion that the fact that educational progress has come almost to a standstill in all its different branches as a result of the present financial stringency will cause anxiety in a country like India, where the great mass of the people is ignorant. It maintains that the fact that Local Boards, Municipalities, etc., incurred increased expenditure on education in the Presidency during the year under report points to the growing enthusiasm of the people in the matter of education, adding, at the same time, that such enthusiasm cannot endure long without help from Government. The paper observes that even when questions affecting the stability of the Empire absorb all attention, the Educational is the last department that can bear any retrenchment of expenditure without much harm resulting. It, accordingly, expresses the hope that, while framing their next budget, Government will be kind enough to make liberal provision in the matter of education.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 31st Dec. 1916.

45. The Kaiser-i-Hind disapproves of the policy adopted by the Educational Departments in India of spending a large portion of the sums allotted to them on indirect objects, such as direction and inspection, to the neglect of directly educational purposes. It points out that while in England the expenditure incurred on the payment of Directors, Inspectors, etc., comes to 1·2 or 1·3 per cent. of the total expenditure on education, here in India the amount spent on such indirect educational purposes forms one-third of such total expenditure. It maintains that what the public really wants is not necessarily that the expenditure on education should continuously increase but that the money available should be spent in the best interests of education. The paper suggests that figures should be given to show whether the number of schools and pupils have increased in proportion to the additional grants made towards education. As a notorious instance of waste of money devoted to educational purposes it quotes the case of the Tata Research Institute at Bangalore which, it declares, has with its huge expenditure on buildings and in payment of the staff proved a colossal failure. In view of the great necessity for research and scientific development created by the war, the paper suggests that the authorities, instead of allowing such a great institution to remain in a decadent condition, should appoint a public commission with a view to bringing about an improvement in it.

The duty of the British Government to make primary education universal in India.

Sind Advocate (8), 21st Dec. 1916.

46. "May the day be hastened by God, when primary education will be universal in India, for the weal of the masses intimately depends upon education. The evils they suffer are very very largely due to ignorance. By the bye Mr. Patel showed by figures that the condition as regards literate population of the Bombay Presidency today is exactly the same as was that of England at the time of introduction in the latter country of compulsory universal education. And yet we do not want universal education at once but only a serious beginning of it. Will Government refuse it? Can any Government claiming to be ma-bap of the ryot as does the British Government in India give us a refusal? Will the great and enlightened nation which rules our destinies, the nation which originally instilled and inspired in us the ambition for universal primary education—an ambition which the most advanced Native States have actually put into practice—fall behind its pupils?"

Suggestions for encouragement of education among the Mahrattas.

Message (6), 2nd Jan.

47. A correspondent writes to the Message:—"India is an agricultural country whose prosperity depends on the scientific development of agriculture. With a view to this Government have opened an Agriculture College and an Agricultural School. The advantages to be derived from them cannot, however, be availed of by the agricultural population mainly composed of Mahrattas on account of their illiteracy, and backwardness precludes them from taking advantage of the 15 per cent. free studentships sanctioned by Government. It is, therefore, necessary to make special arrangements for their education by making a special allowance to the Patils of villages for the number of students canvassed by them......... The poverty of the Mahrattas is well-known and with the increased rate of school fees the Mahratta students are at a loss to find the means for higher education. Moreover, admissions in many English schools are limited. Under these circumstances it would be a great privilege if Government reserved at least 20 per cent. of the admissions for Mahratta students and also increased the percentage of free studentships. Another important concession would be to appoint teachers from those agricultural classes to which the students generally belong. This would be impossible in the case of Mahrattas inasmuch as entrance into the training college for men requires the candidate who has passed the vernacular final to pass an entrance examination, which he finds a difficult barrier to cross on account of his inability to go through the ordeal. If Government in order to secure a good percentage of teachers dispenses with this test the community will feel greatly obliged for the concession."

Comments on the proceedings of the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference.

Akhbar-e-Islám (52), 4th and 5th Jan.

48. Referring to the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference that recently met at Aligarh, the Akhbár-e-Islám expresses its belief that the change brought about in the opinion of the President, the Honourable Mr. Shafi, in favour of free and compulsory primary education must have spread great satisfaction among the Muhammadans. It is of opinion that, instead of merely depending upon Government, Muhammadan leaders and Educational Conferences should make joint endeavours to frame a scheme for the introduction of this kind of education among Moslem children in particular municipal districts of the Presidency. The paper suggests the appointment of a mixed Committee of officials and non-officials for the purpose. It also observes that it would be folly to suppose that the Moslems residing in British India would be opposed to free and compulsory primary education when such education has been welcomed by their co-religionists residing in the Baroda State. It concludes with remarking that it will not be surprised if, after the war, the Imperial Government change their present views with regard to this sort of education, provided the Moslems continue to take unflagging interest in this connection. [In its subsequent issue the paper observes that remarks made by the Honourable Mr. Shafi in the course of his presidential address on the subject of Moslem education were specially important from this point of view that the other Indian communities hold the belief that the political progress of India is retarded on account of the backwardness of the Moslems in the matter of education. Sharing this belief it exhorts the Muhammadan leaders to lose no time in taking up the question of education among their community. The paper then proceeds:—There cannot be a single Muhammadan who is not in favour of demanding political rights by means of constitutional agitation. The Muhammadans have more faith in the natural course of things than any other community, and it is for this reason that they are quite opposed to demanding political rights in hot haste or by stirring up excitement or producing disaffection after the manner of the extremist politicians. This attitude of the Muhammadans is misconstrued by other communities who believe that the Muhammadans carry on agitation for obtaining political rights for themselves. There is no doubt that this belief has been based upon wrong grounds.]

RAILWAYS.

Criticism of the Railway policy of the Government of India.

Young India (11), 3rd Jan.

49. In the course of the sixth instalment of an article on "Indian Railway policy" contributed anonymously to Young India, the writer observes:—"We have already seen the disastrous financial consequences of the guarantee-system in the building of Indian Railways. It is now universally admitted that no more wasteful or unmoral method of attracting foreign capital for a system of railways for such a poor country as India is could well have been conceived. Not only has there been enormous waste in the actual expenditure, but there has been an accumulation of public indebtedness of the most unconscionable character. The damning fact that emerges from the most superficial study of Indian railway finance is that in the budget of 1916-17, whereas the capital outlay on all State lines is £366,857,27,000, the net working profit after meeting interest charges works out to the magnificent figure of ·68 per cent.......... A later evil apparition is to be seen in what is known as the Indian Railway programme which has persisted from the days of Lord Elgin down to our own. No matter what the financial position of India may have been in any year or in any series of years, provision must be made for this railway programme both by borrowing in London and by diverting whatever surplus revenue might be available. More wagons, more new construction, more equipment of old lines, this has been the ever-growing cry from interested British capitalists and industrial servants? It was a yearly scramble for funds in which the most vital interests of Indian progress were sacrificed to the insatiable demands of foreign exporter or importer.......... Naturally, in the effort to find money for these delectable purposes the needs of domestic reform, the improvement of education and sanitation, and even urgent administrative reforms were deliberately put on consign. It seems vastly pitiful to contrast the elaborate ingenuity which the Indian Finance Department expended in showing how the extension of elementary education on a free or compulsory basis was an impracticable financial proposition, with the unscrupulous daring which they showed in devising ways and means for provisioning the Railway Board. The largest amount that could possibly be raised by way of loan in the London market (about 9 million sterling a year) was definitely earmarked for railway expenditure. Furthermore, by sequestrating 1 crore of the annual surplus funds and over 3 crores of the annual Indian Rupee loan and by raiding the Indian Savings Bank deposits to the tune of 1 crore and laying violent hands on the annual profits from coinage and performing similar feats of brigandage, the Government of India was committed to an annual programme of expenditure of close upon 12 millions.......... It is not necessary to dwell upon the unmorality of utilising the profits on coinage for purposes other than those for which those profits were intended to be utilised, and that is the building up of the Indian gold reserve. Now, it would strike the most superficial student that this Railway programme was a thing of mere shreds and patches. There was nothing secure about it. The London money market might fail at any time to respond to the seductions of the Indian Railway programme makers. There may be no revenue surplus available either and the profits on coinage may either entirely fail or be utterly negligible. We suppose that in the event of any of these untoward things happening, the Indian Finance member will have pressure brought to bear upon him to starve Indian progress along the whole line.......... This brief inquiry in the financial aspect of Indian railway policy that we have interpellated here brings out in strong relief the essential rottenness of the basic principles on which Indian railway system has been built—without regard to the real needs of this poor country, and second, without regard to the eternal verities of sound economics.......... The broad conclusion to which one is forced is that alike in the inception as in the development of Indian railway administration, the true and permanent interests of the Indian population have not always been kept in view."

Comments on the reduction in the number of trains on the various railway lines in India.

Gujaráti Punch (15), 31st Dec. 1916; Deshi Mitra (59), 4th Jan.

50. The Gujaráti Punch expresses fear that the proposed reduction in railway traffic would lead to a rise in the prices of foodstuffs and increase the discomforts and hardships to which the third class passengers are subjected. It, therefore, suggests that no reduction be made in the number of trains running on the railway lines. It is of opinion that a great deal of economy would be effected if no first and second class carriages are attached to passenger trains and only third class trains are run. [The Deshi Mitra expresses fear that the stopping of the goods traffic on the metre guage railways would inflict hardships upon the public by raising prices. It, therefore, suggests that goods traffic should be allowed on metre guage railways at least for a few days in the month.]

MUNICIPALITIES.

Appeal to the Bombay Food Prices Committee to take measures to keep down the abnomal rise in the prices of food-stuffs, etc.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 5th Jan.

51. The Sánj Vartamán deplores the steady rise in the prices of commodities such as charcoal, onions, potatoes, ghee, etc., and writes :—The prices are rising by leaps and bounds and it is surprising that the Food Prices Committee is sitting with folded hands. At the outset of the war the Committee rendered some service to the public by fixing prices, but of late the public knows nothing of its activities beyond the regular publication in the Government Gazette of the notification about food prices. The rise in the prices of foodstuffs and other articles of everyday use weighs very heavily on the poorer classes. We would, therefore, request the Food Prices Committee to enquire into the inordinate rise in the prices and to see whether any steps can be immediately taken to bring them to a lower level.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

The white man's claim to racial superiority over other races will induce Asia and Africa to throw off European domination.

Message (6), 13th Jan.

1. "It was the Spectator that told us frankly some time back that 'the Whites claim—and have for a century exacted—the position of an aristocracy among races of other colours. The white man, in an Asiatic State, never accepts any other position than that of first, and that by right, not of his creed, not even of his knowledge, but of some inherent and—as it were—divinely granted superiority. He never consents to any lower position, and is in fact unable even to think of himself in any other.' And this is exactly the theme of the Round Table Gospel as has been revealed to us by the 'private' letter of Mr. Curtis, which has produced a sensation in this land. In the memorable words of Mr. Mohamed Ali of the Punjáb, 'it is just this preconceived notion of the everlasting difference between East and West that is responsible for three-fourths of the discontent not only in India, but also in Egypt and China: and, if ever the Yellow Peril or the Black Peril becomes a reality, in the sense of a combined effort in Asia and Africa to throw back the tide of European aggression, Europe would have none to thank but the narrowness of its own pseudo-scientific dogmas, just as France had to thank Napoleon as the maker of modern Germany, and the ultimate cause of the catastrophe of Sedan'."

The object of the Home Rule propaganda is to put an end to the political, physical and economic emasculation of the people.

Young India (11), 17th Jan.

2. Young India quotes from the New Statesman an appreciation of Lala Lajpat Rai's book entitled Young India, which ends in the following sentence:—"But put it at its very best, paternal government can only result in what the veteran Dadabhai Naoroji has called 'moral poverty.'" The paper then continues:—"It is against the perpetuation of this 'moral poverty' that we are fighting and have to keep on fighting. The escape from this 'moral poverty,' is the ultimate justification of Home Rule. The sole object is to put an end to the political, physicial and economic emasculation of the people which has been the result of British rule in this country. As the Nation says, 'the moral poverty of subject races governed from above cannot be avoided' and therefore the only way out for India is the attainment of Home Rule. Detestation of all change is the invariable mark of officialdom, particularly of bureaucratic officialdom in this country. Add to this the fact which Professor Pratt notes in his introduction to the book, that most of the Englishmen whom he met in India were singularly lacking in curiosity about Indian thought, religion, tradition and ways of viewing things. Here we have the explanation of the attitude of the Anglo-Indian, official and non-official, towards Indian aspirations. But when once a people have attained to self-consciousness, it is impossible to prevent them from aspiring after change and obtaining it......... Lala Lajpat Rai's life has been dedicated to the task of the rapid though peaceful ushering in of such a change in India, and he represents a mighty national movement. His new book is but one of the expressions of this movement.........May we point out to the Indian bureaucracy that their careful exclusion of well-informed publications like 'Young India,' from India will not at all help to arrest the progress of thought or check the love of political freedom which are the unmistakable signs of awakened national life."

Home Rule, however defective, is better than the most perfect form of foreign rule.

Young India (11), 17th Jan.

3. Under the heading "Madras notes" an anonymous correspondent of Young India observes:—"The most absorbing subject of the hour here, as it is elsewhere, is political. The whole country is Home Rule struck. Of course, this is as it should be. 'A healthy nation,' says a living writer, remarkable for his insight and courage, 'is as unconscious of its nationality as a healthy man of his bones. But if you break a nation's nationality it will think of nothing else but getting it set again. It will listen to no reformer, to no philosopher, to no preacher, until the demand of the Nationalists is granted. It will attend to no bussines, however vital, except the business of unification and liberation.' Everything else is brushed aside: it is in this sense a 'curse'. But what else can a conquered nation do? The foreign Government may be the best of all Governments in the best of all possible words; it may be clearly demonstrated by sober reasoning to be so. But it is useless: 'national government is for the satisfaction of the people. One Antonine emperor, one St. Louis, one Richelieu, may be worth ten democracies in point of what is called good government; but there is no satisfaction for the people in them.' It is like 'depriving a dyspeptic of his dinner and handing it over to a man who can digest it better' it is 'a highly logical proceeding,' but 'not a sensible one.' The above remarks have been made in regard to Ireland by Mr. Bernard Shaw, and they apply with equal force to our country. The bureaucracy may be efficient; English officials as a class may have the interest of our country at heart; but these things can never 'satisfy' the awakened people. We must have our own rule."

How far is India fit for swarájya?
Rást Goftár (28), 14th Jan.

4. Disapproving the demand made at the last session of the Indian National Congress to the effect that India should be granted self-government at an early date, the Rást Goftár observes that what India wants is autonomy in her local administration and not full swarájya accompanied with an exercise of Imperial powers. It maintains that the country neither deserves swarájya of the latter type nor is it likely that it would be granted to her in the near future. It supports the resolution of the Congress as originally drafted, asking Government to confer self-government upon India within a generation, and jeers at the demand of the impatient extremists for the grant of swarájya at an early date. The paper proceeds thus:—We are very proud that the military prowess displayed by the two or three lakhs of Indian soldiers fighting in France and Egypt has been praised but the mistake should not be committed of making that important event serve as a basis for the demand above referred to. The Indian soldiers were employed in the military service of Government and it is for that reason that they have fought and are fighting for Government. The bravery they have displayed reflects credit upon them, but the few impatient persons from among us who see visions of swarájya can lay no claim to the self-sacrifice and bravery shown by these soldiers. The paper then goes on to welcome the grant of self-government to India but it wishes that it should not come within such a short time as the more impatient among the congressmen would want it to come. It remarks that the Government of India by the Indians is not like the juggler's mango tree which grows up before the very sight of the spectators. The paper believes that the people will get everything and Government will give it willingly, but adds that the people will first have to become perfectly fit for it.

Mr. Tilak's lectures at Ahmednagar and Belgaum published as a Home Rule hand-book.
Kesari (95), 16th Jan.

5. With a view to provide the public with a suitable and concise hand-book on the subject of swarájya for their daily use and study, the Home Rule League of Poona has published, in pocket size pamphlet form, the three speeches of Mr. Tilak delivered at Ahmednagar and Belgaum. The speeches are reproduced just as they were reported by the Government reporters, the sentences considered objectionable by the High Court being deleted. It bears on its cover Mr. Tilak's portrait and is provided with a blank form inside to be filled by persons desirous of joining the Home Rule League. The price of the hand-book is half an anna.

The Arms Act should be repealed.
Hindusthán (17), 16th Jan.

6. The Arms Act was passed with a view to preserving peace in the country. But every one knows that this object has not been gained. Dacoits are rampant in certain parts of the country and robbers and free-booters who possess arms annoy peaceful citizens with impunity. The Act, moreover, reminds us that we are not free inasmuch as we cannot bear arms without a license, while Europeans, Eurasians and Christian Negroes can freely possess arms. Is this not an insult to Indians? The Act is responsible for reducing Indians to a helpless and pitiable state. If Indians had been allowed to bear arms, a vast army would have been raised from amongst them and the war would not have been prolonged so far. The Arms Act has degraded us in our own sight and in the sight of other nations. We fully endorse all that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu said in the Congress while supporting the resolution for the abolition of the Arms Act. We know that more men from the Native States have gone to the front than from British territory and the reason is that the Native States allow their subjects to bear arms freely. The Arms Act has defeated its own ends and it should no longer be allowed to be on the Statute Book.

Extract from a private letter on the question as to how far the English in India can trust the Indians.

Rast Goftar (28), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

7. "We quote the following extract from a private letter we received from a well-known and distinguished English lady at present engaged, like many of her eminent sisters, in charitable work 'somewhere in France':—'By the way have you ever heard of a barrister from the Central Provinces called . . . . I have never met any one so anti-Indian. He has not a good word to say for any native—in fact he had the cheek to tell me that my Hindu friend himself would cut my throat any day and that my Parsi friends would stand and watch the operation with much satisfaction. I think the man must be mad. He seems to think that everybody in India is simply waiting his chance to murder us all. I tried to argue with him; but it was not a bit of good. He said "you are like the foolish people who believed in the native before the mutiny." He seemed quite to have forgotten the thousands who remained loyal and the many who gave their lives to save whitefolk. People like that do endless mischief in India; and I told him so.'"

Comments on Mr. Curtis' Round Table circular letter.

Kesari (95), 16th Jan.

8. Referring to Mr. Curtis' circular letter, the Kesari, after stigmatising Sir James Meston and Mr. Marris as 'abettors' in the 'plot' being hatched by the Colonies 'to rob Indians of their freedom', goes on to remark:—These officers have been guilty of ingratitude to the Indian people, inasmuch as they have been trying to serve the interests of the Colonials while eating the salt of Indians. They have been conspiring against their own masters, the people of India, and their sin is more heinous than that of the adulterous married woman. Had any native officer similarly gone wrong, he would have been immediately dismissed. Government are very particular in preventing native officers from participating in public movements, and yet it has allowed the above officers to co-operate with a foreign political agitator against the interests of India. Is this just? If Government honestly think that the Round Table agitation will do good to India, let them say so openly. In short, we demand a public explanation from Sir James Meston and Mr. Marris of their conduct in this matter or Government themselves should come forward with their own defence. The Times of India is indeed not enamoured of the suggestion to allow the Colonies a hand in Indian affairs, but it insists that Mr. Curtis' scheme has not the official backing of the Colonial Governments and so it may be disregarded. We, however, think differently and regard Mr. Curtis as the visible emblem of the desires of the Colonies. What has once happened may happen again. Has not the British Government reaped the full benefit of the adventurous spirit, the daring and the intrigues of the East India Company? European nations can as easily transform an irresponsible movement into a responsible one as they can annex lands discovered by private travellers. Let us wait for a while, and then the Colonies will be seen in their true colours at the forthcoming Imperial War Conference and the real import of the Round Table movement will be unmasked.

Lord Sydenham's article on 'The danger in India'.

Chandrodaya (31), 15th Jan.

9. The Chandrodaya declares that Lord Sydenham has as it were rained fire on India's political aspirations by his article. It points out that as nations, like men, live upon the fulfilment of their hopes and aspirations, to impede India's political progress by denying her a substantial share in the administration of the country is most ungenerous, and that it is writings and utterances of statesmen like Lord Sydenham and Mr. Curtis that spell danger to India.

The Central Division Court of Ward's decision to hand over the Tai Maharaja estates to Jagannath.

*Mahrdtta (5), 21st Jan; Message (6), 20th Jan; Sandesh (103), 20th Jan.

10. Referring to the orders passed by the Court of Wards, Central Division, to hand over Shri Jagannath Maharaja's estates to him, the Mahrdtta writes:—"The Court of Wards ought to have handed over the estate to the lawful heir soon after the celebrated judgment of the Privy Council was given. The unnecessary delay caused further litigation, and the suit for the execution of the decree is still pending in the District Court of Poona. The Court of Wards had no lawful excuse to postpone this execution of the decree of the highest tribunal and a delay of nearly two years on their part to do the needful is certainly inexplicable. However, they have come to their senses now, and we are glad that the matter is set at rest by their readiness to hand over the estate to the heir, as they have come to know that they can not retain it any longer without a continuous violation of the judgment of the Lordships of the Privy Council." [The Message remarks:—"The decision, if true, shows that better and wiser counsels have prevailed with Government. By its decision not to contest the suit, it is only showing good sense and we venture to offer it our hearty congratulations in advance. We trust the same good sense will prevail with the Kolhápur Durbar also and that it will hand over to Mr. Jagannath Pandit, who is now beyond dispute the legal heir and successor of the late Baba Maharaja, the estate which is situate in its territories but which we believe is guaranteed by the British Government. All's well that ends well." The Sándesh says that the people of the Maháráshtra will be glad to hear the news that Government have at last decided to hand over Tai Maharaja's property to Jagannath and it cogratulates the latter on the final result of the long-drawn-out dispute.]

Appeal to the moderate leaders of the Muhammadan community not to view with indifference the ebullitions of the youthful members of the community.

Islámic Mail (4), 14th Jan. Eng. edition.

11. The Islámic Mail draws a contrast between the sober and unruffled attitude adopted by the Musalmans in the face of a great deal of provocation from the Hindus when the agitation against Lord Curzon's Partition of Bengal was at its height, and the unruly and bellicose spirit displayed by those Musalmans who attended the Lucknow session of the Moslem League. It is concerned to note that all moderate leaders of the Muhammadan community such as Nawab Mushtaq Husain, ex-Justices Karamat Husain and Hasan Imam, Nawab Ishaq Khan, Justice Abdur Rahim, etc., were absent. It declares that those present were chiefly young men, lawyers, school-masters and students as well as a large number of officials who were "seemingly amused at the puerile pranks" played. It propounds the question if the elders of the community are justified in keeping themselves aloof, and leaving the youthful feelings to run riot. It also asks if Government are well advised in treating this manifestation of a new spirit as unworthy of serious consideration. It deduces a lesson from the history of political agitation in Bengal where constitutional methods quickly degenerated into a revolutionary propaganda, so much so that the very originators of the agitation, like Arabindo Ghose and B. C. Pal, quailed before the campaign of terrorism, a campaign which is still going on. It ascribes the change in the attitude of the Musalmans to the teachings of such men as Mr. Gandhi and Mr. B. C. Pal who maintain that Government are apt to temporise with those who stand up for their rights. The paper concludes the article with the following appeal:—"We earnestly appeal to Government who have taken such a keen and generous interest in the progress of the Musalmans and also to the elders of the community to give this matter their serious thought.......... What we say is that they should not be allowed to fall a prey to those wirepullers who have been the cause of the ruin of the Hindu youths. If our own leaders will get disgusted with their pranks and leave them to themselves they would be beguiled by those who are and have been stalking their prey. The most dangerous thing is that even students have been beguiled into political agitation so that the course of education on which depends the life and death of the community is being retarded. The Moslem University reposes in the limbo of oblivion and all the educational questions have been pushed behind the political arena. If this state of things is allowed to go on there is serious danger of a retrograde movement taking place of the progress which we and the Government so anxiously desire."

Comments on the decision of Government to discontinue the Blue Book Quarterly.
Message (6), 13th Jan.

12. "The decision of the Local Government to discontinue the publication of the Blue Book Quarterly does not certainly reflect much credit on the ability or capacity of those who were entrusted with the task. Member after member of that Corps d'elite, the Indian Civil Service, was tried in the post of editor and found wanting. The publication, however well conceived, failed to appeal to the mass of the average readers for the simple reason that its contents savoured too much of the larger official publications, being often mere unintelligible, undigested cuttings from them.......... Owing to its unreadable character, the average educated class of people would not subscribe to it in any appreciable number. After two years and a half of experience, instead of deciding to discontinue publication, we think it would have been far better if Government had decided to effect a change in the editorial arrangement and enturst it to a board of competent city journalists."

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

13. "During the two years and a half of its life the Quarterly supplied a badly felt want to all taking an interest in administrative problems. It used to supply in a succinct form information regarding the working of the different administrative departments...... ... We cannot but regret this decision of Government. It is a pity indeed that there should not have been an adequate number of subscribers. But Government publications should not be run on business lines, but only with the one consideration of public advantage. It is possible that in these times of hightened paper cost the expenditure has been very heavy. We sincerely trust, however, that when normal times return again, the Bombay Government will be pleased to publish afresh that useful publication."

The new British and Indian War Loans.
Sánj Vartamán (29), 18th and 19th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 20th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 18th Jan.

14. Writing about the British War Loan and the appeal made by the Times of India to Indians generally to subscribe to it, the Sánj Vartamán remarks that it has nothing but praise to bestow on the laudable efforts of its contemporary in this matter; and while it appeals to Rajas, Maharajas, the wealthy and the big merchants of all communities to subscribe to the loan to the best of their ability, it thinks it would be a grave mistake to expect that the Indians generally will help the loan, for the bulk of the people are so poor that they cannot afford to purchase even a single note worth £95. The paper then dwells on the great help Indians have given, in spite of their poverty, by contributing to the war funds and in other ways, and concludes as follows:—It is easy to say that Indians should contribute to the British War Loan, but India being a poor country on the whole, none except a few rich men and the Ruling Chiefs can render any help in the matter. However, India has rendered substantial help to Government during this war out of all proportions to her abilities, and accepting the advice of the Secretary of State, she has also refrained from borrowing in the London market. We have no doubt that the rich and well-to-do will readily subscribe to the war loan but it must be admitted that a large majority of the population is so poor to think of doing anything in the matter. [In the subsequent issue the paper welcomes the new war loan proposed to be issued by the Government of India and exhorts the rich and well-to-do to show their loyalty to the country and the Empire by freely subscribing to it. The Praja Mitra and Pársi, while welcoming the new Indian War Loan, expresses fear that the high rate of interest offered for it will adversely affect the other Government loans already in the market. The Dnyán Prakásh writes: From the commercial point of view, the British War Loan will prove one of the best investments for Indians. It is true that India stands badly in need of capital for herself at present, but at the same time, it being our bounden duty to help England to the utmost of our power to carry on the war, we hope our millionaires will come forward to take up the Loan.]

Comments on the proposal to raise a double company of educated Punjabis.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 15th Jan.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 14th Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 15th Jan.

15. The Bombay Samáchár expresses its appreciation of the step taken by the Punjab Government to invite educated Punjabis to form a double company. It expresses hope that the absence of special facilities will not deter the educated youth of Punjáb from coming forward to prove their loyalty to their King-Emperor on the field of battle. It believes the experiment, if it proves a success, will induce Government to admit educated Indians to the army and to throw open the commissioned ranks to them. It asks the Governments of other provinces to follow the example of the Punjáb Government. [The Shri Venkateshwar writes in a somewhat similar strain. The Akhbár-e-Islám dwells upon the advisability of raising a regiment from the able bodied and stalwart Muhammadans who are acting as parasites upon society and asks the educated Muhammadans to impress upon their backward brethren the duty they owe to the King and the Empire and to induce them to join the ranks with a view to bringing the Germans to their knees.]

Comments on the failure to raise the Brahmin Company.

Din Mitra (89), 10th Jan.

16. Referring to the regret expressed by the Kesari at the total failure to raise the company of Deccani and Konkani Brahmins sanctioned by Government, the Din Mitra says that it is glad to find the pretensions to military spirit put forth by the Brahmins so thoroughly exposed. It remarks that so long as Brahmins were debarred from joining the army, they had ground to raise loud complaints against Government for the injustice of the prohibition, and it furnished a fine opportunity for them to abuse the authorities. But now they can no longer do so. It rejects the claims of the Brahmins to the possession of military spirit and declares that they never had it before as a community nor do they possess it now. It goes on:—If the Kesari is really sorry at the failure to form the Brahmin Company why have not its conductors delivered even a single speech to urge the Brahmins to join it, while lectures after lectures are being delivered in favour of Home Rule? The fact is that the Brahmins, barring a few exceptions, have never exhibited the courage to meet the enemy's bullets but have only come forward to claim, by thousands, the dainties of the table.

Comments on the Allies' reply to President Wilson's Peace Note.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 13th Jan.

17. The Sánj Vartamán expresses its appreciation of the reply of the Allies to President Wilson's Peace Note and writes:—The Allies have made their intentions very clear in this historic document. A careful perusal of it will show us that the bigger nations have not asked for any new acquisitions of territory for themselves nor have they expressed any desire of crushing the Germans and their trade. Their demands chiefly consist in the making of full reparation to the smaller States and their protection for all time. The Allies ask for an arrangement by which the larger and smaller States will maintain amicable relations with each other. We do not think that Germany will be prepared to accept the terms proposed by the Allies. The Allies in spite of the present circumstances being unfavourable to themselves have resolved upon carrying the war to a successful issue and they have therefore issued the new war loan as a rejoinder to the peace proposals of Germany. It is now a question of life and death to the Allies and if they agree to make peace German militarism will terriorise over them and they will not be allowed to rest in peace. It would, therefore, be suicidal on the part of the Allies to make peace at the present juncture when Germany has not been crushed, nay, rather when it is in a position to terrorise over other nations more freely than at the outbreak of the war. As said by Mr. Lloyd George the path of success is full of difficulties but the Allies are not going to sheath their swords till victory is gained. The civilization of the world and the freedom of nations depend upon the ultimate success of the Allies.

Reflections on the probable violation by Germany of Swiss neutrality.
Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 19th Jan.

18. The Jám-e-Jamshed extols the bravery of the Swiss people, including their women and, conjecturing from recent telegrams that Germany might, in the near future, attack France through Switzerland, speculates on the possibility of the latter country sharing the fate of Belgium. It, at the same time, remarks that in the event of Germany thus violating the neutrality of Switzerland, Swiss blood will rise to boiling point and the daggers of the brave Swiss women will pierce the hearts of the Germans through and through. The paper then goes on :—But will the Germans really have the effrontery to carry such a serious attack into an atmosphere so innocent? Will the Swiss mountains, whose natural beauties have been so highly praised by tourists, reverberate with the sounds of cannon? Will the shells of German cannon burst in this manner here, there and everywhere? The German has lifted up his head against the whole world! If we are to have faith in the justice of God we will pray that it may soon be vindicated. May the enemy be soon overwhelmed with defeat! The whole world has now, as it were, become terror-stricken!

The Greek menace should be resolutely dealt with by the Allies.
Dnyán Prakásh (34), 13th Jan.

19. Commenting on the position in Macedonia, the Dnyán Prakásh declares that the Allies should no longer delay the final and resolute disposal of Greek menace. It points out that had Germany been in the same position in which the Allies find themselves to-day, the Greek Government would have been nowhere by this time, and remarks that it would be a grave blunder on the part of the Allies to show any more forbearance for King Constantine whose actions have clearly proved that he is only waiting for an opportunity to bring them into trouble.

Is Germany really in the hard straits it is believed to be?
Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 17th Jan., Eng. cols.

20. "It would be almost fatuously silly to suppose that the enemy is unaware of the Allies' intentions and is not quite prepared to meet them to the best of his ability. The past two years and a half have amply demonstrated to the world that the German military machine was and yet is a formidable weapon, and withal very ably weilded by the men to whose care it is consigned. So long as it retains the confidence and support of the German nation—and the nation's confidence in its prowess is still unbounded—no sudden breakdown is to be expected. Even before the German occupation of Roumania, 'the granary of Europe,' the prospects of starving the Hun into surrender were meagre indeed—now for all practical purposes they may be said to be non-existent. The enemy's methods of raising the money required to carry on the war have been—viewed from the strictly moral standpoint of the Allies—of doubtful propriety: yet they have served his turn and the Allies cannot afford to place any reliance on the oft-repeated rumours of a serious falling off in the regular supply, however obtained. The weakest link in his elaborate chain of defences is evidently his rapidly dwindling man-power. Even at a very conservative estimate his losses in men total up to a million and half per year. The number of fresh recruits—mere raw youths of 17 and 18—that he can call to colours every year is approximately 600,000. The German Imperial General Staff are therefore faced with the grave problem of making good this huge annual deficit of close upon a million and, be it remembered, the worst is still to come with the opening of the spring campaign of 1917.......... This—and nothing else—appears to be at the bottom of the frantic but abortive attempts lately made by the Central Powers to foist upon the Allies some sort of an inconclusive peace—a peace that would give the sorely tried Hun some breathing time to replenish his ranks and at the same time leave the door open for him for further acts of aggression at a more opportune moment. This, again, is the distant prospect that has hitherto heartened up the Allied General Staff and has led the British Premier to declare that 'victory may be difficult, but defeat is impossible.'"

Comments on the Viceroy's convocation address at the Calcutta University.

Gujaráti (13), 14th Jan.; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 14th Jan.

21. Commenting upon the recent convocation address delivered by His Excellency the Viceroy as Chancellor of the Calcutta University, the Gujaráti remarks that the utterance is one resounding with life-giving hopes. Referring to the Viceroy's observation to the effect that the want of sympathy with the human element is the chief factor in difficulties confronting the working of the Universities, the paper declares that not only the Indian Universities but the whole administration of the country is entirely unleavened by the public spirit. It then alludes to the Viceroy's remark that he is in "sympathy with those who are stirred by the causes which catch the imagination and rouse enthusiasms" and avers that the imagination and the enthusiasm of the official classes work quite the wrong way in India. It adds that there is no imagination or enthusiasm for Indians in the hearts of these officers but suspicion and distrust for them prevail everywhere. The paper opines that the Indian Universities cannot very well be termed "young" now and remarks that His Excellency would do well to have an independent inquiry made as to why the Indian Universities have failed to produce the results achieved by the Universities in England. It then proceeds thus:—Public aspirations are not allowed to find their reflex in Indian university life but, on the contrary, whenever lofty desires seem to influence the working of the Universities in this country those desires are stifled. In English Universities students can make a close and enthusiastic study of the lives and writings of Burke, Cromwell, Washington and Mazzini, of the history of the American struggle for independence and of the biographies of their own great men; but if an Indian were to make a close and penetrating study of the lives of Pratap, Akbar, Shivaji, Ranjitsinh, Hyder and others, he would be viewed with an eye of suspicion. If the Viceroy wishes to nurture the Indian universities in a really exalted atmosphere such arrangements should be made as would enable them to manage their affairs on independent lines. [The paper then goes on to refer to the Viceroy's remarks about the sacred character of the calling of a teacher and, dwelling upon the great importance attached to that avocation in Hindu religious scriptures and upon the system in vogue in the past in India, for the maintenance by the laity of teachers and professors, inquires what teacher's name has figured in the list of Government honours to to show that his work was appreciated. It further inquires in what shape the worth of learned Indians like Professor Gajjar and Messrs. Roy, Jagdish Chandra Bose and Jadunath Sircar has received recognition from Government. The paper winds up with suggesting the introduction of a policy of encouraging competent Indians by conferring high posts upon them instead of requisitioning the services of English, Scottish, Welsh, Irish and Colonial professors and Inspectors of Schools of inferior abilities. The Kaiser-i-Hind writes in terms of high appreciation about Lord Chelmsford's address and wishes that Lord Curzon, who converted Indian Universities into so many Government departments, had been present among the audience. It remarks that the entire student world will be thankful to His Excellency for holding up before it lofty ideals about the formation of character and the duties of citizenship. The paper then dwells, in a tone of dissatisfaction, on the absence of opportunities for the Indian students to fulfil their high aspirations and, contrasting their condition with that of their English brethren who have careers open to them in the Navy, Army, Parliament and various other channels of public activity, wishes that while introducing the post-war reforms, provision might be made for furnishing Indian students with suitable opportunities for realising the high ideals held up to them by the Viceroy in his address.]

Gujaráti (13), 14th Jan.

22. The history of University Commissions in India is sad reading and the people of India naturally look with apprehension on the Commision that is to be appointed for the Calcutta University. The Universities of Bombay and Madras are not quite differently circumstanced from the Calcutta University and as the findings of this Commission are likely to affect other Universities besides the one for which it is to be appointed, great care will have to be taken in appointing the members of the proposed Commission. The persons appointed on the Commission should be conversant with Indian conditions; otherwise they will suggest something new and fantastical. We would suggest that half the number of members on the Commission should be Indians so that Western methods might be suitably adapted to meet our requirements. We do not think that the Calcutta University ever asked for a Commission. Why then is the Commission appointed? Is the Government of India dissatisfied with the University? His Excellency emphatically declares that questions connected with education should be considered from the view-point of education only. What then is the meaning of his pronouncement to the effect that University life is connected with the social, political and economic aspects of the country? We can hope for no good results from the Commission if it consists of those who have had a hand in drafting the Patna University Bill.

Comments on His Excellency Lord Willingdon's speech on the occasion of the establishment of the Society for the Protection of Children in Western India.

Gujaráti (13), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

23. In the course of its comments on His Excellency the Governor's speech at the meeting held for the purpose of establishing a society for the protection of children in Western India the Gujaráti remarks:—"His Excellency's remarks on the necessity and importance of uplifting and ameliorating the social condition of the masses were as sympathetic as they were sound. But the little political sermon that finds a place in Lord Willingdon's speech was perhaps a little out of place. His Excellency seems to imagine that Indian politicians are not sensible of the supreme importance of bettering the lot of the poor and the fallen and distressed. Let us, however, note one or two facts nearer home and ask what they mean. The numerous and indignant complaints that have been made against the way the affairs of the Improvement Trust have been carried to the neglect of the primary purpose of improving the disgraceful slums in Bombay for which the Trust was avowedly founded, show that the blame does not lie with the people alone. The problem of social improvement has important ecomomic, hygienic and educational aspects. The Indian politicians have over and over again made very reasonable and earnest proposals for the extension of primary education. If they have not been listened to and India lags behind all countries in the world under civilised rule in the matter of education, they are not to blame and do not need be told that they should ask for reasonable political changes, when they want to be placed in a situation in which they can effectively help themselves. The incident related by Sir Narayan Chandavarkar is an illuminating and most suggestive commentary upon the little political homily read by His Excellency to the Indian political reformers, of course with the best of intentions and motives. His Excellency, like most of his specially well-circumstanced and self-admiring countrymen in India, can never fully realise where the shoe pinches. But there lies the whole rub. We will, however, let His Excellency's well-meaning political sermon alone in presence of the beneficent movement of which His Excellency and Lady Willingdon have become generous patrons."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 19th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 17th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 18th Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 20th Jan.

24. Referring to the proceedings of the public meeting of Bombay citizens held on the 16th instant for the purpose of establishing a Society for the Protection of Children in Western India, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that the sympathy expressed by His Excellency Lord Willingdon for the working classes shows the depth of the affection and regard he cherishes for them. It hopes that the advice given by His Excellency to the employers of labour to pay more satisfactory wages to their workmen, to provide their children with adequate educational facilities and to provide sanitary dwellings for them will receive their careful attention. It maintains that these employers of labour and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and similar other societies should come forward to help this new Society for the Protection of Children pecuniarily and in other ways. The paper believes that the Society has started under happy auspices and hopes that since it has received the approval of Their Excellencies, Lord and Lady

Willingdon, it will not fail to secure Government support in due proportions. [The Sánj Vartamán fully endorses the view expressed by Lord Willingdon to the effect that the working classes in Bombay live in conditions of great squalor and wretchedness and are nearly always in debt and consequently inquires, whether, under these circumstances, there was greater necessity for improving these people's abodes or for widening the Parel Road at an expense of eighty lakhs of rupees. The paper is also doubtful whether the suggestions made by the Governor to the millowners to bring about an improvement in the condition of their employés will produce the desired effect upon them. The Praja Mitra and Pársi remarks that the love His Excellency has for children and the experience he has gained of the conditions in which the children of the working classes are brought up guarantee the success of the Society that has been newly brought into being. While supporting the measures the Governor has suggested for the amelioration of the condition of the labouring classes, viz., improvement in their educational facilities and in the sanitary conditions of their dwellings, the paper suggests that Government should co-operate with the public in bringing about the desired results. According to it the people sincerely wish that Government may, by means of legislation, help them in securing for the general public free and compulsory primary education and good and healthy abodes for the working people. The Akhbár-e-Islám is surprised that several of the public leaders in India have not spared for the improvement of the social condition of the people, even a very small fraction of the solicitude they have evinced for the political progress of this country. It remarks that there is a greater necessity for improving the condition of the poor and protecting their children from evil influences than for clamouring for Home Rule. They are the true patriots, it adds, who realise this necessity.]

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

*25. "It is gratifying to find the culture and enlightenment of this great city waking up in the cause of its children. .... We confess we are at a loss to understand why work of this kind should be left to private enterprise and charitable donors. It is, we are of opinion, the primary concern of the State to protect its children......... It is the duty of Government not only to pass remedial measures but to initiate, organise and carry through practical remedies. Speaking as His Excellency did before a gathering of leading ladies and gentlemen, Lord Willingdon may well have spared himself the trouble of uttering such platitudes as that political progress is of no pratical value unless accompanied by 'a determined effort to improve the social condition of our people'. The bettering of the social condition of our workers is certainly a part of the hopes and aspirations of Indians. We would appeal to the Executive Committee to press for all necessary legislation during the régimé of Lord Willingdon and thus afford His Excellency an opportunity of fulfilling his promise that Government 'will do all that it is able by passing remedial measures.'"

The reported intention of Government to continue the indentured labour system for some years more.

Message (6), 18th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásk (34), 18th Jan.

26. "We wish Mr. C. F. Andrew's letter to the Press, calling attention to the news that the indentured system is to be continued for at least five years more in the Fiji Islands, could prove an eye-opener to those who fondly believed that the despatch of the Government of India dated the 15th October 1915 on the subject of indentured labour in the Colonies sounded the death-knell of the indentured system. That despatch is satisfactory so far as it goes, but unless Indians make it clear to the authorities that they are not going to tolerate the hateful system much longer, the system would continue for an indefinite period. The despatches of the Government of India and even Resolutions passed by the House of Commons have often come to be practically ignored, if the ignoring is felt to be convenient...... ... Those people, then, who want to see reforms introduced should take a lesson from such facts and instead of unduly relying on despatches expressing pious whises, strive to make the withholding of the proposed reforms more inexpedient than the granting of them. The scandals connected with indentured labour in Fiji and other Colonies are too well-known by this time to need recital. The system cannot be mended; it has to be ended once and for all." [The Dnyan Prakash says:—If the Secretary of State has himself given such a pledge to the Fiji Government, it amounts to a serious insult to the people of India and to the Indian Government and shows the recklessness and partiality on the part of the authorities in England. On the other hand, if the decision has been arrived at with the consent of the Government of India, it must be said that in according their consent that Government have acted in utter disregard of the interests of Indians and that in keeping the matter confidential their conduct has been unpardonable. A serious injustice has apparently been done to India and our people must protest, with all the strength they possess, against this policy. India is in no way bound to supply coolies to the colonies and it would be utterly improper on the part of our Government to keep Indians under slavery simply to avoid inconvenience to the Colonials. It is but natural that Indians should feel deeply insulted at the way in which the Imperial authorities have acted in this matter.]

* Mahrátta (5), 21st Jan.; Sandesh (103), 20th Jan.

27. "Do the interests of the Colonies weigh more with our British authorities than the interests and honour of the Indian men and women? Has England become blind to all sense of honour and respect for womanhood? Can she not protect the chastity of Indian women which under indenture, is, in some cases, openly and admittedly violated? The calamitous consequences that arise from this are as much degrading to the honour of England as that of India. The world will know that for the sake of a few colonists England deliberately and knowingly connives at the violation of women—a fact for which this very England has unsheathed her sword. The womanhood of the Allied countries is partly protected by the swords of Indian heroes and India feels proud for it. Would then England tolerate the fact that the sisters of the same Indian heroes should be 'allowed by pecuniary temptations and official pressure to be at the free disposition of their fellow recruits and even of the subordinate managing staff' in her own colonies? If the order has been issued, as is reported from Fiji, the sooner it is revoked the better, and we hope that England will stand by us in this urgent demand, no matter what pecuniary losses accrue to the colonists. India will never allow the chastity of her women to be scandalously bartered away or openly violated." [The Sandesh remarks:—Indians may be united in their condemnation of the indentured coolie system, but why should Mr. Chamberlain care for their united opinion? A point for particular notice in this matter is that the Fiji Islands are not like Canada or South Africa whose displeasure the British Government should have to take into serious account. But why should Mr. Bonar Law, the Colonial Secretary, be afraid of India? Even the experience of the war does not seem to have brought about any change in the innate sentiments of these two Conservative leaders.]

Hindusthán (17), 18th Jan.

28. We are sorry to see that the expectations we were led to form by the despatch of Lord Hardinge in the matter of indentured labour have not been realised. We can no longer bear to see the oppression perpetrated on the Indian indentured labourers. We are therefore surprised that Government have not taken any steps in the direction of abolishing indentured labour for the Colonies. We are deeply indebted to Lord Hardinge for his exertions in this matter, but it is a matter for no small regret that the Government in England has given no support to the measures advocated by him. The Government of India could of their own accord have set aside the legislation permitting indentured labour without caring for the opinion of the Colonies. But we are now informed that the Secretary of State has given an assurance to the planters in Fiji that no steps for the abolition of indentured labour would be taken for five years more. We are at a loss to understand the motive that prompted this step. It would be no exaggeration to say that in giving the assurance the Secretary of State has failed in his duty towards India. We hope the mistake will soon be rectified and that indentured labour to the Colonies will be prohibited at an early date

Indians from Portuguese India are treated better than Indians from British India in South Africa.

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 18th Jan.

29. Mr. Polak states that Mombasa and Zanzibar are differentiating between Indians coming from British India and those coming from Portuguese India, and are according better treatment to the latter. What does this mean? Indians, will, of course, draw their own conclusions. It is often asserted that the war has caused a development of brotherly feeling between the inhabitants of the different parts of the Empire and that a radical change has taken place in the Colonial sentiment with regard to Indians. But as a matter of fact the Colonial Governments do not appear to have changed much their angle of vision. The conviction is gaining ground among Indians that all the talk about unification of the British Empire is utterly meaningless and that it would be vain to look for any amelioration in the condition of Indians in the Colonies even after the war.

Comments on Mr. Mallet's report on the working of the Indian Students' Department in England.

Hindusthán (17), 13th Jan.; Praja Bandhu (27), 14th Jan.

30. Commenting upon Mr. Mallet's report on the working of the Indian Students' Department in England, the Hindusthán writes:—The report makes no reference to the allegations brought against the Indian Students' Department in the Press and elsewhere and it may, therefore, be presumed that they are true and well founded. On careful investigation it will be found that the Department, instead of helping Indian students, throws obstacles in their way. A perusal of the report will convince any one that it gives no information whatever about the working of the Department. Instead of discussing the defects and the means of removing them Mr. Mallet inflicts upon us a lecture fit for an audience of school-children. India has to spend six thousand pounds every year for maintaining this Department which tends to do a lot of harm to Indian students. We would, therefore, suggest that the Department should be abolished and the money utilised for educational purposes. [The Praja Bandhu cannot believe that the causes assigned by Mr. Mallet for the unpopularity of the Indian students in England, viz., the failure on the part of some of them to pay back loans and the thoughtless marriages they contract and the immoral lives they lead fully account for their hardships. Such causes might influence a certain section of the English people, but could have no weight with the heads of great educational institutions, who pass regulations prohibiting the entry of Indian students. The fact that, in spite of earnest endeavours, the Department has not been able to effect an appreciable improvement in the lot of the Indian students proves that the main cause at work must be aversion felt by the English people for Indian students.]

Comments on the Bombay High Court's decision in the appeal in connection with the action taken by the District Magistrate, Ahmedabad, with regard to accommodation for C. I. D. reporters in the Provincial Conference pendal.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

*31. "The force of one more concrete instance of the danger that lies in investing executive officers with judicial powers had been added to the legitimate demand for the separation of the Executive from the Judiciary by the indiscreet and insulting attitude adopted towards the Provincial Conference at Ahmedabad. Now the High Court has declared its helplessness to interfere with the order of the Magistrate, which, in the words of Sir Stanley Batchelor, is 'in no sense an order made by an inferior Court.' We feel sure that if the learned Judges had examined the order on its merits, they could not have hesitated to set it aside, flagrantly unjust as it was. It happens even under British rule, with all its rich traditions of justice and fairness, that the whim of one man has the force of Imperial edicts against which there can be no appeal. This is a state of affairs not creditable to the British name and no time should be lost in removing the existing defects in the law which render the High Courts helpless in such cases. The system of administration and the constitution of the services surely need overhauling. The Congress has been consistently clamouring for the separation since its inception. Why should the bureaucracy fight shy of a bold solution in the matter?"

32. "In English constitutional history we read that the King can do no wrong. The executive officers in India, too, seem to be considered in some quarters as incapable of doing any wrong. The Press Act empowers them to take certain steps which cannot be questioned in any court of law. Their authority in that respect is above the law. The orders which the Collector gives under section 37 clause (m) of the Bombay District Police Act IV of 1890 seems also to be above law, for Justice Batchelor yesterday decided that the action of the District Magistrate of Ahmedabad in forcing the Reception Committee of the 16th Bombay Provincial Conference to admit officers of the C. I. D. and give them the suitable places they desired, was an 'executive order' and as such he had nothing to do with it. Justice Batchelor might be right in thinking that the order in question was made by the District Magistrate as Head of the Police and not in his judicial capacity. We understand the distinction, but what we do not understand is a state of affairs in which executive orders seem to be above the law. Supposing a District Magistrate acts illegally as the Head of the Police, is he to be considered like the King whom he in theory represents in his executive capacity as 'doing no wrong.' In this age, we live and learn indeed." [The paper again remarks in a subsequent issue :—" In view of the growing present-day tendency of the executive to interfere too much with the liberties of the people, a discussion of the principal point raised in the application, namely, the right of the executive to interfere with the right of public meetings, would have been highly welcome. Because of a trifling technicality, the High Court declines to interfere and the parties affected go the way they came, none the better or the wiser. It would indeed be preposterous to think that the law ever contemplated that the parties who were aggrieved by executive action should go without relief.......... If every order which emanates from the executive is thus to be placed beyond the reach of even the High Court, under a legal fiction, it would simply mean the end of the people's liberties. This is a matter which should engage the serious notice of our Legislative Councils and if the law is so defective as not to afford sufficient protection to the public, it should forthwith be mended or ended. The possession of arbitrary powers may be good in certain circumstances; but flagrant abuse of it, whether it be the result of ignorance or over-zeal, is intolerable in any state which pretends in any degree to be civilised." The Mahrátta remarks :—" The question was not discussed on its merits and therefore the applicants have no other remedy except asking a question in the Legislative Council which, we hope, they will do through some member of that body. The section empowers the Magistrate to make arrangements for an orderly and decent conduct of the proceedings of a public meeting, but heaven only knows how making accommodation for the C. I. D. reporters on the seats nearest to the dais comes into that clause.......... The High Court's ruling clearly evades the main issue, but it must be settled one way or the other."]

Message (6), 19th and 20th Jan.; Mahrátta* (5), 21st Jan.

33. The evidence recorded so far before the Public Works Department Reorganisation Committee does not go to prove that any good will result from entrusting the work now done by the Department to private agency. If the work is given on contract there is a great possibility of European firms being benefited thereby and there will be no scope for Indians to rise to high posts, which are open to them now in the Public Works Department as Government will fill up the high posts necessary in connection with the preparation of plans and estimates, etc., by direct recruitment from England. It is rumoured that the increasing number of Indians in the higher branch of the Public Works Department has excited envy in certain quarters and has given rise to this Committee. The men educated in the Engineering Colleges in this country are found to be sadly deficient in practical knowledge and Government would do well to make some arrangement by which the railways and the Public Works Department would be able to give the necessary training to young inexperienced Indian engineers. Certificates should be granted to such men and they should be allowed to undertake work on behalf of local bodies. Some arrangement should also be made for the instruction and training of maistris and overseers so that they may be able to do their work efficiently. The distinction between the Provincial and Imperial branches in the Public Works Department should be done away with and every encouragement should be given to engineers trained in India. All efforts should be made to make the training given in Indian Engineering Colleges as efficient as possible by removing all defects in it. We do not think it necessary that high-salaried Europeans should be brought over to this country as Engineers, for it has been found that many of the residential buildings constructed in Bombay on the plans made by European engineers are quite unsuited for the requirements of Indian people. [The Kaiser-i-Hind asks Government to see that the class of petty contractors, with all their technical skill, is not killed out through the system of giving out petty contracts being abolished and the system of giving out contracts degenerating into a means for patronising the firms of "white-skinned" engineers.]

Message (6), 17th Jan.

34. "The best way of promoting decentralisation of authority in matters of public works is to give the local bodies freer and fuller powers and release them from unnecessary and harassing restrictions. Some kind of control may be retained for the Commissioner or the Deputy Commissioner over these local bodies; but the imposition of an intermediary between them and the local bodies is thoroughly intolerable. Then, again, experience has shown that a whole division is too large a charge for a single man, however strong and capable he may be, and an arrangement of the kind cannot be continued without perpetuating, perhaps in a more augmented form, some of the worst evils the Public Works Department system gives rise to. If the resources of local bodies do not permit the employment of a competent Engineer by each, some such arrangement can be devised under which it should be possible to give for each district a qualified Engineer, for whose appointment and dismissal the local bodies concerned will be responsible in the first instance. In these and other directions if the scheme is re-formed and worked into practice, it should go far to relieve the Public Works Department of much of its miscellaneous work and leave it free to devote sufficient attention to the provincial works."

Kesari (95), 16th Jan.

35. A gentleman who attended the Collector's Durbar recently held at Alibág writes as follows to the Kesari:—Out of 125 gentlemen invited about 60 were present. It is to be noted that the honour of invitation is reserved only for persons who are connected with the municipalities or the Local Boards and who play second fiddle to officers in movements such as that of the War Relief Fund. Really speaking public leaders like the Presidents and Secretaries of the District Congress Committee and the Kolába Zilla Sabha should have been invited to the Durbar, but the Collector does not seem to have realised the importance of doing so. The replies given to Durbaris were of the stereotyped character and were all read out within four or five minutes. The Collector then made a speech which was a mixture of English and Marathi. He observed that people being ignorant of the object of these Durbars asked all sorts of irrelevent questions and added that they were not to discuss political questions, but only to facilitate mutual intercourse between the officials and the people. The Durbar, he said, would only take up for discussion such subjects as concerned the district as a whole and not those that concerned a particular village or a taluka. The members present were surprised to hear such an exposition of the object of the Durbar. The President of the Panvel Municipality who wanted to say something about the Collector's explanation was stopped by the Collector. I think that if the future Durbars are to be like the one described above, it would not be worth while to be present at them at the sacrifice of our valuable time and money.

Alleged universal corruption in the Bombay Excise Department and how to put an end to it.

Rást Goftár (28), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

36. In the course of a lengthy article, the Rást Goftár dwells on the universal corruption prevailing in the Bombay Excise Department and remarks:—"Small wonder it is that as far back as 1899, one of the ablest of Collectors remarked to his Chief to the effect that almost every Inspector was found to be in the pay of the shop-keeper and hand in glove with the smuggler, whilst both opposed the people. Such being the record of the past, what shall we say about the irregularities of the present? The question naturally occurs—How is it that no steps were taken in the past to cope with the growing evil? And the explanation is that the greater portion of the personnel of the last few years ago lacked the necessary aptitude for such work; the requisite qualification being a combination of the strength and sternness of the judicial officer on the one hand, and the detecting genius of an officer of the C. I. D. on the other. It must be remembered that the centralisation of all powers—disciplinary and otherwise—in the Commissioner of Excise debarred the Collectors of Districts from taking a deep and real interest in all matters appertaining to their charge.......... A hundred reasons of justice and polity clamour for the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry with the Commissioner of Excise at its head and two members of the I. C. S. to assist him. Such a Commission is, in truth, a matter of imperative necessity. And failing that, the next best alternative would be the securing of a masterful, tried, and trustworthy Special Officer whose will and energy may as with a wand sweep clean every source and channel of abuse. The protecting hand of such an official would save the shop-keeper himself who came forward to aid the Government's cause from an otherwise inevitable persecution; and would enable others among the more or less intimidated to follow in his wake.......... For some time to come, it would seem absolutely necessary that there should be, in the interests of the public, a Personal Assistant to the Commissioner drawn from the ranks of the I. C. S. That service has a reputation for integrity so wide-spread and long-established that the mere name of such an official would suffice to allay public fears and remove all discontent. Again, the powers of District Collectors should be enlarged in matters of excise.......... As regards Assistant Collectors, it is highly desirable that they should not be drawn save in exceptional cases from the ranks of the Inspectorial staff.......... And with respect to the lower branches of the Department, three improvements may be rightly effected. First, the post of Sub-Inspector should be abolished for good. The reasons are obvious; for narrowness in the living wage spells a thriving on corruption and immorality. And the infection spreads. It follows as a sequence, in the second place, that no Excise appointment should fall under Rs. 100 per mensem. Thirdly, all Inspectors who are known to be dishonest should—their long service notwithstanding—be compelled to retire on pensions fixable by the Commissioner.......... A Training School, where young men of means and social standing could be chosen and disciplined for Excise work, is a necessity of the times. Again, all those irksome rules and regulations that at present obtain tend by their multiplicity to bewilder and annoy the shop-keeper folk. Small wonder it is that evasion becomes a habit; and corruption an irresistible craving of the soul!......... Remove the petty bewilderments; define, inculcate and enforce the clean and simple law; and you will as in a trice remove the sore burthens on the rustic mind, enlarge its freedom and its perspective of honour and responsibility."

Liquor shops in the town of Sátára should be removed outside.

Prakásh (102), 17th Jan.

37. The Prakásh expresses satisfaction at the sympathy shown by the Collector of Sátára for the temperance movement and hopes that some practical steps will be taken by him during the next official year against the spread of drink in the district. It then goes on:—We would like to see the liquor shops in the town of Sátára shifted out of it. The shop near the mutton market at least should be removed outside the town, if it cannot be closed altogether. The suggestions we have made during the last year for the removal of this shop have apparently fallen on deaf ears. The keeper of the shop may have spent a good deal of money in constructing the building for the shop, but that is no argument for continuing it there. We understand that the residents of the locality have also protested against the continuance of the shop. We have made the above suggestion now as the time for disposing of the licenses for country liquor shops is fast approaching, and hope that the Collector would take it into consideration.

Comments on the strictures passed on Bombay Muhammadan leaders at the recent session of the Moslem League.

Islámic Mail (121), Urdu Edition, 15th Jan., and (4) Eng. Edition, 14th Jan.

38. The Islámic Mail refers to the strictures passed by Mr. Nabiullah and others at the recent session of the Moslem League on the conduct of those Muhammadans who were instrumental in making the Bombay session of 1915 abortive. It expresses its surprise at the ease and thoroughness with which concessions were wrung out of the Hindus' grasp, and it ascribes the phenomenon to the very opposition offered by the Musalmans of Bombay last year which let the Hindus clearly understand that the pro-Congress Muhammadans could not carry the day till the general body of the Muhammadans were satisfied. It declares that the criticism passed on the dress of some anglicised persons was fruitful in inducing them to put on Turkish caps which they had not done before in their lives. It then speculates as to what course of action the moderates among the Musalmans should adopt. It holds that the moderates have withdrawn themselves from all political activities on one side, while Government is watching the developments of the young politicians' propaganda as a disinterested spectator on the other; and it fears lest the association of some Muhammadan young men with those who sowed the seed of anarchism in past years might induce them to commit some act which might disgrace the whole community. [The paper in its English edition takes exception to the vituperative epithets, such as Hooligans, Budmashes, etc., showered by Messrs. Nabiullah and Jinnah on the Bombay Muhammadans who opposed the holding of the session of the League in 1915. It further observes that every one was amused to see Messrs. Jinnah, Sherif Devji and Mazharul Haque wearing Fezes. Besides inducing the Hindus (with the exception of Pundit Madan Mohan Malaviya and the Hindu Sabha, who, the paper declares, are still opposed to the concessions made to the Muhammadans) to agree to terms which they considered preposterous 'the hooligans of Bombay', maintains the paper, converted the abovenamed persons into Mahammadans.]

Comments on the disaffiliation of the Punjab Moslem League by the All-India Moslem League.

Muslim Herald (123), 19th Jan.

39. Apropos of the disaffiliation of the old Punjab Branch of the Moslem League, the Muslim Herald is surprised to observe that the parent association did not act in harmony with all its affiliated branches. It doubts if the Moslem League can now claim to represent the Musalmans of all parts of India, and it is afraid lest the measure referred to should endanger its very existence. It considers it unnecessary to dilate on the harm which might accrue to the community by a tussle between the two Leagues, for the disaffiliated body, so notes the paper, is determined to carry on its mission on an independent basis.

Comments on the reported refusal of public honours by some Indians.

Mahrátta (5), 21st Jan.

40. "There was a time when glittering titles were assiduously sought after and some gentlemen ignominously licked the dust of the feet of the authorities for them. That time has gone and we now see men doing their work in the country's cause faithfully, loyally and so disinterestedly that when titles shower upon them unsought they decline them coolly and remain content with the pious conviction of having done their duty to their heart's content. The late Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Malabari were men of this type and their example has been followed by the Honourable Pandit Jagat Narayan who declined a Raibahadurship, by Shet Narottam Morarji, who last year declined a Knighthood, and by the celebrated Indian surgeon of Bombay, Dr. Bhajekar, F.R.C.S., who refused a Rao Bahadurship this year. His name was already gazetted in the list and he certainly deserved it. He is loyally doing yeoman's service in one of the War Hospitals in Bombay and an offer of a Rao Bahadurship shows simply the poverty of the minds of the authorities. This apart, Dr. Bhajekar has chosen to remain without it and has shown that his mind is not so poor as that of some title-hunters who work for Government not because they are more loyal, but because they want a reward for the show of their loyalty."

Khándesh Vaibhav (96), 15th Jan.

41. The number of plague deaths in Dhulia is fast increasing day by day owing to neglect in the adoption of prompt and drastic measures at the proper time. No steps having been taken for the immediate evacuation of the plague affected areas of the town, infection has spread to the health camps outside and it is quite essential that the Plague Committee should immediately take steps to pull down not only every affected hut but those on each side of it, to stop further mischief. We would also suggest that the water-supply of the town should be cut off to compel the people still remaining to evacuate it as a large number of rats are still dying in the town. We make these suggestions as there is danger of plague still further increasing in the town. [Elsewhere the paper writes :—The majority of the plague deaths in Dhulia takes place among Muhammadans, who bury their dead in their cemetery just by the side of the Malegaon Road quite close to the town. This practice of burying plague infected corpses by the side of a public road, is very harmful to the health of the town. We would suggest that the Municipality should take immediate steps to close the burial ground and to assign some other plot to the community for the burial of its dead. It is hoped that the Collector also will pay attention to this matter.]

Comments on the objection taken by the Bombay Medical Council to the use of laudatory epithets in acknowledgments of contributions to Dr. Masina's Hospital Fund.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 17th Jan.

42. The Jám-e-Jamshed makes adverse comments upon the attitude of the Bombay Medical Council in the matter of the laudatory epithets employed in acknowledgments, appearing in that paper, of the sums of money contributed by the public from time to time towards the fund maintained for the upkeep of the hospital of which Dr. H. M. Masina is the managing trustee. It entirely disagrees with the view expressed by the the Council that the publishing of such acknowledgments gives undue advertisement to Dr. Masina and thereby constitutes a breach of professional etiquette. The paper remarks that if the Bombay Medical Council, which poses as the guardian of the purity of the profession, believes that Dr. Masina, who is the first Indian to hold the diploma of F. R. C. S. (England), and is a celebrated and an established practitioner of 30 years' standing, seeks to obtain cheap notoriety by means of such acknowledgments, it must have a very low idea about the morality of the whole body of medical practitioners. It observes that if grateful patients prefix the epithets "good," "capable," "sympathetic," "celebrated," etc., to the name of Dr. Masina while making contributions to the abovementioned fund the latter cannot help it, and, remarking that India is not Europe, believes that if the Bombay Medical Council were to insist upon the observance of such strict rules of professional etiquette in the matter of the management of charitable medical institutions like Dr. Masina's hospital, which is maintained at a great personal sacrifice, such interference would operate as a great obstacle in the way of the work of relieving the physical sufferings of the poor in this country. The paper inquires if the Bombay Medical Council will go the length of removing the name of Dr. Masina from the medical register or asking him to close his hospital in case the public persist in making its contributions in the manner objected to. The paper points out that the practice of using such laudatory epithets has been in vogue for the last 14 years and inquires why the Medical Council have waken up all of a sudden now to find fault with it.

Complaint against the nuisance caused by the increase of motor waggon and other vehicular traffic in certain parts of Bombay.

Gujarati (13), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

43. Referring to the heavy increase in the motor waggon and other vehicular traffic in certain streets of Bombay, the Gujarati writes:—"The situation is becoming grave already with the addition of motor waggons and lorries to the vehicular traffic. We earnestly invite the attention of the municipal and police authorities to the enormity of the evils that already exist and of those which are imminent. It is not merely the personal comfort of the people that is at stake, but even their personal safety and health and that of their women and children. It is a crying shame that in a progressive city like Bombay no adequate measures are taken with promptitude to check the growth of these nuisances and remedy a state of things which is a grave menace to the personal security and health of its inhabitants. The fashionable and the more influential classes at once rush into the Times of India, as soon as the roads used by them are a little out of repair, or some innocent people are found to amuse themselves with a little devotional but discordant music. Their complaints are attended to at once. Even hawkers are prevented from plying their trade in certain places, but the noisiest of trades are allowed in others without check or restraint of any kind.......... Both the municipal and police authorities seem to be powerless to take effective measures for the prevention of the ever-increasing noises and nuisances in the native city. May we invite the attention of some of the energetic Corporators and members of the local Legislative Council to the matter and ask them to take up this question and see that the present disgraceful state of things in Bombay is remedied as early as possible and that the taxpayers' and ratepayers' money is applied and distributed in a spirit of impartiality and not diverted unduly for securing the comfort, safety and health of the more influential classes? We also earnestly invite the attention of the Police Commissioner and the Bombay Government to what has grown into an intolerable nuisance and scandal in Bombay."

Muhammadans and separate representation on Municipalities in Sind.

Sind Journal (9), 11th Jan.

44. Commenting upon the movement in Sind to secure separate representation for Muhammadans on Municipalities, the Sind Journal remarks:—"The transfer of a few more elective seats to Muhammadans in the Karachi Municipality or for the matter of that in other Municipalities would not create any hostility on the part of Hindus, provided that Muhammadans are not shown any undue favour. We would very much prefer to have elected Muhammadan members in our Municipalities instead of nominated ones who have to depend on official good-will for their continuance in the same office. The era of co-operation between the two great communities of India has dawned and the reasonable aspirations of Muhammadans cannot but be respected by Hindus. But no step should be taken which would effect a 'permanent cleavage' between the two communities.......... The idea of communal representation in Municipalities has never been countenanced by those who have the good of the country at heart. To put it in the words of Mr. Gokhale, there is nothing in the nature of local self-government which implies any conflict between the interests of one section and another. But the demand of Muhmamadan gentlemen for adequate representation on Municipal Boards can be easily satisfied without resorting to the dubious method of separate electorates. The one method which we have advocated in these columns ere this is the fixation of seats for Muhammadans, the electorate remaining general. This is sure to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of Muhammadans without creating a new barrier between them and Hindus.......... The Bombay District Municipal Act should be amended so as to permit of such fixation of seats, and we trust that the Muhammadan leaders of Sind would be glad to achieve their object in that manner."

EDUCATION.

Question of Anglo-Indian and "Eurasian" education in India.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 14th Jan.

45. Referring to the statement made by the Government of India in connection with the education of Anglo-Indians and "Eurasians" in India to the effect that the total of the contributions made from the public revenues in aid of the European schools in India rose, during the last quinquennium, from Rs. 18 lakhs to Rs. 26 lakhs, the Kaiser-i-Hind remarks that it is improper that a particular section of the community should be thus specially favoured at a time like the present when on account of the war Government have adopted the policy of retrenching expenditure on education. It is of opinion that there is greater need for increasing expenditure on the education of the backward classes from among the Indian people rather than on that of "Eurasians" who should, like the other advanced sections of the Indian public, make efforts to help themselves in the matter of education. It dwells upon the lack of higher education among "Eurasians" and remarks that for the high positions they occupy in different State Departments they are indebted not so much to their educational qualifications as to their "white" skin and to the special opportunities, in some cases unfair, that are given to them. The paper holds the belief that the spread of higher education among "Eurasians" will tend to bring them into closer contact with educated Indians and thereby will result in their being purged of that undue arrogance they are at present found to possess. It observes that since the Anglo-Indians and "Eurasians", in spite of their being born in India, enjoy special privileges and higher salaries than the Indians they should, with the help of their own exertions and means, try to get rid of the stigma of inferiority in the matter of higher education.

Need of scholarship funds and boarding schools for Muhammadans in the Bombay Presidency and Sind.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 11th Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 16th Jan.; Phœnix (7), 13th Jan.

46. In the course of a contribution to the Praja Mitra and Pársi, Momin refers with approval to the advice given to the Muhammadans by the President of the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference that recently met at Aligarh to start scholarship funds for helping the poor students from among the community. He also dwells on the advisability on the part of rich Muhammadans of helping to start boarding schools. In support of his suggestions, the writer points to the difficulties which students from the mofussil who are desirous of taking higher education have to encounter during the time they stay in big cities like Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, Allahabad, etc., and the temptations to which they are subjected of going astray, if left to their own devices, and emphasising the need for starting scholarship funds and boarding schools and hostels on an extensive scale to provide the necessary facilities for poor students, regrets the apathy of wealthy Moslems in these directions. [The Akhbár-e-Islám reproduces the above article. The Phœnix also regrets that no systematic efforts have thus far been made by the Muhammadan leaders in Sind towards the diffussion of education among their community and inviting the attention of the former to Mr. Shafi's Presidential address remarks:—"The spread of secondary and higher education is urgently called for among the boys of the middle and poor classes who cannot take to education without the aid of scholarships. Apart from the Sir Ali Murad, the King Edward Memorial and some other scholarships, which in their way serve a very useful purpose, but are not adequate for the purpose, there is an absolute need for an All-Sind Musalman Scholarship Fund which should be started with the combined efforts of the Muhammadan leaders and the Government. What have the big wigs among Sind Muhammadans done in this direction? Whether they get special electorates or not, the Muhammadan leaders must know that it is education first and education last which will make the members of their community a potent force in Sind. Will they give an earnest of their sincerity in this direction?"]

Complaint about the permission given to Messrs. Macmillan and Company to raise the price of Sindhi School text-books.

Sind Patrika (46), 6th Jan., Eng. cols.

47. Referring to the sanction given by Government to Messrs. Macmillan and Company to raise the price of the Sindhi text-books by about half an anna to two annas per copy with effect from the 1st January 1917, the Sind Patrika remarks that the ground on which Government have given the sanction is, to say the least, extraordinary and has caused much surprise and deep dissatisfaction all round. The paper points out that in October 1915 also, when this firm renewed their contract with Government, the price of paper had already gone up very high, and Government was not bound to show any consideration to the firm at the expense of the poor parents, "especially as too much preference has already been given to this firm by ignoring the claims of the sons of the soil who might have agreed to charge still less prices for the same publications." The paper thinks that in view of the rich harvest of profits already reaped by the company in the course of a large number of years past they could very easily have borne the additional expenditure on account of the rise in the cost of paper. The paper further complains that the fact that the trade discount on these books has been reduced by 5 per cent. will cause a still further rise in the price at which these books are sold to those using them. It concludes as follows:—"We are led to believe that if the above contract had been given to an Indian publisher instead, or if it be offered even new, no such thing would happen. We trust it is not yet too late to mend matters. Surely public interests deserve better consideration than those of an individual firm."

Comments on the discussion in the Bombay Municipal Corporation over the subject of free primary education.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 21st Jan., Eng. cols.

48. "The debate that followed the motion of Mr. Rajaram Tukaram that primary education be made free in the City of Bombay from the next official year disclosed a curious working of human mind. One can understand people like Mr. Vincent 'damning with faint praise' and pouring cold water on such a splendid ideal as the education of masses on the time-worn excuse of financial stringency. But that Congressmen like Mr. Jehangir Petit and others should take up such an attitude is not particularly an edifying spectacle, especially when the Congress leaders never miss an opportunity of having a fling at Government for having thrown out the late Mr. Gokhale's bill. As we anticipated in these columns Mr. Tukaram's motion has tested the sincerity of our civic fathers."

Comments on the proposal to erect a camp for the housing of immigrant beggars in Bombay.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 16th Jan.

49. Referring to the resolution passed by the Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipality granting a sum of Rs. 10,000, subject to its being sanctioned by the Corporation, towards the erection of a camp for immigrant beggars, with a view to prevent the possibility of a recrudescence of plague in Bombay, the Jám-e-Jamshed characterises the erection of such a camp as a mistaken and inadequate measure for the preservation of the public health of the city. It considers the proposal for erecting a camp for the beggars, with its necessary concomitants of providing them with gratuitous maintenance and their ultimate repatriation to their native places to be imprudent and ill-conceived. Do the authorities know, inquires the paper, that if they are sent to their native places, these people will only serve to swell the ranks of thieves and robbers? It points out that though agricultural industry suffers from a dearth of labour and factories cannot secure sufficient labourers even after offering high wages, yet this country has to bear the burden of maintaining millions of beggars. It asks why Government, the Police and Municipal bodies should not, in co-operation with one another, evolve a satisfactory scheme to deal with the problem. It is a pity, observes the paper, that this class of idlers, who are a great burden upon the country, has not been provided with any means of employment. It is of opinion that a body which takes up this beggar question and suggests some effective remedy to deal with the situation will have done a very great service to this country.

The Improvement Trust's duty of improving insanitary areas in Bombay.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 19th Jan.

50. The Praja Mitra and Pársi observes that the statement in the last annual report of the Health Officer of the Bombay Municipality to the effect that the infection of some diseases has spread in the city owing to the influx of people from other parts of the country that are affected with plague and by the arrival of soldiers from Africa and Mesopotamia, is of a startling nature and, referring to the apprehension entertained by that officer that the influx of the former will continue for a few months more, believes that the Municipality will not be able to deal adequately with the situation without the help of Government. The paper remarks that the present situation points to the necessity of avoiding such congestion in different parts of the city as would tend to render them insanitary. It maintains that the Bombay City Improvement Trust was brought into being precisely for this purpose and that it has failed in this duty in a deplorable manner. It is of opinion that the existing state of things calls for intervention on the part of Government who should urgently issue an order to the Trust requiring that body to set aside their schemes of roads improvement and at once to devote their energies to the task of improving such insanitary areas as are suggested by the Municipality. The paper dwells on the desirability on the part of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to issue a warning to the Trust that in the event of the latter failing forthwith to undertake the urgent work above referred to, it will stop making its contribution to the Trust from next April. It believes that such a course will make Government realise the necessity of bringing about a solution of this vexed subject.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the Convacation address of His Excellency the Viceroy at the Calcutta University.

Young India (11), 10th Jan.

1. Commenting upon His Excellency the Viceroy's Convocation address at the Calcutta University, Young India remarks that it must have made the audience feel that this time it was Lord Chelmsford of educational experience on the London County Council and elsewhere, who spoke to them and not any departmental head from Simla. It thinks that the speech will give great satisfaction, but adds that it will raise hopes which, it is afraid, will be hopes deferred. The paper then continues:—"'I have every sympathy' declared the Viceroy, 'with those who are stirred by the causes which catch the imagination and arouse enthusiasm.' We hope the sympathy will last. We have yet to hear of any official person in India who did not declare that he had no 'sympathy' for India. But if the Viceregal sympathy will be allowed to have its way, before another five years have passed away, and we are thinking of a Chelmsford statue to be placed in some garden or other at Delhi, we may hope that prompt and useful measures will be taken to open up these new avenues to Indian talent of which mention was made by the Viceroy. But we need not trouble him so far. Let him really interest himself in any private agency anxious to establish technical institutions, and see that it really gets the desired help in the matter of facilities for workshop equipment, of an assured sale of the products turned out by the students and in similar other directions." [Elsewhere the paper publishes a letter from one Mr. B. G. Pal, who comments as follows on the Viceroy remarks, in the course of his address, about "discontented B. A.'s":—"Is the blame entirely theirs? Have not our faulty system of education, which has never emphasised the importance of the study of technical and scientific subjects and never given adequate scope for their cultivation, and the faulty industrial and economic policy which has never fostered indigenous efforts, have these not something to do with the proclivities of our educated young men, which His Excellency regrets? Taking the profession of teaching, His Excellency remarked that it is only regarded as a form of employment which will keep the wolf from the door until briefs come in or some other permanent occupation be secured. With the highest and most lucrative appointments reserved to Englishmen in the Indian Educational service, third rate or fourth rate though they may be, there is nothing surprising if the teaching profession presents no permanent attraction to our aspiring youths.......... His Excellency is perfectly right in realising the seriousness of the state of things. But the diagnosis was only partially correct, and the prescription is consequently quite inadequate and ineffective. The fact of the matter is that these meaningless distinctions should go and the sooner His Excellency and his Government recognise this the better for all concerned."]

Messege (6), 10th Jan.;
Mahrátta* (5), 14th Jan.

2. The Message quotes the following words from His Excellency's speech 'On the walls of our colleges we could see the portraits of those who had played a great part in the life of the State. We took in the lesson of the past as naturally as we had imbibed our mother's milk', and remarks:—"True, but what is the situation in India? Under what is ironically called an 'atmosphere of pure study,' all the influences that make for character-building and creating responsibility of citizenship have been ruthlessly destroyed. In our schools and colleges, the portraits of those who have played a great part in the life of the State are tabooed and students who love and revere the past as much as the present are censured and even condemned. The study of their sacred books is discouraged and their own religion pooh-poohed and extraneous ones praised and extolled. A student cannot keep even in his own room, without fear of censure, the portraits of Sivaji, Akbar, Tilak, Besant or Surendranath Banerjee and Whenever his Principal or Professor pays a casual visit, he has to conceal them under the table or beneath the bed. He is asked to worship and venerate foreign heroes and heroines, to whom in sympathy, feeling and sentiment he is an out-and-out alien. If in these circumstances, University training and culture have failed to reproduce in the Indian student 'character and responsibility of citizenship,' does it lie in the mouth of anyone to condemn him as a hybrid youth who imitates Western manners and customs without understanding and appreciating them? His Excellency speaks of 'ancient' University tradition. Our University in its modern sense may be young and so it is, and it does not run up to centuries, we admit. But he has overlooked the fact that the Indian student possesses an educational tradition which far excels all the traditions of Europe and America put together and which he still venerates notwithstanding the wet blanket that is applied to the enthusiasm and devotion. Character building and spirit of service were of the essence of all education in the past and had been so until recent times. If the Indian Universities produced in the past some distinguished Alumni it was because then there were no Lord Curzons, no Universities Acts and no 'atmospheres of pure study'. Under a system of so-called 'benevolent neutrality', the religious note was crushed in the education of our youth and if the spirit of devout reverence and discipline, which characterized them in the past, has disappeared, those who planned a lifeless system of education, an education which had form but no soul, which worked with a machine-like regularity but ignored the human factor altogether, should thank themselves for the results......... We are glad to have the hopeful assurance from His Excellency that we shall be able to switch off the overflowing stream of students into new channels of instruction and employment and, further, that he will do all that is in his power to answer the call of the country. His Excellency says in one place that the call to our generation is to educate our people. He would have been more felicitous in his idea if he had said 'Educate your rulers.' With all deference to His Excellency, we beg to submit that, more than the people, our rulers stand in urgent need of education. They have to learn that the educational policy which is being pursued in this country is not only reactionary but in a way mischievous." [The Mahrátta observes:—" If it is desirable that there should be no flaw in the character of our University students, the causes of irritation and resentment which embitter their minds must be removed. They must be treated with the courtesy due from teachers to pupils. Their country and their countrymen must not be spoken of in contemptuous terms. The racial and colour bar which prevents an Indian from getting his due place in the University staff and which places a raw white man over a ripe Indian of acknowledged and indubitable superiority in attainments—this bar must go. If the present system of white supremacy is maintained in the sacred halls of Saraswati, we have reason to doubt if any endeavours on the part of the authorities will serve to turn out from the Universities Indians of a perfectly balanced temper. There will be an acerbity of a more or less virulent character in the mind of every self-respecting Indian coming out of the University. .... Turning now to the desire of the Viceroy to see Indians coming out of the University 'as men ready to take up the duties of citizenship and play their part in the common life,' it is obvious that this desire must remain unfulfilled so long as the students are neither taught as a part of their curriculum, nor are allowed to teach themselves, the duties of citizenship. Do we not know that politics is taboo to Indian students in nearly all institutions? Some old rigmaroles dealing theoretically with political and economical topics, mixed up with some good writing, are no doubt placed in their hands. But how can that be sufficient to make a capable citizen out of a raw student."]

Indian Social Reformer (8), 14th Jan.

*3. Referring to the Viceroy's statement that it will be the policy of the Goverement of India to find new openings for educated Indians, the Indian Social Reformer remarks:—" How the Government of India is going to give effect to this new policy, is more than we can say. There are enormous vested interests to encounter, long-standing prejudices to overcome. There is a proverb in several of our vernaculars that even if God allows, the officiating priest prevents. The Government of India may propose, but the lesser authorites are not easily moved from old ruts.......... We hope that Lord Chelmsford will have the strength of mind to initiate some tangible measures in the direction of the wholesome policy which he expounded at the Convocation of the Calcutta University.......... [Commenting on His Excellency's remarks about the profession of teaching in India, the paper observes:—] 'Why are not capable men taking to the teaching profession? To our mind, the first reason is the slavish subordination which is expected of the Indian teacher......... Independence, initiative and departure from routine, are impossible. No man or woman of some capacity, some belief in himself or herself, some sense of a mission in life, is likely to be attracted to a profession where the first condition of such success as is attainable in it, is subservience and servility.......... Then, there is the question of emoluments. Government are themselves responsible for the poor opinion in which the teachers' profession is held in this country. In no other profession is the invidiousness of the distinction between Europeans and Indians more insistently and persistently brought home to the latter than in the teaching profession. The matter attracted the attention of even such a conservative critic of Indian administration as Sir Valentine Chirol. [Referring to the proposed appointment of a Commission to enquire into the working of the Calcutta University, the paper remarks:—] With due deference to the Viceroy, we must dissent from his estimate of the value of English experts in advising on problems of Indian education. The Bombay University tried the experiment, and we wish Lord Chelmsford heard the opinion privately expressed of his report by many English and Indian Fellows of the University.......... Let us have one eminent English expert, by all means. We may include one or two others from other countries whose conditions, though dissimilar to those of England, are more similar to those of India. We should much like to have an American expert and a French expert on such a Commission. The large majority of the members must be men of Indian experience and Indians. The Indian gives hostages to the educational system, which he may recommend, in the persons of his own children, whereas few Englishmen do so." [The paper further suggests that other Indian Universities should also be included within the scope of the Commission.]

Indu Prakāsh (36),
9th Jan., Eng. cols.

4. "His Excellency the Viceroy's Convocation address does not stray away for a monent from the realities of life and is pervaded by the sole idea of adapting the Universities to the general national environment and developing them into active forces answering efficiently the new call. His Excellency could not in the nature of things discuss the probem in its wider aspects.......... The great ideal of University life, according to His Excellency, is the aspiration to play a great part in the life of the State. That is the aspiration of the alumni of British Universities. As His Excellency observed, the task was a harder one for the Indian alumni as their universities were still young and had not, like the British universities, the traditions of centuries. But is that the only thing which makes the case of the Indian student hard? We ask with all respect but in all seriousness:—Has the Indian student the same prospects of playing a great part in the life of the State as are assured for his British compeer? Can the Indian student, while studying at a university, feel, as his British compeer, studying at a university, does feel, raised and elevated by the idea that after his entrance into the larger university of life he would have numerous opportunities of rendering distinguished services to the State in any walk of life for which he feels he is especially fitted by virtue of natural aptitude and inclination?........ We devoutly hope that as a result of the post-war reforms the scope of opportunities for Indians to serve the State will become widely extended and that as a logical outcome of the happy change, university education will acquire greater meaning and significance for Indian students."

5. "The utilitarian point of view from which Lord Chelmsford surveyed the educational problem of India in his address to the Calcutta University makes it by far the most remarkable speech ever delivered by the Chancellor of an Indian University. Though not devoid of those high and learned sentiments which impart to Convocation Addresses that tone of gravity with which we are familiar, Lord Chelmsford centred his thoughts upon a problem which to a fastidious thinker might appear as a subject unfit for a Chancellor's mission and aims......... With the foresight of a statesman, Lord Chelmsford has seen how discontent spreads in India and where it originates. It is in the want of opportunities for educated Indians to be able to flourish upon some standard of comfort and decency more in keeping with their educational status. Most graciously, His Excellency has declared that the things that obtain shall hold no longer. We commend the Viceroy's address, and heartily wish him success."

Rast Goftar (28), 14th Jan., Eng. cols.

6. Taking an appreciative note of the convocation address delivered by His Excellency the Viceroy at the Calcutta University, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that though it was delivered before the students of the Calcutta University it will be read with enthusiasm by the whole Indian nation. It thanks His Excellency for the assurance he has given to try to open up as many avenues for earning a livelihood as possible to the educated classes and wishes that such a policy may be adopted as soon as possible. In connection with the Commission Government propose to appoint to consider the educational problems of the Calcutta University, the paper expresses its desire that in view of the great need of considering the whole question of education in its different aspects, a Royal Commission should be appointed for the purpose. It hopes that there will be a sufficiently large number of representatives of the province of Bengal on the proposed Commission. It believes that the Commission will prove a greater success if it were to include one or two members from other parts of India. [The Sánj Vartamán emphatically declares that if all officers were to deal with the question of education in the spirit of sympathy, liberality and justice displayed by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, the discontent that has spread in the country with regard to education would disappear. It remarks that the speech is calculated to inspire high hopes, as it shows that Lord Chelmsford is trying to be free from the two defects common to those who examine the question of education, viz., first, want of sympathy and an independent spirit, and, secondly, a tendency to view the problem of education from a political standpoint. The paper is of opinion that a University Commission should be appointed for the whole of India which might lead to innovations enabling the universities to cope with the growing educational requirements of the country and place the university senates, which have become official-ridden as a result of Lord Curzon's University Commission, on a more popular basis. Appreciating the ideals of university life set up before the students by the Viceroy, the Jám-e-Jamshed feels constrained to observe that Indian colleges do not afford students scope for cultivating and strengthening the spirit of patriotism as the English colleges do, and that very few from among the English professors coming to India show any anxiety to mould the character of the students under their charge. The paper observes that it is for this reason that Indian patriots press Government to confer high posts in the Educational Department on capable Indians possessing English qualifications. The Praja Mitra and Pársi regards as valuable the assurance His Excellency gave for making arrangements to impart to students such practical training as might enable them to make the most of the opportunities which the present Industrial Commission might bring within their reach. By way of increasing the present facilities for acquiring industrial training the paper suggests that Government should place their orders for stores required by them with such factories in India as would consent to take up a certain number of apprentices to be determined by Government and further suggests that the law of patents should be so amended as would compel those securing patents in this country not only to open factories in India within a particular period but also to train up in those factories a particular number of Indian apprentices. The Hindusthán hails with delight the sentiment expressed by the Chancellor to the effect that he sympathises with those "who are stirred by the causes which catch the imagination and arouse enthusiasms." It hopes that the Indian students will put into practice the exhortations of the Viceroy with regard to the formation of character and the responsibility of citizenship. It regrets the undesirable condition in which qualified Indian youths find themselves in this country as a result of the absence of avenues for employment and thanks Lord Chelmsford for his assurance to ameliorate the existing state of things. The Indian Loyalist wishes that early steps may be taken to give effect to the desires His Excellency has expressed for effecting an improvement in the condition of educated men in this country and for facilitating the acquisition of commercial training. It points out that, since commerce and industries in India are to a great extent in the hands of uneducated men, Government should give their help in opening commercial colleges, technical institutions on a more liberal scale than at present.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 10th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 8th Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 10th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 8th Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 10th Jan.; Indian Loyalist (19), 11th Jan.

Lord Chelmsford has not fulfilled the high expectations formed of him, on his arrival, with regard to educational progress in India.

Young India (11), 10th Jan.

7. "At the time of Lord Chelmsford's appointment to the Indian Viceroyalty, Mr. H. E. A. Cotton wrote in India that His Excellency had evinced a keen interest in the educational work of the London County Council and that the invaluable experience he had gained there would help him to solve the vexed problem of Indian education in a manner satisfactory to the people. Mr. Cotton considered it a very fortunate circumstance that the Member of Education was an Indian—an ex-Congressman—and that he, with the sympathy and support of a Viceroy who had always taken a keen and active interest in education matters, would be able to initiate and carry out far reaching measures of educational reform. Nine months have now passed away—a long period in the comparatively brief career of an Indian Viceroy—and the country is still left practically in the dark about the future of education, primary, secondary and higher; nay, more, the impending conference of Directors of Public Instruction at Delhi has provoked the suspicion of thoughtful people.......... After the rude shock which Lord Curzon's Indian Universities Commission dealt to public feeling, it is not without justification that people apprehend that there is some fresh storm brewing, which when it bursts forth, may set back the hands of the clock of progress. Alarmed perhaps by the gloomy spectre of this Conference, the Congress spurred itself to greater energy than is usually the case with it on such subjects as education and set itself to passing a resolution, breathing a spirit of thorough determination. The resolution was characteristically comprehensive and pointed."

Comments on Lord Sydenham's article in the Nineteenth Century and After headed "The Danger in India".

Young India (11), 10th Jan.

8. "We hope, as a result of the Triple Entente, an exchange of veteran officials takes place between Russia and England. Lord Sydenham would be an admirable administrator of a Russian province, where the monjik has to be driven into good government, and the intellegentzia have to be alternately smiled into silence or bullied into sullen acquiescence. One wonders whether it is a Russian official who is writing his administrative experiences when one goes through Lord Sydenham's opinions and his profuse quotations from the speeches, he read out to us some years ago, in the Danger to India he has raised in the Nineteenth Century. Our late Engineer-governor quotes with some satisfaction from a speech he made to us sometime in September 1912 how he 'frankly confessed that he could not see colonial self-government for India even in vision because it involved the absolute destruction of all that is most deeply engrained in the life of the people.' Lord Sydenham believes this 'cold douche' was taken in good part. Let him cherish the [illegible]......... We congratulate Lord Sydenham of Coombe for speaking out. Here at least is an honest pro-Consul whose angle of vision has not changed." We await with interest his views on reforms in India with which readers of the Nineteenth Century are to be regaled. But will one of them be, that Indians in order to have the British constituents in their character should be encouraged to be born on British soil? We wonder; if so, we are sure Lord Sydenham will propose "maternity scholarships" to be given to poor Indian families, who have deserved well of the Government. We remember our ex-Governor had some great difficulties to struggle through on the subject, when his Government wrote one of the most disquieting notes on the subject of compulsory education in India. No, the angle of vision of some people will never change—there is so much dust about in this country—both of blind prejudice and of perverted facts.

Mahrátta (5), 14th Jan.

9. Referring to Lord Sydenham's observation that a change in the constitution of the Councils will lead to the 'surrender or weakening of the British power in India', the Mahrátta remarks:—"We are anxious to make it clear that neither the Scheme submitted by the Nineteen nor that adopted by the Congress and the Moslem League has any the remotest tendency to weaken the paramount power of Britain. What it does is something different. It seeks to weaken the power of the bureaucracy. Those who wish to scare Britishers and make them hostile to our demands are of course interested in identifying with Britiain the Bureaucracy in India. But these tactics of our haters cannot succeed in the long run. Representative Indians will soon be in England to tell the truth to the British people......... Lord Sydenham strongly deprecates even 'hints of concessions' in an authoritative announcement. So apparently he tears up and spits upon the pledges and promises given us on various occasions by our sovereigns—as things most impolitic. Do they break the Sydenhamite rule for the East: 'The frankest policy is always the best'? Does the ex-governor charge the Royal Masters of Britain and her Empire with having lied to their Indian subjects?......... Lord Sydenham has, in our humble opinion, rendered himself supremely ridiculous by putting in print the nauseous excretion of his anger-muddled brain: 'In the East, the frankest policy is always the best.' Is the West, then, so peculiarly tempered? Are people in the West specially gifted with a love for swallowing lies? Lord Sydenham is a Westerner and may consider the implication involved in his wonderful dictum a compliment to himself and his brother-Westerners. But we fear, his brethren will differ from him.......... The Statesman encouraged by the letter of Lord Sydenham calls on the Government of India to take measures to stop the Home Rule propaganda. That is in the Sydenhamite line. What is wanted according to these pillars of the British Empire is to stop the educated Indians' mouths and let Britain be 'enlightened' by the Sydenhams and their tribe, and by none else. It is a good plan, if they are tired of the Peace in India and want anarchism to run wild. All who are for Peace and Orderly Progress will hate the programme of these haters of India and we hope that Government will always be wiser than these disguised lovers of headbreaking."

Kesari (95), 9th Jan.

10. Considering Lord Sydenham's position and influence in England his article may well be called the flag planted on the banks of the Thames by the enemies of swarájya. The article will also furnish a rough idea as to the policy which the British Government will adopt at the time of Imperial reconstruction. That there will arise a "danger in India" as asserted by his Lordship there is no doubt, but it will be neither a rebellion nor an invasion but will take the shape of a great agitation in India which will result in universal suffering like the agitation against the partition of Bengal. His Lordship needs no introduction to the people of the Bombay Presidency, and judging from his present article we cannot but say that his narrow-mindedness which he purposely kept concealed from public view while in India has had a rapid growth after his return to England. We gladly concede that his Lordship is in favour of extending education "leading the people onward and upward and smoothing the path to nationhood and self-government". But he gives us no idea as to how long and by what means that education is to be given. Nor does he prescribe the precise form of self-government to be granted to India. He is, however, against giving us the Colonial form of self-government. But it is simply quibbling with words to maintain as he has done that Indian self-government cannot be like Colonial self-government because Indians are not Colonials. The self-government scheme formulated by the National Congress, moreover, falls far short of Colonial self-government. Indians want power and do not care for names. His Lordship expresses his apprehension that the agitation for swarájya, if neglected by the authorities, might develop into an anarchic movement quite surpassing the Irish rebellion. We too are afraid of anarchism developing, but we differ from his Lordship as to the steps that should be taken to stop it. Anarchism is bound to increase if attempts are made to suppress the agitation for political freedom by branding it as seditious. The present policy of Government instead of stamping out anarchism is only sending loyal people to the Andamans for the offence of agitating for swarájya. Lord Sydenham seems to be much afraid of the political agitators, but we can assure him that their occupation will be gone as soon as the rights of swarájya are granted to India. His Lordship observes that "the Indian political party was at first astonished at the generosity of the Morley-Minto reforms"; he, however, ought to know that it was only a particular clique of the moderate party that declared itself satisfied with them. That the reforms fell far short of the requirements is amply proved by the simple fact that the moderate leaders themselves have within ten years put forth tenfold demands. That the Morley-Minto reforms did not check anarchism only shows that the reforms were not sufficient and does not justify the deduction drawn by Lord Sydeham that no rights should be given to Indians as they are discontented. To the objection that several of the signatories to the memorandum of post-war reforms are lawyers, which has also been brought forward by his Lordship, our reply is that an Indian lawyer can look to our interests better than a foreign engineer. There are many lawyers in Parliament and the parliamentary system of Government is not condemned on that score.

Message (6), 7th and 12th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 9th Jan.

11. "Lord Sydenham says that the Sikhs, Punjabis and other martial races of India would not like to be ruled by the intelligenzia in India, comprising the Congress-wallas and the Moslem-League-wallas. We are always told that the masses are voteless and voiceless and yet it seems that men like Lord Sydenham come to know, perhaps by a supernatural power denied to Indians, what is in the inner hearts of the 'dumb millions'. We do not claim to have such supernatural powers, but we can say that an administration which does not allow men who have shown 'conspicuous bravery' and even obtained Victoria Crosses to rise to the rank of commissioned officers and under which a raw youth from England, who has not been to any field of battle, is placed over the heads of veteran warriors—such an administration, we say, has not much in it to make the martial races prefer it to another under which their proved valour and actual experience in the field will not certainly be undervalued, only because of their colour." [In a subsequent issued the paper writes:—"We for our part are sure that the contribution to the Nineteenth Century will be much appreciated by the business Secretary of State, when the time comes for nominating a successor to Lord Chelmsford in the Indian Viceroyalty. Lord Ronaldshay got his Bengal Governorship for his abuse of 'Babuism', and we shall not be surprised if under the Chamberlain regime at Whitehall Lord Sydenham gets the Indian Viceroyalty." [The Dnyán Prakásh writes:—His Lordship may attach as great an importance as he likes to things like Bengal anarchism, Punjáb dacoities and the Singapore mutiny, and disregard altogether the spirit of loyalty shown by India during the war; but that will not in the least help him to undo the pledges given regarding the future position of India by Messrs. Asquith, Bonar Law and Herbert Roberts. It seems foolish for him to oppose the new state of things by resorting to out-of-date and stale arguments.]

[illegible] "We know several of our retired pro-consuls have written off and on disparaging the very people whose salt they had eaten for a long time and whose hospitality they had enjoyed so long. Lord Sydenham threatens to outstrip them all with the virulence and bitterness of his language and the narrowness of his ideas. His contribution to the Nineteenth Century and After reveals him in his true colours if this was needed and shows what are the forces we have to contend with in our struggle for higher rights and privileges. He trots out the usual pleas about the educated Indians being but a small section of the population the majority of which, he alleges, are not in sympathy with them and that they have their real guardians in the official class. Just one instance to show the nature of this scurrilous tirade. 'The Briton who feels no sense of defilement if the shadow of a pariah falls upon him, who will live with the so-called low caste people in the jungle and take food and water from their hand, and who can make the wild tribesmen of the North-West Frontier into soldiers who will follow him to death, is able to draw closer to the real people of India than the memorialists who, in their came(?), have demanded the control of Government.' It is a pure unadultered lie which was amply answered at the recent session of the Congress. We point out all this here to show to the frequenters of the Government House during the Sydenham regimé and the eulogists of His Lordship, before what an image of clay they were falling down in hysterics." [In a subsequent issue the paper writes in its vernacular columns:—Lord Sydenham professes to be a friend of India but in reality is its enemy. We know him full well by the retrograde educational policy he adopted in this Presidency. The object of the article is to decry the memorial sent by the nineteen non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council to Government and to wean the sympathy of the British public from the aspirations of the Indians. It is to be seen how far Lord Sydenham succeeds in his object. [The paper then proceeds to show the fallacy of the arguments adopted in the article and to expose the deductions drawn by Lord Sydenham.]

Comments on Mr. Curtis' Round Table circular letter.

Gujarāti (13), 14th Jan., Eng. cols.

13. "The art of creating or manufacturing, guiding or misleading public opinion has been cultivated to perfection in western countries, and Mr. Curtis' effort to mislead the self-governing Dominions and the British public about the capacities and potentialities of India and her people and to impose on India the rule of the reformed Imperial Government consisting of the representatives of the Colonies is an excellent illustration of the ways and means adopted by such publicists. They pose as Imperialists and pretend to be solicitous for the interests of the whole Empire. But after all there is a good deal of literary commercialism and political and racial parochialism about these literary wanderers. Being in quest of fresh literary and political pastures they are readily accorded profuse and prolonged hospitality by high-placed but reactionary officials and even succeed in getting their co-operation in manufacturing solutions of highly important political problems to the detriment of India. Subordinate officers are prevented from participating in political movements. The poor fellows are afraid of even attending political gatherings of a perfectly constitutional character. They not seldom come to grief for their supposed connection with or participation in political movements that are not in good official odour. But high-placed officers, it would seem, are at liberty to take part in the elaboration of political theories and projects in co-operation with literary adventurers which are strongly disapproved by the whole country. If Mr. Curtis thinks that India is unfitted for self-government or any sort of representation but the very limited advisory form now in vogue, this gentleman, whatever his literary attainments, must be asked to leave the country at an early date, and the officials must cease extending their generous hospitality to such would-be authors and not supply them with official materials behind the back of the people whose hopes and aspirations they wish to hamper with official co-operation and encouragement."

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 9th Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 6th Jan.

14. We are surprised to see that Sir James Meston, the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, has fully associated himself with Mr. Curtis. The publication of Mr. Curtis' letter is very ill-timed inasmuch as it advocates the establishment of the control of the Colonies over India at a time when India is likely to be admitted to the enjoyment of Imperial responsibilities by being allowed to participate in the Imperial War Conference. Sir James has been very careful not to allow Government servants to take part in political movements, and it is, therefore, very curious that he should not be ashamed to take part in a secret political movement working against the aspirations of the Indian people. We hope some honourable member of the Imperial Legislative Council will give Government an opportunity of expressing their views on the subject by asking a question in the next meeting. It is the duty of Government to explain their position with a view to counteract the influence of Mr. Curtis' letter and to enable India to participate effectively in the ensuing Imperial Conference. [The Hindusthán records an emphatic protest against Mr. Curtis' letter and strongly condemns the suggestion about India being subjected to the control of the Colonies.]

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 12th Jan., Eng. cols.; Gujaráti (13), 7th Jan.

15. "Unfortunately, the associations of Mr. Curtis, while he is touring the country to understand the situation, are not calculated to inspire confidence. We should have greater respect for these views, if the letter did not betray Mr. Curtis pursuing his inquiries under constant official tutelage, and in the company of Sir Valentine Chirol, whose continuous residence in India also the letter serves partly to explain. This is the unfortunate part of the affair. We regret, for Mr. Curtis' own sake and in the interest of impartial study, this constant association of his with Anglo-Indian officials and with men like Sir Valentine Chirol, who are definitely committed to one particular side. We still more regret, for the sake of the officials themselves, and of the people's confidence in them, this intimacy of high officials with political missionaries, and their association with views, which, whether politically sound or unsound, are bound to provoke undesirable agitation in this country. We epecially regret the association of Sir James Meston with politics in this form. He governs a large and important province, and so far His Honour has enjoyed the confidence of the people equally with that of the Government of India. It would serve to maintain that confidence, if His Honour were to vouchsafe some explanation. We are afraid it cannot be disguised that the people view with some suspicion the continued presence here of men like Mr. Curtis and Sir V. Chirol. The circumstance that these gentlemen enjoy, not merely the hospitality, but a certain amount of intimacy and confidence with very high placed Government officials, is not likely to remove that suspicion." [The Gujaráti justifies the publication of Mr. Curtis' letter by the editor of the Bombay Chronicle on the ground of its containing views advocating a policy that would be harmful to the Indians. Is it not, it inquires, the duty of people who know about the doings of thieves, murderers or anarchists to warn others? The paper then proceeds to criticise the views expressed in Mr. Curtis' letter and suggests the convening of public meetings to protest against them.]

Necessity of carrying on agitation to protect India from Colonial domination.

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 12th Jan.

16. The New Year's formal messages from Canada and Australia to the Indian Government seem to have much impressed the Times of India which advises Indians to refrain from criticising the Colonies, and to leave all disputed questions to after-war settlement. We, however, hope that our countrymen will not be misled by our contemporary's fallacious arguments to give up their agitation against the proposed Colonial control of Indian affairs. It is a fact of most serious significance, that though the names of several high officials have been openly bandied about by Mr. Curtis in connection with his schemes, none of them have come forward to contradict him. We hope efforts will be made in our Legislative Councils to ferret out the matter. The truth about the Colonial question is that our [illegible] have not yet acquired the mental courage to treat whites and blacks on a footing of equality. There has been a slight opening of the eyes caused by the war, but that process must be completed before Indians can hope to get anything. Our agitation must, therefore, be continued with vigour to safeguard our interests.

Rást Goftár (28), 7th Jan.

17. Referring to the Indian aspirations for swardjya, 'Peabody' writes:—Whether Government confer swarajya upon India or not and whether they may do so soon or at a late date, there is no doubt that the time has now become ripe for declaring whether they intend to grant it or not. A country that takes it upon herself to liberate small foreign States like Belgium and Servia from German oppression at the sacrifice of countless lives and untold treasure, that same country, England, can never prefer to do the injustice of keeping for ever the different communities of India, her own Dependency, in a state of dissatisfaction. Jealous Englishmen naturally do not like that such justice should be done. It is asked, through the medium of their organs, their spokesmen and their flatterers, has education spread among the Indians widely enough to entitle them to the grant of swarajya? It is also asked, where is the martial spirit among them which formerly existed and where is the prowess to defend their country? It is further required, how will the people of India govern themselves when they are not united? These and such other objections are the attempts of selfish Anglo-Indians to keep the Indians permanently in a backward condition, and they have been answered at the last Congress by Mr. Bannerji and Mrs. Besant. If the cordiality of relations between the Hindus and Muhammadans at the Lucknow Congress is not a proof of the unity of the whole Indian nation it may be asked where lay the unity among the English people when a year or two before the war the labouring classes in England organised a general strike? If the Indians are not sufficiently educated whose fault is it? It was the Imperial Government themselves that threw cold water upon the efforts of the late Mr. Gokhale for the introduction of free and compulsory education in India. When the Indians are deprived of the use of arms and when they are debarred from military service, how can they become warriors? All these answers are telling. Every true Indian will support them and will have a longing for swardjya. [Here the writer adopts an attitude of doubt and proceeds.] But—but—swardjya in India should be as firmly established as it is in the Colonies, it should be sound, loyal, powerful and able to prove helpful to the British Empire in a crisis like the present war. Will your Congress leaders be able to make it such? Will they be able to achieve what they talk about? If Russia desires some day to invade India, if the Amir of Kabul creates trouble at the frontier, or if an enemy like Germany—or suppose Japan herself—at some future date brings a naval attack with a view to destroying our ports and commerce, will your managers of swardjya in India be in a position to cope with such situations? Ponder over this a little, be farsighted, and take a leap after ascertaining the true situation. Good Indians, do not take such a step as would make you rue in the future.

India is likely to get nothing for her sacrifices in connection with the war.
Kesari (95), 9th Jan.

18. India has done what was in her power to do for the war. She has given her whole army and borne the whole of the expenditure of the expeditionary force. This expenditure which is still increasing has already amounted approximately to fifty crores. How could England secure the assistance of the Indian army just at the nick of time? Only because it had been kept ready at the expense of India. The force was not necessary for the defence of India herself. It is only to be seen what recompense India is going to have for all her sacrifices. In addition to the above, she will have to meet all the charges for military pensions and for providing new recruits for the Indian army. The Indian people have, besides, up to the present given away thirty crores in cash by way of gifts, etc., and the amount is increasing day by day. Government have also got the advantage of making a free use of thirty-seven crores of rupees out of the currency reserve. We would not have minded this expenditure, but the thought that after the war the Colonies are to get whatever they desire and India nothing, is most disappointing. Poor India! There is no one to appreciate your sacrifices and services!

Description of the enthusiastic reception given to Mr. B. G. Tilak during his recent visit to Northern India.

Young India (11), 10th Jan.

19. Young India gives the following impressions of the journey of Congress delegates from Bombay to Lucknow from the "Diary of a Recluse":—"The journey was interesting mainly for the one event which recurred whenever the train halted, viz., the reverential and enthusiastic reception given to the idol of patriotic India throbbing with a new life. How intense, how genuine and how deep was the devotion of the masses as well as the leaders of the respective places! At Harda, Mr. Tilak was literally buried in garlands. Flowers were showered on him or his carriage wherever the train stopped. All these expressions of reverence and admiration seemed quite natural.......... But in his own words with which he began to support the resolution on Home Rule to-day, Mr. Tilak is not foolish enough to think that the reception given is to him instead of the cause he upholds. And India knows it well. Mr. Tilak is no longer the isolated Maháráshtra leader, but an All-India leader. People of all shades of opinion, all creeds and races seem to hold him in high esteem. Many who come to catch a glimpse of 'Mahatma Tilak,' to touch his feet, to exchange a word of greeting had never seen him before. It is the indomitable courage of his convictions and the plain, fearless expression of his opinions, his sufferings and sacrifices, the selflessness and simplicity that have won for him a permanent place in the hearts of the people of India.......... Mr. Tilak, like Mrs. Besant and other Nationalists, never minces matters. No political privileges were ever given for the mere asking either by pious resolutions or by costly deputations. Those who are holding the power now should feel seriously that our demands are not to be slighted. The first step has been achieved by the union of the two great bodies. The Sikhs, the Indian Christians, the Parsis as a whole must now step forward to identify themselves with the cause of national progress. There is little doubt that the Home Rule League established by the leaders of Young India will sooner or later achieve yet another triumph over the forces that encourage divisions."

Sandesh (103), 7th Jan.

20. "An eye-witness" writes to the Sandesh:—The reverence with which Mr. Tilak is regarded in this country has no parallel. He is looked upon as a god incarnate. The immense ovations which he received at Benares, Lucknow, Calcutta and other places in Northern India prove that people in that part of the country entertain as much warmth of affection for him as those of the Maháráshtra. He was everywhere spoken of as "Mahatma Tilak" and he was so much in evidence at the Congress that if I was asked to describe in one word what I saw there I would say "Tilak". Wherever he went the people reverently touched his shoes and applied the dust to their foreheads. They even took the earth from beneath the chair on which he sat at the Congress and applied it to their foreheads. Muhammadans also regarded him with reverence; a high class Muhammadan refused to enter Mr. Tilak's room with shoes on, saying that it was a "sacred" place.

Government and the industrial problem in India.

Gujaráti (13), 7th Jan.

21. The Gujaráti animadverts upon the exception taken by the Times of India to the statement made by the President of the Indian Industrial Conference to the effect that in the matter of industries India was on the lowest step of the ladder. It quotes paragraph 44 of a report compiled in 1911 under instructions from Lord Morley and gives similar other opinions to show that India has been industrially declining since the transference of the Government to the Crown. It says that the Government of India refused to encourage infant industries on the ground that England was in a position to supply India's needs. It adds:—Can England now supply India's needs? Why, then, has there been curtailment in the railway traffic? Did England really supply India, or did it merely act as a sort of commercial agency? It is to is suggested that the Secretary of State does not take an undertaking from those firms that supply Government stores that they should take in Indian students to give them practical training. Indian industries will receive an impetus only when Government stores are purchased in India itself. All these matters are worthy of the attention of Government. If no heed is paid to them, the report of the Industrial Commission will be as disappointing as the one compiled in the year 1911 under Lord Morley's orders.

The suspension of the sale of India Council Bills and the European mercantile community in India.

Message (6), 12th Jan.

22. Referring to the decision of the Secretary of State to suspend the sale of India Council Bills, the Message remarks:—"It is no wonder that the European mercantile interests which have enjoyed all the benefits of the system at the expense of the Indian taxpayer should feel a righteous indignation at the present decision of the Secretary of State. Not only that; the Finance Member of the Government of India had to run down to Calcutta to appease the wrath of inconvenienced merchants and issue an elaborate press communique explaining the situation. The promptitude with which the fulmination of the Calcutta merchants have been attended to stands in vivid contrast to the wet blanket that has been applied to Indian constitutional reformers and carries its own moral with it.......... For over 23 years the Secretary of State has indulged to his heart's content in these operations regardless of the just needs of India. It has even been asked in some well-informed quarters whether he and his financial advisers are paid handsome salaries for transforming the India Office Finance Department into the Chief Eastern Exchange Bank in London, of which the Secretary of State is the nominal Managing Director. It has been said that the transactions are meant to assist trade. What trade? It is not at any rate the Indian trade that is being assisted. Even were it so, what business has the Secretary of State to keep on interfering with the normal course of trade?......... We have been protesting all these years against the financial juggleries of the India Office and it is one of the principal considerations why we demand Home Rule. If we have Home Rule, like the Dominions, we can manage our own finances not in the interests of London banking houses, but in the interests of our own taxpayers. We can then put an end to the ruinous method of exchange which has been followed by the Secretary of State for a quarter of a century almost, without paying any heed whatever to the feelings and sentiments of the best informed people in this country. The danger is not yet past. The operation has only been suspended for a time and will be resumed according to Sir William Meyer as soon as practicable. It is, therefore, necessary that Indian financiers and politicians should bestir themselves and tell the Government of India and the Secretary of State in a manner that cannot be disregarded any longer that it will not certainly do for the last-mentioned officer to play ducks and drakes with Indian finance."

Government notifications in addition to being affixed in chavdis in villages should also be proclaimed by beat of drum.

Shetkari (38), 7th Jan.

23. A correspondent of the Shetkari draws attention to the fact that in many cases Government notifications affixed in chavdis calling for objections or suggestions regarding certain proposed measures indicated in the notifications pass entirely unnoticed by the villagers as they are mostly illiterate and as they are engaged throughout the day in their fields. He, therefore, suggests that such notifications should also be made known to the villagers by beat of drum and declares that the suggestion if adopted will come as a great relief to the backward agricultural classes.

Representation of India at the Imperial War Conference.

Message (6), 9th Jan.; Sandesh (103), 10th Jan.

24. "The proposal to select the Honourable Sir Sankaran Nair is not unacceptable to the Indian public, though it does not take away the bottom of the Indian demand for the selection of a non-official Indian leader 'of broad, statesmanlike imperial ideas'. In the peculiar circumstances and having regard to the large stakes at issue, we would be fully justified in demanding that both the representatives should be non-official Indians of not only broad and imperial ideas but also of fearless independence. It will not do if, as the Pioneer suggests, India is represented by a European official and a ruling prince! The suggestion of our Allahabad contemporary may be considered as flattering to the high sense of the Princes themselves. But we have the authoritative declaration of their accredited spokesman that the Ruling Princes of India have no desire whatever to interfere in the affairs of India. The suggestion is a mischievous one and is merely an attempt to detract from the value of the representation. Be that as it may, the question is why the Government of India are so sparing of breath in this matter. This is more inexplicable considering the fact that Government seem ever ready, notwithstanding the cry for economising stationery, to dump the tables of the Indian Press with communiques after communiques on the most trivial topics." [The Sandesh remarks that the very fact that the Secretary of State for India has been allowed two advisers to assist him at the Imperial War Conference clearly shows that he cannot represent Indian public opinion. It goes on:—The ignorance of the Secretary of State about India is most pitiable. The poor man is neither in touch with Indian public opinion, nor has he any direct knowledge about the policy of the Government of India. We have no objection if he is given not two but even ten advisers as a remedy for his ignorance, but if the War Conference really wants to know Indian public opinion—the opinion of twenty-four crores of British Indian subjects—then it is necessary that as suggested by the National Congress, the Indian representatives should be selected by the elected members of our Legislative Councils, and that they should be given independent seats in the War Conference. Otherwise, the Secretary of State, under pressure from the Colonies, may give undesirable pledges, against which Indians will have to agitate. Let us see what the bureaucracy is going to do, whether it accepts the suggestion of the Congress or as usual acts according to its own ways.]

Comments on the proposal to raise a company of educated Punjabis.

Message (6), 12th Jan.; Sandesh (103), 10th Jan.

25. Referring to the proposal to raise a company of educated Punjabis, the Message remarks:—"In this connexion one cannot but inquire whether Government will be as ready to give the recruits their due as the latter are to give even their life for the service of the Empire. Even the Times of India has to admit that the scheme is incomplete, inasmuch as the communique gives no assurance that the road to commissioned ranks is not barred to the educated recruits. We are often told that the universities in the United Kingdom have furnished many recruits for the army, but those who are glib on this point fail to add that, though most of the Indians who were resident in the United Kingdom offered their services to the recruiting officer, they were deliberately given no opportunity of serving the Empire, except in a more or less non-military capacity. There is another matter besides the bar to the commissioned ranks to which, we think, we ought to refer. If pay and honour are to be proportional to worth, we do not see why the educated Indians, or even the uneducated Indians for the matter of that, should be paid less than the 'colourless' soldiers." [The Sandesh remarks:—Had Government removed the bar against educated Indians entering the army before this, it would not have suffered from the want of officers as it is doing now, and educated Indians, too, would have shown their mettle to the world. Will our Government take up the question of forming a similar double company of educated Indians for Bombay?]

Sánj Vartamán (29), 11th Jan.

26. The Sánj Vartamán expresses its appreciation of the step taken by the Punjáb Government to enrol graduates and under-graduates into a Double Company irrespective of caste and creed and writes:—The opportunities which are afforded to the educated young men in England, after they join the army, of distinguishing themselves, have not yet been afforded to Indians. They can expect commissions and hope even to rise to the ranks of generals and field-marshals. We hope Government will give careful consideration to the question of opening up the commissioned ranks to the educated Indians who are admitted into the army with a view to inducing them to display their energies and abilities to its best advantage. It has been a standing complaint of the Indians that they are debarred from the commissioned ranks, but now that educated Indians have been allowed to enlist in the army, it is but in the fitness of things that they should be considered eligible for commissions.

England should not help to prolong the war to enable Russia to secure the Dardanelles and thereby endanger the route to India.

Gujaráti (13), 14th Jan.

*27. Both the Allies and the Central Powers declare that they are prompted by honest motives in prosecuting the war. The Allies say that they are fighting for the peace of Europe and for maintaining the existence and independence of the smaller States. At the commencement of the war, Russia declared that she was fighting for the existence of the Slav people and there was some force in this as the Serbians belong to the Slav race. But now the angle of vision of the Russians seems to have undergone a change. The English papers recently to hand make an announcement to the effect that a new arrangement has been arrived at with respect to the Dardanelles and that the Allies have agreed to hand it over to Russia, and that the Russian Minister announced the fact in the Duma on the 2nd December as having been arrived at in the year 1915, with a view to making it clear why Russia is pouring out her blood in the war. France and England, who were fighting for the existence of the small States and nations, might not at first have been aware of Russia's intentions with regard to the Dardanelles, for at one time France and England stoutly opposed Russia's ambitions to secure the control of the Straits. The Mediterranean forms part of the shortest and easiest route for communication between England and India, and it would not be a wise step to allow a mighty Power like Russia to possess a port near this direct route from England to India. England should, therefore, not help in prolonging the war. The people of India hope that England will not commit the mistake of allowing Russia to extend or strengthen her possessions in Asia. We hope the Secretary of State will not fail to draw the attention of the Imperial Conference to this matter while discussing the question of the defence of the Empire.

Comments on the proceedings of the Indian National Congress.

Subodh Patrika (39), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.

28. "We cannot pretend to say that the language used by Mr. Tilak in supporting the self-government resolution in the Congress meeting was the happiest that could have been used under the circumstances. But there is one point in his speech to which we would like to particularly refer. Mr. Tilak appealed to young men to devote all their energy, all their enthusiasm and all their resolution to the cause of self-government. He asked them to do this whole-heartedly 'so that by 1918, they might meet somewhere in India under the banner of self-rule!' It is doubtful whether 1918 would bring in self-rule, but the necessity of working whole-heartedly for a cause which is worth having cannot be denied. We have grown so much accustomed to an annual three days' activity in the cause of the political advancement of the country that such an appeal was urgently needed. We trust that the self-rule activity will be carried on on rational lines throughout the year. We are neither political idealists nor dreamers, but while on this subject of self-rule or home rule, as some prefer to call it, we must express a hope that men in authority will wisely guide and foster this movement and not say or do anything which is calculated to throw cold water on these right and cherished aspirations of the people of this country. No one who has the interest of India at heart expects any violent political developments or catastrophic changes in the administration of the country. But to say that 'the home rule absurdity is dead and buried' is neither wise nor true." [The paper in its vernacular columns, while admitting the necessity of young men taking part in political agitation, warns Mr. Tilak and Mrs. Besant that if they fail to curb in time the unrestrained enthusiasm of some of their youthful followers, they will have to repent afterwards.]

Sind Journal (9), 4th Jan.

29. Referring to that portion of the address of the President of the 31st Indian National Congress, wherein he emphsised the necessity for the grant of self-government to India, the Sind Journal remarks:—"There is no inherent defect in the Indian character to disqualify us for the task of self-Government, and when even the Philippinos are deemed fit for such a task why should Indians be labelled as unfit?......... Sir William Wedderburn recently wrote a letter in the English Press in the course of which he said: 'Can anybody show valid cause why the good example (of America) should not be followed by the British Government with regard to India? Are the Philippinos in any respect superior to the people of India? Or, is it that the British people are inferior to the Americans in love of principle and moral courage?' The question has not yet been answered, not even by the Round Table group which seeks to place India under the yoke of the Colonies in addition to that of England. The assurances given by responsible British statesmen during the war and the part played by India in the war have roused strong hopes of national advancement, and if those hopes are frustrated the outlook in India would be gloomy indeed. The President has warned England not to treat the Indian problem after the war as lightly as some irresponsible and mischievous critics are evidently disposed to do. We trust such a solemn warning would not go unheeded by the powers that be.......... The demands as summarized by the President have been for the most part ratified by the Congress, and they cannot be lightly ignored with such expressions as 'not yet' and 'catastrophic changes.' India has made up her mind as to what she wants and it would be a grave blunder to put off the reforms indefinitely."

Phœnix (7), 6th Jan.

30. "The National Week at Lucknow, which has just closed, will be remembered as epoch-making in the annals of the Indian National Congress. All glory to the storied Lucknow where the "Aligarh School" Musalman and the "Hindu Movement" Hindu, not to say the broader elements among both the communities, closed in and put the coping stone upon the Hindu-Moslem Entente. The acceptance by both the Congress and League of the scheme of Reform is a glorious achievement in the cause of Indian progress. From now the trumpet voice of United India will proclaim to the world that Indians shall have, without loss of time, a real and effective voice in the administration of their country. The only way in which Indians can possess an effective voice in the concerns of their country has in no uncertain terms been stated in the resolution on self-government passed by the Congress and the League at Lucknow during last Christmas. The significance of the Hindu-Moslem union cannot be lost even upon the Chirols and the Curtises. British statesmanship, true to its traditions, must recognize it. We attach immense importance to the Hindu-Moslem at-one-ness, for without the Moslem joinder it would be doubly difficult to wrest reforms from the all-powerful bureaucracy. Happily for India, the conjunction of events bearing on her fortunes made the task of union and concord easier.......... When a Moslem of the stamp of the Raja of Jehangirabad readily moves a resolution in favour of sending a deputation to England to co-operate with the Congress deputation in placing before the British people the Indian claims as outlined in the reform scheme, how dare the Chirols and their tribe call in question the responsible and representative character of the people demanding the the satisfaction of the Indian claims? But the solution of the Indian problem is not so easy a task as the blatant and youthful Home Rulers would have us believe. By shouting the loudest no real reform can be achieved, nor by traducing the elderly Congressmen who decline to join them in their political tub-thumping."

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 14th Jan., Eng. cols.

*31. The Kaiser-i-Hind thus concludes a lenthy review of the proceedings of the recent Session of the Congress:—"The proceedings of the thirty-first session of the Indian National Congress were undoubtedly very successful and of great significance. If indeed anything were needed to complete the success of it, that was forthcoming in the Ninth All-India Moslem League, presided over by a Mahammadan wholly devoted to the cause of self-government in India—the Hon. Mr. M. A. Jinnah. His presidential address was one that might have been delivered from the platform of the Congress itself. It must rejoice the heart of India that the resolutions passed League were also wholly Indian in character, thus giving whole-hearted support to Mr. Jinnah's ideas and ideals. Demand for self-government, deputation to England, condemnation of the Press Act and the Defence of India Act, and of the internment of Mr. Mahomed Ali—these were the subjects of the resolutions, and which one of them would not be cordially endorsed by every Congressman? The days of Hindu-Moslem enmity are gone, and with them one shibboleth of the Anglo-Indians. May it ever be so! In the Moslem League Session of this year's was heard the siren voice of Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and the vigorous accents of Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal. What a beautiful change in 'the angle of vision'—not the one that is talked about, but the one that is actually realised."

Phoenix (7), 10th Jan.

32. Commenting on the post-war Reform Scheme jointly accepted by the Congress and the Moslem League, the Phoenix remarks:—"This Reform Scheme is the minimum which the Indians must have after the termination of the war. But whether this minimum will be granted is a matter on which it is difficult to prognosticate, for we painfully note that already the interested Anglo-Indian opposition has begun to raise its head. Lord Sydenham, a former Governer of Bombay, between whom and the educated Indians there was no love lost, has given vent to his pent up feelings in the columns of the London Times while dealing with the Reform Memorandum presented by the nineteen elected Indian Members of the Imperial Legislative Council.......... Then we have the Chirols and the Curtises who are scouring the country with a view to making out a case against India being admitted into the partnership of the Empire. It is but certain that when the war is over the Tory reactionaries in a solid phalanx will oppose the grant of the reforms demanded by the Indians. But the Indians are already forearmed for that contingency. As soon as the war is over the joint deputation of the Congress and the League will go to England for agitating for the acceptance of the Reform Scheme. In this connection Educated India, both Hindu and Moslem, will present a united front to the forces of reaction which may be called into play by those from whom power is to be taken away......... In spite of depressing opposition from a large portion of Englishmen out here to the Indian Reform Scheme we hope and trust British statesmanship will not, in the end, belie its best traditions."

Appeal to Government to carefully consider the scheme of proposed reforms prepared by the joint Committee of the Congress and the Moslem League.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 9th Jan,

33. The Bombay Samáchár expresses admiration for the tact and foresight shown by the joint Committee of the Moslem League and the Indian National Congress in framing the draft of their scheme of reforms for India. It fully endorses the recommendations made by the Committee and discussing them in detail, expresses a hope that Government will be pleased to give them careful consideration and to adopt them in course of time with a view to satisfying the legitimate aspirations of the Indian people

Reflections on the Hindu-Muhammadan union brought about at the Congress.

Kesari (95), 9th Jan.

34. The Anglo-Indian journalists certainly cannot be expected to bear the sight of the Hindus and Muhammadans sinking their differences and making common cause in demanding swarájya for India. They are, therefore, characterising the union as hollow. But they should remember that the stars are favourable to India at present, and hence it was that all the attempts made by some high-placed evil advisers to cause a split between the two communities did not bear fruit. The Muhammadans are not a weak-minded people. Before the advent of the British they were rulers of Northern India and Englishmen and Marathas served them as their Dewans and Mutaliks. During the quarter of a century following the Mutiny they were under Government's disfavour and this treatment made them sullen and disappointed. But all the while their political aspirations remained as strong as ever, and education acting like a tigress's milk naturally put new life into them. Moreover, their Khaliphate which had grown powerless has recently improved its position and Turkey, which the whole of Europe had declared to be at its last gasp, has recovered and has risen rejuvenated from its death-bed and is struggling for nourishment. In these circumstances, and at a time when their Hindu brethren are marching forward with the times, why will the Muhammadans sit silent with folded arms? They, therefore, joined hands with the Hindus. The Hindus too showed their good sense by toning down their opposition to their demands for special representation. They also consented to the grant to them of representation in the Legislative Councils in excess of their numerical strength. The Hindus have thus given to the Muhammadans some things at least for which they will be grateful. But what is Government going to give to the Muhammadans? The spirit of compromise has removed all fears of differences between the two communities and Government must now bear in mind that they will now unitedly fight with them with greater energy than before. [The paper elsewhere writes that the enemies of the Indian nation, as a set-off to the union of Hindus and Muhammadans, have got up a new quarrel between Brahmins and non-Brahmins, which, the paper feels confident, will come to nothing in the end.]

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 11th Jan.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 10th Jan.

35. In the course of a letter contributed to the Praja Mitra and Pársi, Momin contrasts the objects with which the All-India Moslem League was originally founded with the object it has now set up before itself and inquires, if the happy termination of the joint efforts of the Committee appointed by the Congress and the Reform Committee appointed by the Moslem League does not mean Hindu-Moslem unity, what else it can mean. He then goes on to remark that the proper duty of Moslem leaders is to put the uneducated classes among the community on the right path and settling the present differences among its members. He considers it to be their duty to impress upon the minds of Muhammadans the desirability of working in co-operation with the Hindus at the time, when on the termination of the war, His Majesty's Government will introduce reforms beneficial to India. The writer observes that it will be principally these two communities that will reap the benefits of such reforms, and the greater the good understanding between them, the more far-reaching will be the character of the rights conferred on India. [After declaring that the establishment of unity between the Hindus and Muhammadans would really be a good thing for India and referring to the harmony brought about between the political leaders of the two communities at the last session of the Indian National Congress, the Akhbár-e-Islám continues:—But does this rapprochement between the leaders mean a real unity between the Hindus and the Muhammadans? If the union between the Congress and the Moslem League is to be regarded as the union of the two communities, we would characterise it as only a superficial union because the Congress does not mean the Hindus and the League does not mean the Muhammadans. It is true that the political leaders of both these communities have arrived at an understanding on certain controversial matters; but can their unanimity be regarded as the unanimity of the two communities? Will the latter be ready to abide by the understanding so arrived at between their respective leaders? Are the Moslem leaders who have come to a settlement with a few Hindus with regard to certain Moslem questions, the trusted representatives of the community? All these questions can hardly be answered in the affirmative unhesitatingly, and if that be the case it is not easy to understand how unity can be said to have been effected between the Hindus and the Muhammadans at the Lucknow session of the Congress.]

Reflections on the proceedings of the recent sessions of the Moslem League and the Congress at Lucknow.

Islámic Mail (4), 7th Jan., Eng. edition.

36. "The Honourable Mr. Wazir Hasan has at last succeeded in fastening his League to the Congress tether and there is great jubilation on both sides on the event. The Congress people rejoice at 'winning over the Muhammadans' to their side and the Muhammadans are happy at the prospect of governing India conjointly with the Hindus. We poor moderates will find ourselves in a fix. As a friend humorously remarked, we played the part of the bat in the war of [illegible] and the beasts and now that the two are united we will find ourselves cut off from both. We had a foretaste of it......... The Congress people refused to admit a representative of this paper in the Congress pandal,........ He was also excluded from the Moslem League.......... But our woes do not end here. We have been assured, as is very likely, that the authorities, too, for whom we have stood so long would not treat us with any great favour when they find that we live in complete isolation from the forces that mean so much in the political life of India. They say that Government will only respect those who have the people at their back; as you lose your influence with the people you lose all your respect in the eyes of Government. .... This sort of sophistry has beguiled no doubt many of us to the extremist camp and it was perhaps responsible for the incredible change in the attitude of that sober and veteran politician—the Raja of Jehangirabad. People were spell-bound with wonder when they saw this great conservative leader getting up to propose the resolution of self-government at the last session of the League. The young boys never regarded him with favour and he was certainly a bete noir with the Congress.......... When he got up to speak, there were dissenting grunts and a few hisses. The young men assembled there expected this veteran conservative leader to denounce their extravagant demands with his usual vigour and energy. But they were simply stupefied to hear words of encouragement and approval and their astonishment knew no bounds when he proposed the resolution about forming a committee to concert measures for the achievement of swaraj. They cheered him wildly and it is said that a prominent European officer who was present at the meeting expressed as his opinion, to one of the organisers of the meeting, that with a few more conversions like that of the Raja of Jehangirabad they (the Home Rulers) would be within easy reach of their goal. A prominent Zemindar Chowdhari—who had gone to the meeting, as he said, to see the Lat Saheb—was surprised at the way the Sahebs took the whole thing. They were denounced for the internment of Messrs. Mohammed Ali and Showkat Ali and their various other measures were subjected to unpleasant criticism. When Mr. Nabiullah condemned the internments, and there were cries of 'shame' from the audience, all those who were responsible for the internments sat silently, gulping down the vote of censure. What is more, the Governor of the Province graced both the Congress and the League sessions with his presence and sat nonchalantly among ex-convicts and suspicious characters as if they were his peers and equals.......... If anything can really undermine the official prestige it is the extraordinary sense of toleration displayed by the officials on such occasions as these. If any thing serves to increase the rank of extremists it is the way the officials temporise with them. It may be called policy or sympathy; it may be justifiable in the eyes of the officials and they may have their reasons for patronising these, what may be called anti-bureaucratic movements, but ordinary people, not much versed in official diplomacy consider it as a sign of weakness.......... We must confess we were horrified at the perverse and bellicose spirit displayed by the youths of the United Provinces. For the session of the Moslem League was mostly composed of the young men from all parts of the United Provinces. No other province took any prominent part. Bombay stood firm to the decision arrived at a few weeks before the League meeting and no one attended the session from our province except Mr. Jinnah and his personal friends.......... All those who have identified themselves in some way or other with extremism or, to be more exact, with the anti-bureaucratic movement, such as Messrs. Tilak, Gandhi, Bepin Chandra Pal, Mrs. Annie Besant, etc., etc., were given an ovation and all those who have stood with the Government such as Mian Mohammad Shafi, Dr. Ziauddin, Sir Ali Imam, etc., etc., were treated with hostility.......... It may be glorious to play the part of opposition and abuse those in power.......... But placed as we are in British India, it would be disastrous to our interests to try to imitate the unruly youths of Bengal. It may frighten some chicken-hearted leaders, but it is foolish to suppose that it will frighten Government. It is possible that our misguided friends have mistaken kindness for weakness and in spite of all that Mr. Gandhi or others may say, it is not safe to twist the lion's tail." [Elsewhere the paper writes:—"The proposal to insert Sir Syed Ali Imam's name in the list of the Vice-Presidents of the Molsem League was hooted by the audience and it required superhuman efforts on the part of Messrs. Mazharul Haq and Jinnah to get it passed. The young men assembled in the meeting could not consider with equanimity the proposal to confer the great honour of the Vice-Presidenship of the Moslem League upon one who had been given an honour by Government. They vehemently protested against it. But Messrs. Mazharul and Jinnah ran to their friend's rescue and the latter won his case as a personal favour to the Lord High President of the League. We wonder if Sir Ali Imam at all cares for the great honour thus bestowed, and it would be a pleasant joke if he refuses it. But there is a humorous side of it which cannot be ignored. So long as Sir Ali Imam was in service and a member of the Government, these very gentlemen who opposed his vice-presidentship of the League were vociferous in praise of his work, and one or two went so far as to say that he was the saviour of the Mussalmans. (This was when he helped the solution of the Cawnpore Mosque Muddle.) But it is just the same in every case. They praise one at a moment and condemn one in the next breath."]

Gujaráti (13), 7th Jan.

37. The Gujaráti makes the following observations on the session of the Moslem League at Lucknow:—Had it not been for the war India's loyalty and powers would not have been appreciated by England and her Colonies. The war has indirectly advanced the cause of India and has cemented the union between Hindus and Muhammadans. But it is the British that must be primarily thanked for bringing about this union for they have given us education and enabled us to take broad views. It is western education that has enabled the Muhammadans and the Hindus each to recognise the importance of the other in Indian polity and has caused the Moslem League to rise to the height of recognising swarájya as the ultimate goal of India's aspirations and thus identifying itself with the Indian National Congress. [The paper then gives excerpts from the speeches of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the League and its President, and adds:—] It is surprising to note the change that has taken place in the aims and aspirations of the League in such a short time. The change is largely due to the advance of education among the Muhammadans during the last decade and the experiences they have received during that period. As the proverb goes, the wearer knows where the shoe pinches and the Honourable Mr. Jinnah has shown where the shoe pinches the Indian in the matter of the administration of his country. [The paper then goes on to quote from Mr. Jinnah's address to show how the bureaucracy have monopolised all power and are unwilling to part with it.]

Appreciation of the bestowal on Her Excellency Lady Willingdon of the honour of the Crown of India.

Gujaráti Punch (15), 7th Jan., Eng cols.

38. "Every one of our readers will be pleased to read of Her Excellency Lady Willingdon being appointed a Lady of the Order of the Crown of India. From the time of her arrival in our midst Her Excellency has thrown herself heart and soul into every movement for the good of this Presidency in general and its women in particular. Since the outbreak of the war she has identified herself with all movements to relieve the sick and the wounded in war and the magnitude of the work done by the various branches of the Women's War and Relief Fund in this Presidency under her guidance and leadership will long bear testimony to her capacity as an organiser and to the noble response which Indian women are capable of giving in times of Imperial necessity."

The New Year Honours List.

Islámic Mail (4), 7th Jan., Eng. edition.; Gujaráti (13), 7th Jan.

39. Referring to the New Year's Day Honors List, the Islámic Mail says:—"The Honourable Sir Claude Hill has identified himself so closely with the Muhammadans in Bombay that every Muhammadan regards him there as one of their own and his distinction will be held with deep-felt satisfaction by the Mussulmans of this Presidency. From the official point too no one can claim to have earned [illegible] little better than he. His career in Bombay was marked by a breadth of view and liberality of opinion which is by no means very common in the I.C.S......... His sympathy for India and his deep interest in Indian progress, his ever preparedness to advance the cause of the country which he serves, his kindness of heart and generosity of mind made him exceedingly popular with all, Hindus, Muhammadans and Parsis......... It is to be regretted that the Muhammadans have come in for a smaller share of the honours than used to be the case. In fact except Mr. Azizuddin Husain, retiring Collector of South Arcot, and the Wazir of Kalat, no Muhammadan name appears in the list of higher titles. Nawab Mushtaq Husain, our veteran leader, Nawab Ishaq Khan, Honorory Secretary of the League, ex-Justice Karamat Husain and many others deserved some recognition of their distinguished services to the community and to Government." [The Gujarāti thinks that there is very little that can be said to be attractive from the popular point of view in the New Year's Honours List. The paper then proceeds to congratulate Lady Willingdon and others for the honours they have gained and adds :—The country's treasury has been depleted on account of the war and we, therefore, doubt whether people will approve of the increase in the emoluments of the Indian Medical Service announced on the New Year's day. It must, however, be said that Government have taken a very fit step in undertaking to supply free rations to the Indian troops.]

Mr. Mallet's report on the Indian Students Department.
Dnyān Prakāsh (35), 12th Jan.

40. Mr. Mallet's report for 1916 does not show that the suspicion with which the Indian Students Department is regarded by the Indian students in England has in any degree diminished. The difficulties under which our students there have long been labouring have not only not been removed, but have actually increased since the Department, for which India has to pay six thousand pounds a year, came into existence. In none of its reports has the charge made against the Department that it has been doing the work of keeping the students under surveillance, been clearly rebutted and this fact has apparently strengthened the students in their suspicions. Referring to the difficulties of Indian Medical students, Mr. Mallet suggests that facilities for complete medical education should be provided for in India and he has also made a somewhat similar suggestion respecting law students. Mr. Mallet, whose duty consisted in looking after the interests of Indian students in England, should not have gone out of his way to make these suggestions. The students who have all along disliked his Department may very well say that Mr. Mallet has been prompted to make them with a view to rob them of the opportunity of gaining a first-hand knowledge of England.

Comments on the evidence given before the Public Works Department Re-organisation Committee in Bombay.
Bombay Samāchār (55), 11th and 12th Jan.

41. Commenting upon the evidence recorded before the Public Works Department Re-organisation Committee in Bombay, the Bombay Samāchār writes :—The official witnesses seem to be of opinion that the existing conditions are not sufficiently favourable to permit of the adoption of a system of entrusting large works generally to private agency. However, there is ground to believe that construction works undertaken by the Public Works Department prove more costly than those executed through private agency. We fail to understand why work done through private agency should not be durable if it is properly supervised. Public Works Department contractors, when they give evidence, will be able to show that works done through them are both durable and cheap. We hope the Committee will recognise the fact that the College of Engineering at Poona is not sufficient to meet the requirements of our Presidency and that many students are refused admission to that institution owing to lack of accommodation. We hope Mr. Wittet's scheme about a college of architecture in Bombay to be affiliated to the University, will be taken in hand soon after the war is over. [In the subsequent issue the paper expresses gratification at the frank and straightforward views expressed before the Committee by the Principals of the Engineering College, Poona, and the Technical Institute, Bombay, about the lack of facilities for giving their students practical training and expresses the hope that some arrangement will be arrived at to give students the practical knowledge they are found deficient in by enlisting the co-operation of private firms to which the students may be apprenticed for a certain number of years. The paper emphasises the need of opening more engineering and technical institutions in the Presidency.]

Message (6), 11th Jan.

42. Commenting on Mr. Sly's opening address before the Public Works Committee, the Message remarks:—"For any but small works, the agency of the contractor is the most unsuitable at present, at least so far as we in India are concerned, and we are strongly opposed to the idea of the state divesting itself of all direct interest in such works. It is a different thing, however, to say that the Government of India should have all authority centralized in it. There must be devolution of powers and except for purely imperial works financed directly by the Government of India, the power of initiative and execution must be vested in the Provincial authorities. The Government of India may retain some sort of supervisory control over the Provincial authorities; but the latter should not be kept in leading-strings. With regard to the second possible line of advance, devolution of power to local bodies, we feel that the time has come when they should be treated more liberally and with a greater amount of respect. They should have power to manage their public works as best they can and beyond advising when advice is sought, the Provincial departments should have nothing to do with them. Local authorities may make mistakes; but the Public Works Department is not free from such mistakes. It is from small mistakes that they will attain to the capacity for success. In some places, a scheme of restricted devolution of authority has been carried out and it would be interesting to consider its lesson in the light of experience gained during the past five or six years."

Message (6), 12th Jan.

43. "Mr. Wittet made a sugestion for the bifurcation of the Roads and Buildings Branch of the Public Works Department, so that the roads and the buildings would each be in charge of a special department. Bifurcation has long been effected between Irrigation and Buildings and there is nothing extraordinary in the proposal to effect a similar bifurcation between roads and buildings. Under it, each will be in charge of men who will not only design but carry out the construction of the works falling within their charge. But before it can be effected, we should have the necessary human material. It will not do to effect division and then go abegging for trained men to Europe or America. The time for effecting any change would, therefore, be when we have the college working for a number of years and it will have turned out a sufficient number of hands to meet adequately the departmental requirements."

Comments on the possible selection of Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee to replace the Honourable Sir Sankaran Nair if he is sent to the Imperial War Conference.

Message (6), 9th Jan.

44. Referring to the statement that Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee will replace the Honourable Sir Sankaran Nair in the Viceregal Executive Council if the latter is taken up for the Imperial War Conference, the Message remarks:—"If the information of the Madras Mail is correct, one would be thoroughly justified in asking why is this craze for retired Judges of High Court? Is not there a single non-official Indian outside their ranks, who can fill equally satisfactorily, if not better, the Educational Membership? It is true Sir Ashutosh once held the high office of Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University and he is as conversant with Indian educational problems as any Indian could be expected to be, perhaps more. All the same, an impression—a rather well founded impression—prevails that he has imbibed too many bureaucratic ideas. Even were it otherwise, it is impossible for him to bring to his work that freshness and vigour of mind, as also breadth of vision, which are the essential requisites of success."

Complaint that the managing khots in the Dápoli Taluka of the Ratnágiri District have not been given assistance to recover their dues from their tenants.

Satya Shodhak (104), 7th Jan.

45. There seems to be much dilatoriness in the Dápoli Taluka in the matter of giving assistance to the khots for recovering their dues from their tenants. Complaints have reached us that the managing khots have not yet been given assistance for recoveries for the year 1914-15. If in Dharekari villages failure in the payment of the revenue instalments is punished with fine, which is recovered by coercive measures, why should not steps be taken to give prompt assistance to the khots for recovering their dues? We hope that the district authorities will inquire into the matter and remedy the grievance.

EDUCATION.

Comments on the Report of the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, for the year 1915-16.

Hindusthán (17), 11th Jan.

46. Commenting on the latest report of the Director of Public Instruction for the year 1915-16, the Hindusthán writes:—The report has been published after nine months of the completion of the official year; six months were taken up in the compilation of the report and Government took three months to accord their approval to it. We thus see how slow the working of the Educational Department is. It is to be regretted that the report slurs over important details and makes unsuccessful attempts to cover up the faults of the department. In explaining certain matters, humorous writing has been indulged in. It is not proper to poke fun at such an important subject as education and such writing is quite out of place in an authoritative report. The report gives no indication of the steps taken to remedy defects. The figures given in the report prove that the expenditure on primary and higher education was very meagre during the year under report. It would be no exaggeration to say that the attitude of indifference taken up by the department towards higher education is quite deplorable. We are extremely sorry to note that only three pages of the report are devoted to University and collegiate education! It is to be regretted that Government have taken no steps to remove the complaint of lack of accommodation in colleges. The only way to meet the situation is to open new colleges or to provide extra accommodation in the existing colleges. Some efforts are being made to open new colleges and we hope the organisers of the movements will meet with success.

State of Urdu teaching in the Bombay Presidency generally and in Bombay City in particular.

Islámic Mail (4), 7th Jan., Eng. edition.

47. "We wish we could accord our approval to the proposal put forward by the Aujuman-e-Tarakki Urdu at its annual sitting at Lucknow, to perpetuate the Urdu training classes at the Ahmedabad Training College. So far as we know this arrangement has in no way been helpful in advancing the interests of Urdu which its organisers had at heart. The outturn of its work has not only been poor but inefficient and what is more in no way proportionate to the expenditure incurred over it. The teachers who have passed from it have not given satisfaction to the public, and even the best of them have not been able to secure public confidence; with the result that, as we have repeatedly said, people are reluctant to take advantage of Urdu schools and prefer private arrangements.......... If the people are really anxious to continue the arrangement at Ahmedabad or to advance the instruction of Urdu, they should approach the City Fathers in Bombay and local boards in the districts to place the supervising staff on a better and more efficient footing. In Bombay the whole trouble appears to cluster round the supervising staff which he said to be wanting in efficiency. In fact it is said that Mr. Bhaiji knows as much of Urdu as we know of the Russian language and yet he is the Inspector of Urdu schools for the City. He carries on his correspondence in Gujarati and we would not be surprised to hear that he writes his inspection remarks too in Gujarati. We call upon the Schools Committee of the Corporation to look to these complaints which are growing in intensity and volume and try to remove the grievances of the public if they find them based on truth and fact."

RAILWAYS.

State versus Company management of Railways in India.

Young India (11), 10th Jan.

48. Mr. B. V. Mehta writes to Young India:—"The need of a united, strong and persistent protest against company management of railways is paramount if the most powerful brakes on the wheels of Indian progress are to be released. Government with all its benevolent intentions and desire to promote our material welfare is powerless to shape its railway policy with a sole eye to the Indian nation's interests. It is subject to the powerful influence of the shareholders and directors of the railway companies whose interests always conflict with Indian interests, and who know only too well how to use that influence to their best advantage.......... The columns of Young India, New India and the Chronicle have made it abundantly clear that in 1881 the Government of India was strongly opposed to company management, but its hands were forced by the Secretary of State to adopt the policy which was repugnant to it and which was fraught with positive incalculable harm to India. There is no ground for supposing that Government will not again protest against company management when the question comes up for decision next year. But Government will again be helpless because of the Parliamentary influence of the railway companies. It therefore behoves the Indian national press, the Indian national associations, and the Indian national leaders to do all they can to strengthen the hands of the Indian Government.......... When disinterested Englishmen like Sir Guilford Molesworth are loudly and persistently crying out that 'the reversal of Lord Lawrence's railway policy of State construction and management has been disadvantageous, and the continuance of such reversal is, in the interests of the people of India generally, to be strongly deprecated,' it is the duty of every person who is interested in the progress of India to contribute by his pen, speech and purse, as far as in him lies, to the agitation for State management."

Suggestions to the G. I. P. Railway to remove the hardships of the third class passengers.

Sandesh (103), 9th Jan.

49. Mr. V. G. Javdekar writes to the Sandesh:—The hardships to which the third class passengers were already subjected before have now been immeasurably increased by the recent reduction in the number of trains by the G. I. P. Railway and the withdrawal of the various concessions. But all these hardships must be undergone without complaint on account of the war. At the same time I would like to suggest that the practice of reserving compartments for Europeans and Eurasians should now be discontinued. If English soldiers take pride in fighting shoulder to shoulder with the Indian soldiers on the battlefield, there is no reason why Europeans should think it a degradation to travel in the company of Indians. Similarly the number of first class and second class carriages attached to trains should be cut down as it is a patent fact that on many an occasion they remain empty owing to paucity of passengers, and the first and second class fares should also be increased. The Railway authorities should also take care to see that recruits for the army travelling in trains do not take up more room than is necessary. It has been found that sometimes a single recruit occupies a whole bench, and all appeals to the guard, station master and the police go unheeded as these recruits are looked upon as guests of Government.

MUNICIPALITIES.

Question of free primary education before the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

Kaiser-i-Hind* (21), 14th Jan., Eng. cols.

50. Referring to the motion brought by Mr. Rajaram Tukaram before the Bombay Municipal Corporation on the subject of free primary education in Bombay City, the Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"This will prove a very testing motion. For the Corporation contains trusted leaders who never tire of demanding that Government should make primary education free and compulsory. It is to be seen if they will come [illegible] occasion, or whether they will play the part of official [illegible] Government pleading 'financial stringency'. We trust these [illegible] rise to the occasion and set a good example to Government. [illegible] credit will be lost and they will be seen to be men who talk more [illegible] they actually do, and who are prepared to spend lavishly, if only the money comes out of somebody else's pocket!"

Appeal to the Bombay Food Prices Committee to take measures to reduce prices.

Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 12th Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 13th Jan.; Hindi Punch (16), 7th Jan., Eng. cols.; Indu Prakásh (36), 8th Jan.

51. Expressing its satisfaction at the reduction brought about in the recent abnormal rise in the price of charcoal, through the intervention of the Food Prices Committee, the Akhbár-e-Islám remarks that the Municipal Commissioner should, as Chairman of the Committee, in a like manner, make all possible endeavours to bring about a reduction in the prices of other household articles, and thus put a stop to the hardships the poor and the middle classes have to suffer at present as a result of the prevalence of high prices. It particularly suggests that a reduction should be effected in the present price of kerosene oil on the ground that while charcoal is a commodity which, to a great extent, the poor people can do without, kerosene oil is an article which is indispensable even to the poorest among them. Under the heading "an appeal to the Food Prices Committee" the Jám-e-Jamshed publishes a letter wherein the writer dwells upon the hardships poor people have to suffer on account of the dearness of rice and requests the editor to take up the question with a view to bringing about a satisfactory solution of the matter similar to that recently arrived at in connection with charcoal. The Hindi Punch and the Indu Prakásh also appeal to the Food Prices Committee to take steps to bring about a lowering of the prices.]

Need of timely measures to prevent recrudescence of plague in Bombay City.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 13th Jan.

52. The Bombay Samáchár congratulates the local Municipal Health Officer on the far-sightedness he has displayed in suggesting the establishment of a camp for immigrant beggars with a view to preventing the possibility of a strong recrudescence of plague in Bombay. It, however, does not approve of the action of the Municipal Standing Committee in sanctioning the expenditure of Rs. 10,000 for the purpose, subject to confirmation by the Bombay Municipal Corporation. The paper remarks that the Corporation should inquire as to whether the Standing Committee could legitimately give such a sanction and adds that it should be settled whether the liability for such expenditure rests on Government or the Municipality and that it is the duty of the party that is so liable to take timely measures for the preservation of the health of the city.

The Poona Municipality's representation to Government respecting the cost of the Poona Drainage Works.

Mahrátta (5), 14th Jan.

*53. Referring to the representation submitted by the Poona Municipality to Government in connection with the cost of the Poona Drainage Works, the Mahrátta remarks:—"The representation will give our readers enough information to form a correct idea of the humiliations which our Municipality has suffered, thanks to the 'courtesy' of Mr. Mandy, the Executive Engineer, supplemented by that of Government. The defiance of rules in an officer of Mr. Mandy's position is highly deserving of censure. But instead of obtaining his well-merited meed, Mr. Mandy seems to have been indulged in his waywardness by the higher authorities. The Municipality is treated as naught by an official who by specific rules was bound to respect it, to send monthly reports to it and to apply for its sanction in the case of anticipated excess in expenditure and deviations from sanctioned plans. And this illegal and discourteous behaviour of the official passes without censure while the 'humble' Municipality is ordered to pay a large sum which it is 'not legally nor morally' bound to pay—to meet the expenditure illegally incurred by the self-willed Executive Engineer. This is, to say the least, highly unjust.

We hope that Government will see their way to examining this scandalous affair in a thorough manner and do reasonable reparation to the Municipality of Poona for the humiliations it has been subjected to for no fault of its own.'

Suggestion for the postponement of the general elections of the Dhulia (West Khándesh) Municipality on account of plague.

Khándesh Vaibhav (96), 8th Jan.

54. The Khándesh Vaibhav calls attention to the prevalence of plague at Dhulia and the consequent evacuation of the greater part of the town, many inhabitants of which have gone to reside at long distances, and suggests that as the triennal general elections for the local Municipality fixed for next month are now impossible under the circumstances, they may be postponed for at least three months. The paper asks the President and the Collector to take the necessary steps in the matter.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the selections made to represent India at the Imperial War Conference.

Mahrdtta (5), 28th Jan.

*1. "The Secretary of State will be no doubt assisted by Sir James Meston, Sir S. P. Sinha and the Maharaja of Bikaner and will learn much from them about the aspirations of the Indians. But is he, like the premiers of the Dominions, bound to put the views of the Indians before the Conference? The answer is in the negative and the three nominees, subordinate as they are to him, must, as was clearly said by Lord Hardinge, 'act in conformity with the policy and the wishes of the Secretary of State.'......... One of the assistants, too, Sir James Meston, is involved in the mischievous Curtis clique and wishes to put India under the yoke of the Dominions with whom we have claimed equality and from whom we have won it.......... Such is then our situation that of the four persons who will be present there there is only one who can sit with the Dominion premiers as their equal, and he is not bound to represent the cause of India according to the wishes of the people. Not only this but unfortunately he is such a man as was not afraid to show a cynical indifference to our opinions when he piloted the Government of India Consolidation Act and the Indian Civil Service (temporary provision) Act through the Parliament! He did not even think it necessary to inform the Indian public about these Bills. A gentleman who can slightingly treat the opinions of the Indians in this manner with impunity can hardly be trusted by the Indian community, and can hardly be expected to present the case of India before the Imperial Conference according to the wishes of the people. His assistants will give curtain lectures to him but will be powerless before him. This, if at all it is anything, is but a mockery of representation. We are therefore constrained to say that by the present arrangement India can be said to have won recognition, but not a true and direct representation.......... Sir Shankaran Nair would have certainly been a fit person in Sir James Meston's place.......... His Hisghness the Maharája Gaekwar of Baroda, who acted as the spokesman of the Princes in their last conference, would have been a better selection than the Maharaja of Bikaner. He would yield to none of his colleagues in faithful loyalty, patriotism and statesmanship; and, added to that, he has got much experience and above all boldness and eloquence.......... We do not know why his claims were ignored. We must, however, be content with having the Maharaja of Bikaner for the present and we are sure that he and Sir S. P. Sinha will play their part with consummate ability and skill, and show to the Dominion premiers that India has as much 'fitness' as they have to deal with not only the Indian, but even the Imperial, questions."

Message (6), 25th Jan.; Sandesh (103), 21st Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 27th Jan.

2. Referring to the selection of Sir James Meston for the War Conference, the Message remarks:—"Whatever his abilities and merits for the task, he has now utterly disqualified himself for it. If Government were not willing to deal with him in the manner his undesirable conduct deserved, was it not at least due to the public that the Government of India should have spared them this humiliating infliction? With regard to Sir S. P. Sinha's appointment, we do not want at present to say much except that the public should be told at once in what capacity he is going to the conference, whether as the representative of official India or Indian India, and if as the latter, whether he is going to occupy the same dignity and exercise the same voice as the Colonial representatives.......... If he is merely to occupy an humble position and have no direct share in the conference it is better that they should know it beforehand, to avoid disappointment in the end. We understand that the whole energies of the conference will be devoted exclusively to one purpose and that is the winning of the war. So far so good. But the question is whether His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner is going to speak for himself or for the whole of the area representing 'one-third of India and one-fourth of its population'. This is another important point which has to be made clear.......... Notwithstanding their staunch loyalty and magnificent help of the Ruling Chiefs, so voluntarily given, they are both in principle and practice the Allies of His Majesty just as much as any of the other Powers are. It may be they are small and uninfluential by themselves. But the present attempt to drag them into the arena of imperial politics is not very desirable, look at it how we may. We write subject to correction, of course; but it appears to us beyond doubt that in dragging them into the Empire politics, Government would be reducing them to the position of a semi-independent landed aristocracy." [The Sandesh writes:—Out of the three representatives from India, Government could have selected one having their confidence to explain their views to Mr. Chamberlain, but the other two should have been of the people's selection. Is it not unjust that Government should strengthen their own side alone and leave the popular side weak? Further, Government have, in making the nominations, not only failed to consult public opinion, but have also taken no account of the people's likes and dislikes. The Dnyán Prakásh writes:—From English papers it appears that there is every likelihood of other imperial subjects besides war being discussed at the conference, including the reorganisation of the Empire. In that case, the Maharaja of Bikaner and the two officials who are going to assist Mr. Chamberlain at the conference will never be acknowledged by the Indian public as their accredited representatives. But at the same time it is doubtful if even such representatives will be in a position to express opinions different from those of the Secretary of State. If they have to follow the latter's lead then it matters little who go with him as our representatives, for from what is known about Mr. Chamberlain, there is no hope of India's side being properly represented at the conference, whatsoever advisers are deputed to assist him.]

Gujaráti (13), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

3. "Under the arrangement proposed by Mr. Chamberlain his nominees will simply give him such advice as he may choose to accept from them.......... Mr. Chamberlain is to be India's direct representative and in what respect he would be a better spokesman, for instance, than Lord Curzon, Lord Milner and Mr. Bonar Law who along with the Premier represent His Majesty's Government at the Conference, is incomprehensible to us. We confess we are not at all satisfied with the proposed arrangement. At the same time it must be borne in mind that unless and until the Conference changes its constitution, the representatives of India cannot be admitted to the ordinary Imperial Conference that is expected to meet later on.......... The principle of the recognition of India's right to be heard had been already conceded and the matter has now advanced a stage further. That is satisfactory so far as it goes and we are thankful to His Majesty's Government for having practically recognised India's right of audience at the Imperial Conference when it meets to consider questions of the kind it has handled in the past.......... As regards the persons selected by Mr. Chamberlain to assist him at the special meetings of the War Cabinet, we do not think a better qualified and representative Indian than Sir Satyendra Prasanna Sinha could have been found.......... The selection of Sir James Meston is not calculated to inspire great confidence.......... Now that he has been placed in a responsible position, we take it that he will falsify the apprehensions that his official association with Mr. Curtis' schemes of Imperial reconstruction has widely aroused. As regards the Maharaja of Bikaner, his selection will be welcomed in all quarters.......... The marked efficiency shown by his Imperial Service Troops in war is a further proof that he will be able to speak on military and other questions on behalf of his brother princes and of his countrymen in India with knowledge, experience and authority."

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 24th Jan., Eng. and Guj. cols.

4. "Sir S. P. Sinha's selection was a foregone conclusion. As a member of the Viceroy's Executiue Council, as Advocate-General of Bengal, and now as a member of the Governor's Council in his own province, he has proved himself to be a very able man.......... At the same time some people would have preferred a non-official Indian; but it should not be forgotten that we should proceed by gradual steps and not per saltum in the evolution of representative Government......... Sir James Meston is reputed to be an exceedingly good administrator, and has some knowledge of the policy of the Dominion Governments and as such will be able to bring about a bond of sympathy between them and India. The announcement further states that His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner has also been invited by Government and has accepted the invitation. Hence we shall have two Indians on the Imperial Conference, one a representative of the people and the other a representative of the princes. We welcome this selection also as a recognition of the great assistance given by the Indian Rajahs during the war." [In its vernacular columns the paper writes in a similar strain, but remarks that in view of the light in which the public hold Sir James Meston owing to his connection with Mr. L. Curtis of the Round Table, Sir B. Robertson, Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, would have been a better choice.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 25th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 23rd Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 24th Jan.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 24th Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 24th Jan.

5. There is no doubt that the Indian Chiefs and their subjects will be glad at the selection of His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir. We have every hope that the knowledge and experience he possesses will enable him to safeguard the interests of the Native States at the Conference. The appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha should be welcomed in all quarters inasmuch as he possesses ripe experience and holds moderate views in politics. The appointment of Sir James Meston will scarcely give satisfaction to a certain section of the Indian public. There are no two opinions as to Sir James' abilities, but some people have reasonable grounds to be apprehensive as to whether he will safeguard Indian interests considered from the Indian point of view. Let us hope that Sir James will co-operate with Sir Satyendra in safeguarding the interests of India at the Conference and that the Conference will prove beneficial to India. [The Sánj Vartamán writes:—The selections cannot be said to be objectionable on the whole. We have every hope that the three representatives will understand their responsibilities and dischange their duties to the satisfaction of all concerned. Both the representatives from British India are officials and the people would have been more glad if the choice of Government had fallen on a non-official gentleman. However, Sir Satyendra is as good as a non-official. We hope the representation of India on the War Conference will lead to its representation on the Imperial Conference in the near future. The Jám-e-Jamshed considers the selections as very satisfactory on the whole. It tries to dispel the prejudice created against Sir James by reminding the public of his sympathetic utterances at the Congress and the Moslem League. The Shri Venkateshwar wishes that some one else had been appointed in the place of Sir James. The Hindusthán also is of opinion that Sir James should not have been nominated on the Conference as he has given offence to the Indian public by his participation in Mr. Curtis' scheme for placing India under the control of the Colonies.]

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

*6. "Although we share the regret that India will have no direct representative on the Imperial War Conference we welcome the announcement of the names of those who are to assist the Secretary of State in the difficult task to which Mr. Chamberlain has been invited by the Prime Minister. The prosecution of the war to the only issue will be the one task before the Conference and it was only in the fitness of things that a further decision had been arrived at by His Majesty's Government that the Secretary of State should have the assistance of a Ruling Chief as well......... We look upon Sir Sinha's appointment in no other light than as a surrender to public opinion in the country and we regard him as the non-official who is to speak out the mind of the country before the Conference officially......... Sir James Meston is a Civilian of mature experience and some sympathy. His identifying himself with the 'Round Table' group has caused much displeasure against him. It is on that account that his appointment is looked upon with a great deal of suspicion."

India's representation on the Council of the Empire will be nothing more than an empty honour.

Gujarâti (13), 21st Jan.

7. The Gujarâti enters into a lengthy disquisition on the causes that have led England to concede the demands made by the Colonies for participation in the governance and defence of the Empire, and adds:—Viewed from any point, the reconstitution of the Empire will dethrone England from her present position and reduce it to the level of a Colony. Will India derive any benefit by having a seat in the Council of the Empire? Should India be represented by the Secretary of State without securing self-government, he will in the interests of his constituents side with the representative of England and thus England will really have two votes. But even if India gets self-government and sends her own representative on the Council of the Empire it is very doubtful whether the Indian representative will be able to achieve anything substantially beneficial to India. No doubt an Indian representative on the Council of the Empire will add to the self-respect of India, though he may not be able to do any good. The self-governing Colonies have been hankering for a share in the Government of the Empire, and they have secured it, and India might also be allowed to participate in it. But neither India nor the Colonies seem to have given a thought as to the price they will have to pay for the privilege they desire to get.

The proposed Indian War Loan.

Praja Mitra and Pârsi (24), 25th Jan., Eng. cols.; Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.; Dnyân Prakâsh (34), 21st Jan.

8. The Praja Mitra and Pârsi declares that the Indian War Loan proposed to be raised during the next financial year will prove successful because it will appeal to the loyalty and patriotism of the people. It then continues:—"The only wonder is why the time of the issue of the new India War Loan should have synchronised with the issue of the new British loan which is also thrown open to the Indian public for subscription.......... The British War Loan will not be taken advantage of, however, by the mass of the people as the minimum price is fixed at £50 and £100.......... It may be suggested to Sir William Meyer however, that the loan should be issued in as democratic a form as possible. Even Rs. 100 which is the face value of ordinary Government paper is too high for ordinary people. The loan must be issued in small notes just as the war bills were issued in England, say of the amount of Rs. 10 or Rs. 15, which a poor man even can invest in by rigid economy." [The Kesari writes:—If the concessions and the rate of interest for the Indian War Loan be not the same as those offered for the British War Loan it will not be substantially subscribed for by the people. To make the Indian Loan popular a suggestion has been made that the rate of interest should be 5½ per cent. of which 4 per cent. should be actually paid and the balance of 1½ per cent. should be distributed amogst the subscribers by drawing lotteries according to the French system. The suggestion is worth trying as there is nothing in it either against morality or law. The Dnyân Prakâsh writes:—Had the Imperial Government declared its readiness to grant India's demands simultaneously with the announcement of the Indian War Loan, the country from one end to the other would have been enthusiastic about the loan. The opportunity is not gone yet. The public hope that the Viceroy will not lose this golden opportunity and will declare at the forthcoming session of the Imperial Legislative Council the determination of Government to concede India's demands. The raising of the War Loan would thereby be materially helped and the Indian soldiers would rush by millions to the battlefield and, crushing the enemy, bring about a victorious end of the war for the Allies.]

Bombay Samâchâr (55), 23rd Jan.; Gujarât Mitra (14), 21st Jan.; Jâm-e-Jamshed (20), 22nd Jan.; Akhbâr-e-Islâm (52), 22nd Jan.

9. The Bombay Samâchâr welcomes the proposal for issuing the new War Loan as an opportunity for India to help England to bring the war to a successful issue and exhorts the rich and well-to-do to subscribe to it as liberally as they possibly can. [Gujarât Mitra writes in a similar strain. The Jâm-e-Jamshed asks Government to make known to the public the terms of the Indian War Loan without waiting for the Budget and suggests to them to make it attractive by offering for it as high a rate of interest as possible. The Akhbâr-e-Islâm exhorts the rich Muhammadans and the trustees of charitable institutions to help Government by subscribing to the British War Loan. It expresses hope that the Indian War Loan will be made as attractive as the British one.]

Gujarâti (13), 21st and 28th Jan., Eng. cols.; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

10. After explaining the terms of the new British War Loan the Gujarâti writes:—The Government of India would do well to make a pronouncement as to whether the controllers of charitable or other public trusts can invest moneys in this loan. Various banks in India have undertaken to purchase the loan on behalf of the Indian people without charging any commission, but it has not been made known whether they will also collect the interest without charging any brokerage. [Refering to the Indian War Loan the paper writes:—The Indian war loan will in no way be less attractive than the British war loan and taking everything into consideration it seems fit that the Indian loan should be specially patronised by the Indian people. Let us see whether the Government of India will allow the controllers of public trusts to invest money in the British war loan. They might say that this is not necessary as the Indian war loan is open to them. There is no likelihood of there being any competition between the two loans as the Indian loan will be issued after the latest date fixed for subscribing to the British loan. [The Gujarâti in its issue of 28th instant remarks:—"The general impression is that the proposed loan is intended to be an extension of the British Loan, and instead of remitting their moneys to London, the Indian people are to pay them down in this country, the interest charge falling upon the British exchequer. What the Imperial Government want is that the contributions to their loan should be large, and the Government of India will, if this interpretation of the message is correct, only collect money from the Indian people and remit the same to the Imperial authorities. Here is a service which every citizen of the Empire is expected to render according to his capacity for the successful prosecution of the war and the Government of India very rightly hope for a loyal response from the Indian public." The Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—"Though she has not the wealth of England, India will not fail to contribute her modest mite and make the Indian War Loan a complete success. The myth of hoarded wealth apart, India has already borne the full weight of her pecuniary share in this war, and if unprecedented efforts are needed now more than ever before, India will not lag behind, and will be only too glad to make all necessary sacrifices."]

How India has rendered pecuniary help to England during the war.

Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

11. The Kesari gives an analysis of the figures connected with the Indian cash balances, the currency and the gold standard reserves and Council Bills and tries to show that India has, at considerable loss to herself, allowed the Imperial Government a free use of her pecuniary resources. It goes on:—A matter for special regret is that the Government of the Transvaal, where Indians are refused even the common rights of citizenship, has been given a loan of over a crore and a half from India's money at 3 per cent. interest, while India herself has now to borrow at 4 or even 5 per cent.! Taking all items into account it appears that of the 33 or 34 crores of rupees out of the cash balances loaned out to the Imperial Government only 5 crores bear 4½ per cent. interest, no interest is paid on 18 crores and the rate of interest on 11 crores is only 3 per cent. Looking to the high rate of interest at present prevailing in England, the importance of the fact that England could have such a large amount at such a low rate of interest can well be appreciated. Add to the above amount 41 crores from the currency reserve also which are being used by England at a low rate of interest. In spite of the important financial assistance thus rendered to England by India, the outcry raised by Mr. Webb and his friends has at last apparently prevailed and the Government of India are going to raise a new War Loan in this country.

Comments on the proposal to raise a double company of educated Punjabis.

Gujaráti (13), 21st Jan.; Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

12. Expressing its approval of the steps taken by the Government of the Punjáb to raise a double company from among educated Punjabis, the Gujaráti writes :—We would also like to see a double company formed from the educated men of this Presidency. If Bengal and the Punjáb can each furnish a double company why should Bombay not do the same? Government should not stop short of allowing educated men to enlist in the army, but they should also throw open the higher commissioned ranks to them. It is not desirable that Indian students should shed their blood and the British officers should get the credit for it. Do Government want to postpone the consideration of the question of giving commissions to Indians till they have suffered further great losses in life and money in the war? If it be so, Indians will have to wish for the prolongation of the war. Indians have given ample proofs of their loyalty and we see no reason why Government should be so cautious in granting further concessions to them. [The Kesari declares that thousands of such double companies of educated Indians will be easily raised if higher posts in the army are thrown open to them.]

The part played by the Indian forces at the front should be made more widely known in India than is the case at present.

Gujaráti (13), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

*13. Writing about the ceremony of the presentation of the Union Jack, and shield to the representatives of the Indian forces now fighting at the front, the Gujaráti remarks :—"The withdrawal of the Indian forces from the Western front has had one undesirable result. Their doings are no longer before the British public and their services do not meet with the same prominent recognition at their hands as those of the Colonial forces. The people of India do not know why the Indian forces were withdrawn in toto from the Western front. We of course write subject to correction. They splendidly co-operated in the Gallipoli operations and thence, it is said, they were removed to Africa and Mesopotamia. The public in India do not get the more or less full information that is supplied to the British public. We do not understand why this should be so.......... Whilst glowing accounts of the deeds of the Allied European and Colonial forces are now and then supplied by Reuter, almost nothing is said about the part that is now being played by the Indian Army.......... We think the Government of India and the home authorities ought to be more communicative than they have been.......... If the Indian public knew more about the doings of the Indian forces in the different theatres of war, there would arise a spontaneous desire to contribute more liberally to the War Fund and the various other funds that have been started. The policy of reticence results in widespread ignorance and cold indifference. This is altogether undesirable from every point of view."

Comments on Dr. Wilson's advocacy of a peace without victory.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 27th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 25th Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 25th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 25th Jan.

14. The Bombay Samáchár characterises the advice given by Dr. Wilson to the belligerents in the present war to conclude peace without victory on either side as visionary and worthless. The paper strongly believes that it is only by a decisive and complete victory that the Allies can accomplish the objects for which they are fighting which embrace even the liberation of the enemy's subjects from a cruel military despotism. It is of opinion that instead of giving such misleading advice to the Allies, Dr. Wilson ought to have helped them in a practical manner in the beneficient task in which they are engaged. It is inclined to attribute his suggestions for the freedom of the seas being extended to all nations, the regulation of the naval strength of the big powers and the keeping open, permanently, of the Dardanelles, Panama, Suez, Gibraltar, and other wateways for all powers, to his jealousy for the naval superiority of Great Britain and questions Dr. Wilson's honesty of purpose in making these suggestions. [The Sánj Vartamán remarks that Dr. Wilson's recent advocacy of a peace without victory is of a startling nature. It does not uphold his theory that if peace be concluded after a victory for the either side such a peace would be short-lived because of the vindictiveness that would rankle in the hearts of the vanquished against the victors. It is of opinion that the Allies will be in a position to bring about, without America's help, a peace which would last for a hundred years if they can defeat Germany and Austria, wrest from them the territories they have taken possession of, and dictate their own terms to the enemy. The Jám-e-Jamshed also does not approve of Dr. Wilson's proposal, and writes in justification of the Allies' determination to crush Prussian militarism. It remarks that Dr. Wilson's advocacy for the permanent opening up of the seas to the shipping of all nations will greatly delight Germany and opines that it indirectly supports the latter's aim of breaking the sea-power of Great Britain. In view of the German submarining "frightfulness", the paper holds the belief that the safety of the commerce of the whole world would be in danger if Germany were to be allowed to attain her naval ambition. The Praja Mitra and Pársi welcomes Dr. Wilson's proposal provided that the peace that can be concluded at present will prove to be of an honourable and lasting nature. It endorses his view that a crushing victory on either side would only be the precursor of a fresh war.]

Message (6) 26th Jan.

15. "President Wilson proposes to bring about peace without victory. The expression means 'a draw' in simple English. His proposals are, however, not really for declaring a drawn battle but amount to giving undue advantages to Germany. He wants to ensure 'freedom of the seas' to Germany. It means, in his own words, 'a direct outlet to the great maritime highway', to be given to Germany. Does this mean the giving up of Antwerp to the enemy, as also the neutralisation of Suez and the Straits of Gibralter? Conceding this would be practically admitting defeat. Again, if Germany is to be given free outlet to the seas should it not also mean the neutralisation of the Kiel Canal and the Dardanelles? Neither the Allies, nor the enemy, can seriously entertain such grotesque proposals. But perhaps these pourparlers are not to be taken very seriously.... ...... The Allies must make it clear that they will have nothing of the so-called 'peace without victory.'"

It is possible that Sweden may join the enemy to achieve her aims against Russia.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 26th Jan.

16. Dwelling upon the difficulties neutral powers like Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden have to put up on account of the British blockade and the enemy's indiscriminate submarining of vessels as a reply to that blockade, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that, though these powers, with the exception of Sweden, have done nothing beyond making certain preparations to meet the situation in case their neutrality is violated, it will not wonder if Sweden, on account of her known antipathy for Russia, fall into the net of Germany to achieve her own aims against Russia. It refers to various acts on the part of Sweden pointing to her unfriendly attitude towards the Allies, viz., the stoppage of her exports to England and the passage of munitions from England to Russia through her territories, the closing of one of her straits, which resulted in interfering with communication between the Allies without adversely affecting the enemy in any manner, etc., and points out that the Allies have, all the same, had the patience to put up with all these acts of Sweden as so many necessary evils resulting from the war. The paper declares that Sweden's complaint that the British naval blockade detracts from her prestige, which ground she has also urged in support of her unfriendly acts referred to above, cannot be reconciled with her quitely putting up with the submarining of her shipping by Germany.

Protest against the reasons adduced for introducing compulsory service for Europeans in India.

Message (6), 25th and 27th Jan.

17. "A correspondent of the Englishman says that compulsory military service for European and Eurasians is 'necessary for the safety of our position in this country'. He speaks of possible 'troubles in this country' and paints a glowing picture of the usefulness of a body of well-trained and well-disciplined Europeans and Eurasians in quelling those troubles. It seems then that some people want conscription in this country, not so much because the Afghans, the Russians or the Germans might create trouble as because the Indians might do it! The apprehension betrays a disagreeable consciousness on the part of the writer that the popularity of the Englishmen is a myth. It also reveals the writer's view that it is not enough that the Indians are unarmed and the English are armed, and that the former are denied all training and experience in leading troops and in higher tactics and strategy. He would apparently have the inequality still further windened by keeping the former where they are and by making the latter more efficient.......... Now we put it to Government whether such an attitude is fair or calculated to promote good feelings between class and class. Would Government have for a moment tolerated an Indian writer, if he had advocated the arming of Indians in view of the possibility of 'trouble in this country'? Here is an Anglo-Indian paper publishing a letter which is as void of sense as it is gratuitously insulting to Indians, and yet Government have not up to this time shown that steps are being taken against it.......... When even the highest quarters are singing the praises of Indian loyalty, this writer makes innuendoes as regards possible trouble in this country. When the blood of Indians is freely mixing with that of Europeans on the banks of the Tigris and elsewhere, this writer would suggest imaginary pictures of bloodshed on the banks of the Ganges or the Hoogly,—blood of Europeans shed by Indians and of the latter by the former! .... Indians, it seems, are to be further taxed for the privilege of being disarmed and of being denied the right of volunteering and admission to commissioned ranks, as well as for the further privilege of training and disciplining Europeans and Eurasians that they may be of use 'in case of trouble in this country.'" ['Ignis' writing to the paper remarks in a subsequent issue:—"They apprehend 'trouble' in this country. I might agree but wish to add an explanation. The 'trouble' if it ever comes, will come from the armed and trained section to the unarmed population."]

Comments on the alleged participation of Sir James Meston and other Government officials in the activities of the Round Table.

Gujarâti (13), 21st Jan.

18. It is a rule of Government that their Indian servants should take no part in political movements or societies. This rule should also be made applicable to European officials. It has recently come out that Sir James Meston and other Government officials have taken a very prominent part in the activities of the Round Table in connection with the reorganisation of the Empire after the war. Why should these officers have been allowed to take part in the discussion of the Round Table? Are Government in sympathy with the aims and objects of that body? It is strange that Government officials are allowed to take part in Anglo-Indian and European associations that have political objects in view, and no objection is raised to their contributing lengthy articles to Anglo-Indian papers. We now come to know that the Government of India took no objection to the services of the United Provinces Secretariat being placed at the disposal of the Round Table. Under the circumstances the hearts of Indians are naturally stirred with indignation. Government should now make an announcement to the effect that no European officer has a right to take part in the discussion of the Round Table or any other association of a similiar nature. Some one would do well to ask a question or bring forward a resolution on this subject at the next session of the Imperial Legislative Council.

India should be permitted to develop on her own lines.

Mahratta (5), 28th Jan.

*19. "Will England refuse to be guided by the lessons of her own history? Will she be blind to the political evolution of the civilized world? Will she consent to keeping educated India in political subjection? Let her permit India to develop on her own lines and according to her own inclinations. Let her gain her own experience, let her blunder and muddle through. Let England govern India, but as an experienced friend and adviser, not as a self-willed mistress. We want England's protection, England's guidance, but we want our own rule. In return we are and have always been prepared to place all our resources at her disposal at any critical period, but we cannot barter away our own liberties. It is a crime and a sin for which we shall be responsible to the future generations. No country can be grateful at the expense of its liberties. There is no price too high for liberty or sacrifice too great for self-rule. England would surely find self-governing India the strongest bulwark against aggression, the greatest security for the world's peace and the staunchest friend in the British Confederacy. But the difficulty is that England is convinced by the logic of hard facts alone. The present war has been a great boon to us in that it has brought out and placed the real India before the British people. The war would be won easily if England freely took into confidence the trusted leaders of the Indian people and made a frank demand for volunteers. The mobilization of Indian volunteers will be the beginning of Indian autonomy and we do not grudge the sacrifice as it is the only way to create the new ties of trust and friendship between the two peoples."

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Sastri's new book entitled Self-government for India under the British Flag.

Young India (11), 24th Jan.

20. In the course of its review of the Honourable Mr. Sastri's book 'Self-government for India under the British Flag,' Young India points out how the writer has silenced those critics who say that India is not fit for self-government by showing that the colonies were also not fit when self-government was conferred on them, and that for the matter of that even England was notoriously backward at the time the Reform Bill of 1832 was brought in. The paper then continues:—"Nobody denies that we have not yet reached in many particulars the high efficiency of the most advanced nations of to-day; but how are we to gain it? Mr. Sastri's reply is definite: The people of India will become fit for self-rule only by practising self-rule. 'There is no other way for it. They must conceive their aims and ideals, they must lay their plans and execute them, make mistakes and rectify them, incur losses and recoup them, encounter perils and overcome them.' And this is not lightly said; for he fully realises that the 'process should not begin too early,' that 'there must be a period of preliminary training,' that it is wise to wait 'till the necessary general intellectual and moral equipment is acquired, till the necessary political experience has been gained.' But he contends 'that we have this necessary equipment and experience' and quotes in support the testimony of highly placed responsible officers of the Government, who have declared that Indians have proved themselves absolutely efficient and capable in all the high offices in which they have been till now tried......... Mr. Sastri next deals with the question of the illiteracy and poverty of the masses, and the differences of castes and creeds; and while accepting the difficulties caused by these evils, he points out that they are grossly exaggerated to keep us out of our rights. In this connection he takes occasion to speak some trenchant words regarding the race prejudices of the whites, which are at the foundation of the absurd doctrine that 'the Asiatics do not yet possess the faculty of self-government'. He aptly terms these prejudices 'a revival of the caste-system without its spiritual sanction'.......... This must suffice to remove all illusions about the permanent inferiority of our races and must open our eyes to the fact that if we choose to strive, our destiny is in our own hands. Mr. Sastri has offered ample proofs to show that we are competent to manage our own affairs and now that this confidence is created in the more discerning amongst us, it would not take very long to infuse it amongst the millions that stand behind these. Once this is done, there is no power on earth that can keep us from our own."

Comments on Mr. Lala Lajpat Rai's book "Young India".

Dnyān Prakāsh (34), 26th Jan.

21. Mr. Lala Lajpat Rai's book "Young India" published in America having been prohibited from being brought into India, there is no way to know what dangerous principles it has inculcated, but from what has been said about it by respectable journals in England like the Nation and the New Statesman. It appears that it deals with the spread of nationalism in India and other cognate subjects. Both the said papers have spoken in very high terms about the book, and the New Statesman has even asked Englishmen to give it a thoughtful reading. We are at a loss to understand how a book which has been so highly spoken of by one of the best journals in England, could have been considered objectionable by our Government. They have, of course, taken the necessary steps that the book should not fall into our hands, but we would ask them at least to act up to the suggestion of the New Statesman that the Secretary of State and his Councillors should make it a point to read it. We think that Mr. Chamberlain who has shown himself so ignorant about Indian matters will be much benefitted by its perusal. The above journal also calls upon the India Office to publicly answer the allegations against the Indian Government contained in the book, and we hope the suggestion will be acted upon. On the whole it appears that the exclusion of the book from India is unjustifiable.

Comments on Lord Sydendam's article "The danger in India."

Sind Advocate (8), 11th Jan.

22. Commenting upon Lord Sydenham's article on "The danger in India" the Sind Advocate declares that his Lordship was a second but more insidiously dangerous Curzon. It stigmatises Lord Sydenham's remark that the members of the Viceregal Legislative Council who signed the Reforms Memorandum did not represent the masses and the agriculturists as a "shameful argument." The paper continus:—"Are not the members of the Viceroy's Council or of the provincial councils practically speaking the chosen of the best mind and heart of the people? Do they not represent the best culture of the country, a culture that is given them by England herself? You withhold from India a larger franchise and then find fault with the claim of the best of our representatives to be representatives at all! Lord Sydenham also resorts to the stock argument about the 'martial races' being out of sympathy with and even disdainful of the Indian politician. In the first place, broadly speaking 'Are the poor so called martial races really martial any longer?' Let Sydenham and Co. understand that even the emaciated martial races are awaiting to a consciousness of the glory of Universal Swaraj under England's guidance and help."

Islāmic Mail (4), 21st Jan., Eng. edition.

23. "Lord Sydenham's letter to the Times (? Nineteenth Century and After) has created an outburst of angry feeling in the Congress Press and with one accord they all assail him for being reactionary, bureaucratic, etc., forgetting all the eulogies that used to be paid to him when he was in India. Lord Sydenham was no persona grata with us. Muhammadan progress was stationary—rather retarded during his Governorship of this Presidency and we have no desire to take up the cudgels on his behalf. But to render unto Caeser what is Caeser's we must say that in in this case his Lordship is only guilty of telling the truth. As an administrator of no mean order, endowed with a rare knowledge of modern India by virtue of his personal association with most of the advanced politicians, his Lordship can claim to speak about India with accuracy and knowledge. He knows those who aspire to govern India in the name of its people, the set of upstart lawyers who are as much out of touch with the feelings of the mass of the people as the bureaucracy are in touch with them. He knows the teeming millions who know nothing about self-government and Home Rule and whom experience has taught to be afraid of any delegation of authority to their own people. Those who stand in perpetual dread of the officers of their own race such as Thanedar, Mamlatdar, Munsiff, etc., and regard the European Sub-Divisional Officers and Collector as their saviour and protector. Lord Sydenham has spoken the truth and put the case in as outspoken a manner as could be expected."

Native States have done much more for their subjects than the Indian Government which is only appointing commissions.
Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

24. In point of indecision in settling principles and inconsistency in taking action, the Government of India can best be compared to Rasselas. Other people moved on and prospered whilst Rasselas' quest after happiness never came to an end. Similarly, the Government of India have appointed scores of commissions to guide them in effecting various administrative reforms, but to-day they find themselves exactly where they were before. And yet they are not tired of these commissions and new ones like the Industrial and the Public Works Commissions are vigorously at work taking evidence. And what will be the outcome of these commissions? They are sure to come to a "conclusion in which nothing is concluded"! But it is to be noted that while Government are trying to solve their problems by means of commissions the Native States have already stolen a march upon them. Thus the Mysore State has put the Government of India to shame by adopting practical measures to revive old industries and to create new ones. Even a petty Muhammadan State like Bhopal has made education free and compulsory for its people, and Gwalior, by opening a State Bank for the encouragement of industries has indeed surpassed all. As a matter of fact the ways for encouraging industries are now so well known that it would be criminal on the part of any government to plead ignorance about them. It behoves Government, therefore, to take up the work of industrial reform in right earnest. We have had enough of lip-sympathy. Now some practical action is required to secure public confidence.

Comments on the reported intention to grant autonomy to Portuguese India.
Prakásh (102), 24th Jan.

25. Referring to the reported intention of the Portuguese Government to grant administrative and fiscal autonomy to Portuguese India, the Prakásh observes:—While the Portuguese Government does not seem to have even suspected that Indians in Portuguese India who bear a close resemblance to Indians in British Territory in matters of religion, customs, intelligence etc., were unfit for Home Rule, the British Government which has been proclaiming to the world its love of freedom and equality for all doubts the fitness of Indians for self-government. This is no fault of the Indians but only their misfortune. Whatever that be, it is indeed a novel sight that the British Empire should have to learn a lesson in the matter of extending the realm of freedom from a small nation like Portugal lying neglected in a corner of Europe.

Mr. Tilak should be invited to visit Sind.
Message (6), 30th Jan.

*26. "Pralhad" writing to the Message dwells upon the necessity of inviting "patriots" to lecture to the Sindhis in favour of the spread of the Home Rule movement and suggests that the people of Sind should request Mr. Tilak "whom they so much love and admire" to visit the Province before he leaves for London. He declares that as Mr. Tilak's visit "is sure to produce good effects upon the Sindhis", the Sind Home Rule League "should not lose a minute in inviting him."

Will Muhammadans profit by joining the Hindus and the Congress party?
Islámic Mail (4), 21st Jan., Eng. edition.

27. "If the Congress people wish to win us over they must convince us that the arrangements which they have made through some of their hirelings would be to our advantage and no power on earth, the bureaucracy or the autocracy or any other 'cracy', would keep us back from joining heart and soul with them. We want to know for instance whether the new constitution would give us more seats in the Executive and Legislative Councils than we enjoy. At present we have the billets almost equally divided. For instance in Bombay out of six seats in the Imperial Council four are occupied by the Muhammadans. There is Sir Fazulbhoy, Sir Ebrahim, Mr. Jinnah and the Sind representative. In Madras we possess more than a third of the Imperial seats with Nawab Syed Mohamed and Mir Asad Ali Khan of Banganpalli. In our Council here we have nine Muhammadans. In Bengal there are more than half, and so on in almost all other provinces. By the proposed change we will not be able to get the mixed vote and most of those who are trying to make a position by winning the goodwill of the Congress will have to go. There is another point to be elucidated. At present the seat in the Executive Council is held alternately by Hindus and Muhammadans. The constitution proposed by the Congress makes no provision for a Muhammadan in the Executive Council and even in the Legislative Council they won't get quite as good a number as they obtain at present. If they enlighten us on these points we shall be prepared to reconsider matters."

Comments on the offer of gold bullion by Government for sale through the Presidency Banks.
Gujarâti (13), 21st Jan.;
Hindusthân (17), 21st Jan.

28. The Gujarâti dilates at length on the causes that, in its opinion, have led to the sale of gold bullion by Government through the Presidency Banks and writes:—It would have been in the fitness of things if Government had allowed the free importation of gold into India from Japan, America and Egypt before taking this step. Government believe that the sale of gold in India will release the silver hoarded by the people and lower the price of both silver and gold and also facilitate the flotation of the war loan. This goes to prove that gold should be minted in India and Indian gold should not be allowed to be exported. England is in need of money. Why should then no attempt be made to liquidate India's liabilities in England and to purchase from her the securities in connection with Indian railways and irrigation works? All other nations are buying up on favourable terms their own securities from England; why should India be not given an opportunity to purchase her own securities? [The Hindusthân considers it an injustice to India to keep the currency and gold standard reserves in England and to utilise them for purposes that are not profitable to India. It believes that India has had to suffer on account of the location of these reserves in England and expresses hope that Government will see their way to keeping them all in India after the termination of the war.]

One rupee notes if issued will not be popular.
Sandesh (103), 21st Jan.

29. A Calcutta paper suggests that just as the English Government has introduced one pound and ten shillings notes, the Indian Government also should have one rupee notes, and that they are likely to prove popular. We, however, think that the idea is a fallacious one as the mass of the ignorant people, who are disinclined to use even the five-rupee notes, will refuse to use them. Moreover, these notes will not be payable at sight, as, following the system prevalent in England, Government will not be bound to keep an equal amount of reserve in their Treasury for paying them.

The importance of irrigation canals even from the military point of view.
Praja Mitra and Pârsi (24), 22nd Jan.

30. The Praja Mitra and Pârsi considers it to be a happy augury of the times that the Anglo-Indians and their organs should now agree with the Indians in recognising the desirability of utilising, to a larger extent, the rivers and irrigation canals of the country as a means of communication for commercial purposes. It refers to the evidence recently given by Mr. W. A. Lee before the Indian Industrial Commission advocating the extension of irrigation works in India and to the remarks made by the Pioneer in support of it and remarks that the present war, which has caused much congestion on the Indian railways and the consequent dislocation of traffic, has exposed the fallacy of certain Anglo-Indian bodies and their organs in holding that the Indians were not sufficiently loyal, nay, even were actuated by seditious motives, in pressing for the extension of irrigation works and in complaining of the extension of railways in spite of their knowledge of the military importance of railways in India. The paper observes that irrigation canals are also not without their importance from the military point of view inasmuch as they not only relieve congestion on railways in times of war but can also afford shelter to men-of-war that are not intended to be used for war purposes for the time being. It is of opinion that great benefit will accrue to India if Government will look at the question of irrigation not from the interested point of view of the railway companies but from the standpoint of the general interests of the country.

31. Referring to the news published by Reuter that certain co-operative societies in England have purchased large tracts of land in India for wheat cultivation, the Sandesh desires that further details about these purchases, such as the localities, in which the lands are situated, the terms, etc., should be made available. It wants to know whether the teaplanters having already taken up extensive lands for tea cultivation, big English Companies are now to be permitted to purchase tracts for the cultivation of wheat, cotton and oil seeds also, and expresses the hope that the necessary steps will be taken to prevent foreign capitalists from reaping the benefits of the deliberations of the Industrial Commission, to the disadvantage of Indians.

Comments on the reported purchase of lands in India by English Co-operative Companies.
Sandesh (103), 21st Jan.

32. Refrring to the Bombay Government's decision to stop the publication of the Blue Book Quarterly, the Praja Bandhu remarks that it cannot be too much regretted. The paper continues :—"We think it is not impossible to make the Quarterly more attractive as well as cheaper, if the management is handed over to a qualified non-official agency. We believe that a junior member of the Indian Civil Service was in charge of it during the last two years and a half, and his salary alone must be a heavy charge upon a publication making its appearance only four times in a year. Holding as we do this view we shall be glad to see the publication of the Blue Book Quarterly revived on the lines suggested above, on the cessation of the war, which may not improbably have been a further factor to a certain extent to influence the decision of the Bombay Government."

Comments on the Bombay Government's decision to stop the publication of the Blue Book Quarterly.
Praja Bandhu (27), 21st Jan.; Eng. cols.

33. "After years of deplorable neglect and breach of duty our Government woke up and decided that indentured labour should go and Lord Hardinge promised its early abolition. Now we are told that Fiji has been assured of its continuance for five years more. The powers at Whitehall are going on leisurely, consulting the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who in his turn is consulting the wishes of the multitudinous components that go to make up the Empire on which the sun never sets, and these are holding conferences to settle the question. If there was any justification needed for the early achievement of Home Rule for India it is this criminal disregard of the crying needs of India, and the virtual impotence of the Government of India, to say nothing of the disabilities of the people, to settle their own difficulties and affairs. The moral, physical and economic degradation of India is involved in the system and with every hour that the system is prolonged this is aggravated. It is, moreover, the very people, responsible for these humiliating results, whose wishes and opinions are being leisurely consulted, when definite and immediate action is the supreme need and the fondest hope of the people based on plighted word. 'Legalised prostitution' that is what Mr. C. F. Andrews calls this heinous system of transporting three men to every woman to foreign climes, without any the slightest attempt to ensure their welfare and to safeguard their interests, a system which permits and indirectly encourages the most shameful immorality, which forces helpless, innocent women to live lives of unbridled license and vice. Will not the Government of India stand up for India to put an end to this human traffic and take measures to bring the Colonies to their sense of duty and humanity and duty as parts of the Empire?" [The Mahrātta says :—"The barbarous system which legalises prostitution, which flouts the sanctity of our marriage laws, which undermines the chastity of the Indian women, encourages suicide and murder amongst us, and mocks all ideas of morality as a sham, must be ended at once. No lease of prostitution can be tolerated for a moment, but strange to say that such a lease is given and—it is reported—it is to last for five years more in Fiji! Insufferable! The idea itself is revolting! Heaven and earth must be moved to save our women from this, and India must show that, come what may, she will never suffer this intolerable wrong any longer. Organised agitation, constant vigilance is needed and we hope India will be astir with this movement......... The lease of prostitution must be attacked from every quarter and its immediate abolition must be secured."]

Dnydn Prakash (34), 26th Jan.; Prakdsh (102), 24th Jan.

34. We are very much gratified to see that public meetings are being held all over the country to protest against the proposed continuance of the indentured coolie system and the thanks of Indians are due to Messrs. Andrews and Polak for the way in which they are exerting themselves in the matter. This is a question of national self-respect for the Indians and they would never tolerate the sight of their countrymen remaining in slavery in the colonies with whom India is demanding to be placed in a position of equality. We would also warn Government that no attempt should be made to replace the present indenture system by the one now prevalent in Ceylon under which coolies are also reduced to semi-slavery, and against which a movement is already afoot in that island. As regards a system of free emigration of labour, that too cannot be sanctioned until some method for preventing its abuse is devised. In the meantime the present indenture system must go, the Colonies being informed once for all that India absolutely refuses to allow her people to remain any longer in a state of slavery and in immoral surroundings. [The Prakdsh remarks:—That the British Government should have acceded to the wishes of the selfish Colonists of Fiji without consulting Indian public opinion is a stigma on the British sense of justice and fairplay and also derogatory to the prestige of the Empire. There can be no greater injustice to India than that the system should be continued in the interests of people who have been deliberately maltreating Indians, and that too in spite of the resolution passed by the Imperial Legislative Council for its early abolition. But how can dependent India prevent this?]

Gujardti (13), 21st Jan.

35. The Gujardti quotes Mr. Andrew's letter to the Press in connection with indentured labour in the Fiji Islands and adds:—What an immoral arrangement to send out one woman to every three men! The arrangement is meant for the benefit of the planters of Fiji than for Indian labourers! Is it not strange that England which is shedding its own blood for the protection of the weaker nations should encourage such a despicable trade? Nothing could have given us a more unpleasant shock than the assurance from London for the continuance of the system of indenture, which involves such hardships and degradation to Indian labourers. What nation will allow its mothers, sisters and daughters to be subjected to such humiliation for five years? How do the Government of India allow ship-loads of indentured labourers to be exported from India for immoral purposes? We feel sure Lord Chelmsford feels as strongly as the Indian people on this question and that he will not encourage the system for a day more than he can help it. If the Government of India, backed by the unanimous opinion of the Indian people, refuse to continue this system, the Government of Great Britain will not think of bringing any pressure to bear upon them. Will England choose to support the worshippers of the golden calf in Fiji and disregard the demand made by India in the interests of morality? Do the promoters of immorality exercise such great influence in England?

Jdm-e-Jamshed (20), 22nd Jan.; Gujarati Punch (15), 21st Jan.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 21st Jan.

36. The Jdm-e-Jamshed expresses its disapproval of the assurance declared by Mr. Andrews to have been given by the Secretary of State for the continuance of the system of indentured labour to the Fiji Islands for a further period of five years and exhorts public bodies in India to convene meetings to protest against the step taken by the Secretary of State and to press for the immediate abolition of the system which in the words of Mr. Andrews conduces to 'The slavery of their men, the dishonour of their women and the degradation of their motherland in the eyes of the world.' [The Gujarati Punch and Shri Venkateshwar also protest against the idea of continuing indentured labour and call upon Government to respect the wishes of the people in this matter and bear in mind the views of Lord Hardinge on the subject.]

The right claimed by the white Colonists to keep out Asiatics is not based on civilisation but on brute force.

Young India (11), 24th Jan.

37. Mr. S. Banker contributes to Young India a lengthy review of the book entitled "Imperial unity and Dominions" by Dr. Keith, Regius Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in the University of Edinburgh, wherein the reviewer remarks as follows on Dr. Keith's view that as Indian, Japanese and other Asiatic immigrants are dangerous competitors in the Colonies, the European Colonists "are entitled in obedience to the law of self-preservation and the desire to perpetuate the type, to secure that they shall be left in free occupation of the territory they have":—"And even if there be any moral sanction for such a right, we have to point out, that it should operate in favour of the original coloured inhabitants of the Dominions and not of the white immigrants. If, however, it be said that the whites are physically stronger and as such can enforce their will on the coloured people, whether it be morally right or wrong, we have no objection; for in that case there will be no attempt at covering the inequity under the cloak of the law of self-preservation. And in fact Dr. Keith himself, gives away the whole case, for in the next sentence he says that 'Australia and New Zealand must hold firmly to the Imperial connexion since otherwise they could have not the slightest chance of remaining in possession of land which they have not the men to keep, and which they cannot hope adequately to people for many years to come, especially as the birth-rate in both countries is regrettably low for newly settled lands.' This is nothing but selfishness and high-handedness carried out into a definite policy. For there are not enough whites to people the land, nay, there will not be enough for ages to come, and still it is sought to justify the exclusion of the coloured peoples on the ground that the land will be wanted in the far distant future for the progeny of the whites; and further in order to carry out this policy they have to hold firmly to the Imperial connexion, that is, to the might which the Empire possesses. Things cannot be more plainly said: and it is high time for us to realise that, in spite of all platitudes, the rights of the whites are based not on civilisation but ultimately on brute force; and that it is therefore not wise to sit with folded hands looking for justice, but to strive and be strong so as to be able to enforce what is right and just. In our remarks above we have been discussing the question in its general aspect as it affects all Asiatics. We shall now proceed to consider it from the Indian standpoint. In this connection it might be thought that although the policy of the Dominions is narrow and selfish as regards coloured people as a class, the fact of our being British subjects must make a considerable difference. And, in fact it does, but all to our prejudice; for the treatment offered to us is much worse than that offered to other Asiatics, e.g., the Japanese. This is, however, in no way surprising, for the Governments of the other countries try to protect the interests of their subjects in the Dominions, while our benign Government leaves us to the tender mercies of our fellow citizens—with what result we need not recount here. On this point Dr. Keith is very plain-spoken.......... But more than any of these, South Africa offiers a striking instance of the utter helplessnes of British Indian subjects in the British Dominions. Dr. Keith has given a lengthy account of the troubles of our countrymen in the Transvaal and other parts of South Africa; but without going into these details it is enough to point out that the condition of our countrymen there has become actually worse after the annexation of these parts to the British Empire. [The reviewer then refers to Dr. Keith's suggestion for the establishment of a tribunal 'to which India could appeal against the action of the self-governing Dominions in treating [illegible] resident Indians', and concludes:—] To us this seems to be a very practical suggestion and there could be no question that it would be a real advantage to have a tribunal to which questions of serious differences between the various parts of the Empire can be submitted for arbitration. We may, however, add that the constitution of such a tribunal cannot be satisfactory or complete unless due representation is given thereon to Indians, both as judges and as statesmen."

When India gets self-government it will see that Indians are treated with respect by the Colonies.

Mahrátta (5), 28th Jan.

38. Referring to the reported preference shown to an Indian from Portuguese India to one from British India by the authorities at Mombassa and Zanzibar, the Mahrátta remarks:—"When the authorities in England could not protect us from the ignominious position to which we are relegated in the colonies who can stand by us but ourselves? A self-governing India would protect herself, and getting self-government depends upon us. That achieved, we will then see whether Zanzibar can refuse a British Indian subject and bring upon itself a retaliation which would spell disaster and ruin to her."

Proposed Asiatic exclusion legislation in the United States and the British Ambassador's failure to protest against it.

Message (6), 21st Jan.

39. "Professor Sudhindra Bose, writing in the latest issue of the Modern Review, asserts that referring to the Asiatic Exclusion Bill in America, Viscount Chinda, the Japanese Ambassador, protested to the American Government against 'lumping Japanese and Indians together.' The Modern Review, commenting on this, expresses indignation at the supercilious conceit of the Japanese Ambassador. We, too, feel indignation, but it is directed elsewhere. We can understand and even excuse the refusal of the Japanese to be named in the same breath with the Indians who have no political status either in their own country or elsewhere. But we should like to know what the British Ambassador did to protest against the open insult to India from the Japanese Minister, as well as against the unjust exclusion legislation. We are often told that our interests lie safe in the hands of the British. Are our interests in America as safe as we could wish? Is there no danger to Indian interests in the contemplated Asiatic Exclusion legislation? Are Indians to congratulate themselves upon being openly declared to be unfit to be 'lumped together' with the Japanese in an American statute?

Comments on the recommendations of the Public Service Commission.

Hindusthán (17), 26th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 26th Jan.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 26th Jan.

40. Commenting upon the Report of the Indian Public Service Commission in the course of an article under the heading "The mountains are in labour and only bring forth a mouse", the Hindusthán remarks that the report has proved all its bright expectations for the future welfare of the country to be a mere dream and has pushed out the people from the land of hope to the region of despair. It dwells upon the defective character of the constitution of the Commission which, according to it, contained an overwhelmingly large number of European Commissioners. The paper cannot find the spirit of the late Mr. Gokhale reflected in any of the recommendations made by the Commissioners in their report, although they state that their recommendations have been influenced by his views. It observes that the complaints of Indians against the system of public services in this country are very weighty and they should be remedied as soon as possible. It adds that the fact that the sons of India have to remain in a helpless condition in their own country is not only discouraging but it causes a great deal of harm to the interests of both the rulers and the ruled. The paper's greatest regret is that this 'Royal' Commission has not proved sufficiently 'royal', liberal and impartial in its breadth of vision. It concludes by wishing that greater liberality may even yet be shown towards India and her natural rights recognised. [The Sánj Vartamán also writes about the report in a dissatified tone. After a careful study of the Report, it declares that if Royal

Commissions are to bring forth such regrettable and disappointing results their appointment is a waste of time and money. It is of opinion that had Mr. Gokhale been alive he would not have signed the Report, but would have drafted a separate minority report which he would have persuaded at least a few of the Commissioners to sign. The paper maintains that the Commission has, in the main, advocated the continuance of the present system and, referring to the recommendation about the reduction of the age limit from 21—23 to 17—19 years for the Civil Service which recommendation it characterises as of a retrogade nature, declares that the recommendation made by the Commission will not satisfy public opinion in the smallest degree. It considers Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim's minute of dissent as the best part of the Report. In this minute, declares the paper, Mr. Abdur Rahim has exposed the mistaken notions, faulty conclusions and erroneous recommendations of his colleagues. The Praja Mitra and Pársi infers from the Report that the Indian members of the Commission have differed from their English brethren in important principles and regrets that the latter failed to grasp those principles from the right standpoint. It also regrets that the recommendations of the English members of the Commission, who formed the majority, are not in keeping with the assurance given by the British authorities to place India on a footing of equality with the other members of the Empire and attributes this to the Report having been written before the British public got their experience of India in the present war. The paper points out how the Commission has been divided into two camps composed of English members on the one hand and Indian members on the other and hopes that in view of the change in the angle of vision, His Majesty's Government and the Government of India will not carry out the recommendations made by only one party and adds that if they cannot set aside those recommendations which have been influenced by a narrow spirit, and carry out the recommendations of the Indian members they will, at least, request the English members of the Commission to reconsider their recommendations in the light of the situation created by the war.]

Mahrátta* (5), 28th Jan.; Message (6), 27th Jan.

41. "In one sentence the majority have opened their heart and said that 'in the nature of things no final solution of this problem is possible.' We are at a loss to know as to why it should be so. People expected that this Commission would recommend the strict observance of the statutes and the proclamations and would strengthen their faith in British justice so seriously undermined by a Viceroy branding them as 'impossible charters.' The Commission did nothing of the kind and suggested some half-way measures which would never satisfy the Indian minds who have now outgrown them. Time was when people could have been satisfied whith a few crumbs here and there; but the rapid march of Indian nationalism would not now stop by such paltry temptations. Nine posts in the Civil Service to be recruited for in India, some forty and odd posts in the Judicial Service and some appointments in others do not amount to a big concession to our growing demand for a more and more widening share in the administration of the county. The most effective way to satisfy this would have been to hold simultaneous examinations in India and in England where merit alone would count. But the majority of the Commissioners could not accept this as they were obsessed by the idea that as education is irregularly diffused in different parts and different communities in the country, only a particular community would take the lion's share to the prejudice of others.......... But Indians would prefer Indians of any creed to Europeans of a totally different creed and nationality. They would not mind whether a particular officer is a Hindu or a Mussalman, a Parsi or a Christian.......... But the Commissioners could not or would not accept this obvious means of satisfying our demands and left the galling state of things not materially improved. Indeed the perusal of the report leaves a sinister impression on one's mind that the equality of treatment so generously granted to us is yet a myth; or as Lord Salisbury would have it, 'a political hypocrisy'. The 'British responsibility for the good governance of India' and 'grounds of policy' are, to parody Lord Lytton's words, 'transparent and deliberate subterfuges for stultifying the promises'. Parliament is responsible for the good government of India and the promises also are given to us by Parliament. Then the natural question that suggests itself is why should the executive and so many committees and commissions override the provisions of their masters?......... The Indian nation has left out of its consideration such minor demands for a few crumbs and has struck at the root of the question by demanding a substantial share of self-government. That granted, we will then decide how many places are to be filled by Indians and how many by Europeans." [The Message remarks:—"It was not to be expected that a body of men, three-fourths of whom were non-Indians and which included some people of pronounced anti-Indian views would bring out a report which could in any manner be worthy of acceptance by Indian public opinion.......... The conclusions and recommendations of the majority of the Commissioners, which includes one Indian, Mr. M. B. Chaubal, are hopelessly one-sided and disappointing, and it does not appear to us that the Commissioners have been much influenced by any considerations of justice and equity. Their recommendations regarding the methods and manner of recruitment of the various services, particularly the I. C. S. and the Police, are of a character which would be tolerated only here in India.......... [The paper then refers to the minute of dissent of Justice Abdur Rahim and says:—] Mr. Abdur Rahim has taken up the only attitude which he as an Indian felt consistent with the honour of the Motherland and the indisputable rights of his countrymen to have the determining voice in all the services of the country. His objections to the continuance of the present monstrous system of excutive cum judicial officers are unanswerable...... ... We enter our emphatic protest against the reactionary and narrow-minded view taken by the Commissioners in regard to what are primarily our indisputable rights and we want Government clearly to bear in mind that any action it may take to give effect to the ridiculous recommendations will not have even the most distant approval of the public."]

Gujarâti (13), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

42. The Gujarâti, after paying a compliment to Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim's Minute of Dissent, goes on to say:—"The Indian members were in a hopeless minority and their English colleagues were never known for their liberalism or statesmanlike grasp of the Indian point of view. It is, therefore, no wonder that the report of the Commission is a disappointing document full of transparent pleas, excuses and plausibilities which are unconvincing and will dissatisfy the whole country. The Indian people have all along demanded the institution of simultaneous examinations. But that demand has been rejected and no number of crumbs that have been given to them will give any satisfaction whatever......... All other questions or concessions are of subordinate importance, and it is a thousand pities that a reform which has been overdue for the last 30 years and more has not been recommended by the Commissioners. They have also shirked the question of the separation of judicial and executive functions by resorting to half-hearted and lame excuses which are utterly unworthy of the importance of the subject. The pretexts and excuses are so transparent that no one will be deceived by them."

Comments on the Bombay High Court's decision in the appeal in connection with the action taken by the District Magistrate, Ahmedabad, with regard to accommodation for C. I. D. reporters in the Provincial Conference pandal.

Hindusthân (17), 25th Jan.; Gujarâti (13), 21st Jan.

43. Referring to the decision of the Bombay High Court, dismissing the appeal preferred by the General Secretaries of the last Provincial Conference held at Ahmedabad against the order issued by the District Magistrate, requiring the Secretaries to provide the C. I. D. reporters with suitable seats in the Conference pandal, on the ground that it could not interfere with the order as it was issued by the District Magistrate in his executive capacity, the Hindusthân remarks that it is at a loss to know whether it should congratulate the Secretaries or should condole with them. It maintains that the District Police Act under which the order was issued contains no provision which might be interpreted to enjoin that special facilities should be given to the C. I. D., reporters by the organisers of a public meeting and observes that the District Magistrate had enforced his order only by an arbitrary exercise of his authority. The paper asserts that the High Court has shirked the duty of deciding the real point at issue. [The Gujaráti writes:—Should the public infer from this decision of the High Court that the executive officers are exempt from all legal control? Suppose a District Magistrate, as head of the District police, passes an illegal order does it mean that the people can have no justice against such an order? English history tells us, and the British law and constitution bears it out, that it is only the King that can do no wrong, but in India no one can challenge the order of an officer if it is passed in his executive capacity. Verily this is an age of wonders.]

Prakásh (102), 24th Jan.; Sandesh (103), 21st Jan.

44. The High Court has held that the orders of the District Magistrate of Ahmedabad were passed in his capacity as head of the Police. But as the powers under section 39 of the Police Act are granted to the District Magistrate alone, the orders in question were unquestionably the District Magistrate's orders. Instances can also be cited in which the High Court has quashed orders passed by District Magistrates under sub-section (2) of the above section. The High Court's decision thus not only departs from precedents and contracts its own powers but also gives a free hand to the Magistrates and closes to aggrieved people one of the avenues for securing justice. We are afraid that, on the strength of this decision, the C. I. D. will put forth all sorts of extravagant pretensions for preferential treatment at public meetings, and therefore, it behoves the Secretaries of the Provincial Conference to get the matter clearly decided once for all by having it placed before the Local Legislative Council. [The Sandesh also expresses similar views and declares that at least from the layman's point of view there appears to be no justification for the interpretation put upon the District Magistrate's action by the High Court. It suggests that Government should now be appealed to in the matter and the necessary action should also be taken in the Legislative Council. A resolution on the subject may, it observes, be disallowed just as was done in the case of the resolution sent in by the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri in connection with the Moslem League meeting in Bombay, but that should not discourage our public leaders, both Hindus and Muhammadans, who should go on hammering at the question as a matter of duty.]

Comments on the recent prosecution by a Bombay Police Officer of Mr. H. A. Wadia for a breach of one of the Rules under the Bombay Motor Vehicles Act.

Rást Goftár (28), 28th Jan., Eng. cols.

45. "We cannot sufficiently deprecate the conduct of Deputy Inspector Hobson who led the prosecution in the case against Mr. H. A. Wadia, the other day. To say the least of it, the action—as the evidence only too plainly proved—was simply vexatious. And we venture to add that conduct of this kind, if allowed to be continued, will eventually prove detrimental to the best interests of Government. To drag into police-court publicity—with inadequacy of plea or of accusation—men who are amongst the leading and most accredited citizens of Bombay and active supporters of Government withal is to belittle the self-respect of the public of this city which is never behindhand in cherishing the merit or in safeguarding the dignity of its eminent men. We are sure, however, that had the Inspector with less zeal and larger discreetness referred the matter to his superiors, the gracious tact and courtesy of the Commissioner of Police would have called forth a timely explanation and settlement, and thereby averted the people's anger and disappointment."

Protest against the rumoured increase in the salt tax.

Sandesh (103), 21st Jan.; Shetkari (38), 21st Jan.

46. Referring to a report published in a Calcutta Anglo-Indian paper that there was the possibility of an enhancement of the salt tax in the next Budget, the Sandesh suggests that if there be any truth in the report, strong protests should immediately be sent to Government against the proposal from all parts of the country. It points out that there are other directions in which taxation can be safely increased without taking from the poor man the most essential ingredient of his everyday meals, and it hopes that Government will inform the public as to whether there is any truth in the report. [Mr. Shankar Gopal Lele, pleader, writing to the Shetkari, appeals to Government to forego the salt tax altogether and to recoup the loss of revenue by taxing other articles.]

Comments on the address presented by the Sind Muhammadan Association to His Excellency Lord Willingdon.

Sind Journal (9), 18th Jan.

47. Commenting upon the address presented by the Sind Muhammadan Association to His Excellency the Lord Willingdon the Sind Journal remarks:—"We have said many times before and we repeat it once again that no sensible Hindu would be sorry to see Muhammadans returned to the municipal boards by means of election in a fair proportion to Hindus. There are several methods by which the end can be achieved, but the device of separate electorates which is surely not the last word in political wisdom is the least acceptable to Hindus and also to enlightened Muhammadans of Sind. Of the latter class Mr. Shahnawaz Pirzada, B. A., editor of the Al Amin, is an example and he has courageously discountenanced all agitation for separate electorates in the Press, notably by his letter in the Daily Gazette of the 4th instant. We, however, regret that the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri should have been one of the signatories to the address which is couched in language which wounds the susceptibilities of Hindus who have not been inimical to Muhammadan interests. The prayer of the Sind Muhammadan Association contained in the address that at least half of the total number of elective seats be allotted to Muhammadan electorates shows the mood which the Muhammadan leaders have worked themselves into. The real test for representation on Municipalities is the voting strength of a community and not its whole population. If the Muhammadans 'make enormous contributions to municipal coffers as octroi and terminal charges' do not the Hindus make the same contributions? The Hindus of Sind have made no grievance of the Muhammadan preponderance in Local Boards and it is only natural that they should resent any effort to curtail their representation in municipal boards where they are entitled to a much larger representation than Muhammadans on account of their numbers, education and position. By all means give Muhammadans their due share of elective seats, but do not drive the wedge of separate electorates between the two sister communities."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 25th Jan.

48. Referring to the address recently presented to His Excellency the Governor by the Sind Muhammadan Association wherein it was complained that the present system of municipal elections in that province prevented them from being adequately represented on the municipal boards, the Bombay Samáchár observes that the difficulties under which the Sind Muhammadans are stated to be labouring seem, in the light of the experience in Bombay and other big cities, to be somewhat exaggerated. It remarks that the Moslem community, instead of demanding from Government special favour in this and other matters, as it has been doing for some years past, should make endeavours to secure wider diffusion of education among its members, which it believes will put an end to their present difficulties. It supports its statement by referring to the fact of a number of Muhammadans having risen to high positions in the State by means of their educational and other qualifications and to the fact of the Parsis figuring so largely on municipal boards and the local Legislative Council in spite of their extreme numerical inferiority. The paper, however, maintains that in view of the recognition in the new scheme of reforms accepted by the Congress, of the principle of fixing the proportion of Moslem representation on different public bodies, other communities will have no objection to Government conceding the demand made by the Sind Muhammadans in the address referred to above.

Complaint about arbitrary and unprecedented enhancement of income-tax in Hyderabad (Sind).
Sind Journal (9), 18th Jan.

49. "The whole town of Hyderabad has been convulsed on account of the arbitrary and unprecedented enhancement of income-tax as assessed by the Mukhtiarkar of the taluka—Mr. Ojha. Mr. Ojha in his zeal to bring into the coffers of Government as much money as he possibly could, has, presumably to be in the good books of the officials, allowed his imagination full play to conjure up a vision of unprecedented prosperity in the town. The condition of the townspeople has by no means improved after the War, but in most cases would be found to have gone worse. Yet the optimistic Mukhtiarkar has found even the most backward classes wallowing in prosperity through his official glasses and assesed many of them to pay income-tax......... The present assessment of income-tax by the Mukhtiarkar has been found to be in many cases exorbitant and arbitrary and the whole list of assessment should be thoroughly revised, if the public is to be convinced that they are paying justly and according to the law of the land. .... The public feeling about thus arbitrarily assessing the income-tax was given vent to in the mass meeting which was held at the Holmstead Hall on Sunday last under the auspices of the Citizens' Association, Hyderabad. It would have done Mr. Ojha a lot of good if he had been present at the meeting to see the unique spectacle of at least three thousands of people belonging to all castes and communities huddled together in the Hall and the verandas, swayed by one common sentiment that injustice had been done to many of them." [The paper then gives a lenthy account of the proceedings at the meeting.]

LEGISLATION.

Protest against the proposed amendment in the Court Fees Act in connection with land suits.
Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

50. Mr. R. M. Sane, Pleader, Bársi, writes to the Kesari:—The Court Fees Act Amendment Bill is shortly to come before the Imperial Legislative Council for discussion. Of all the amendments proposed by the Bill, the one in connection with fees for land suits is the most important and is likely to entail great hardship to the class of agriculturists who own land. Even under the present working of the Act the lot of the poor land owners is most miserable. And if the Court Fee is raised in the manner proposed we leave it to Government to judge for themselves how costly justice would be especially to the poor agriculturists whose interests Government want always to guard. Protests from all sides must pour in against the proposed raising of the Court Fee payable in land suits.

EDUCATION.

The Conference of Directors of Public Instruction at Delhi.
Bombay Samáchár (55), 25th and 26th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 24th Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 23rd Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 24th Jan.; Prajá Mitra and Pársi (24), 26th Jan.

51. Referring to the speech delivered by the Viceroy at the recent Conference of the Directors of Public Instruction at Delhi, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that the principle he enunciated that "no political consideration should find a place in your discussion of purely educational problems" will not fail to create a profound impression upon the public mind with regard to the educational policy of Government. It is of opinion that a successful solution of the problem of education in this country will bring His Excellency greater popularity than any other reforms he might undertake, even admitting, remarks the paper, that the main aim of the Conference was not the hatching of any new policy, still as the questions that were discussed before the Conference were such as affected the public, popular representatives should have been included in its personnel, and they should be included in similar conferences in future, as such a course will add great weight to their decisions. As one of the means of securing an adequately large number of efficient teachers who might stick to their avocation, it suggests the abolition of the present invidious distinction between the Provincial and the Indian Educational Service and of the practice of excluding competent Indian educationists from the latter. [In the subsequent issue the paper refers to the proceedings at the Conference and expresses its dissatisfaction at Mr. Godley's views in favour of instruction through the medium of the vernaculars, as in its opinion vernacular literatures are not yet in a sufficiently developed condition. It wishes that the advocates of the vernacular medium of instruction might create the necessary vernacular literature through the agency of mixed committees of officials and public leaders. It favours the suggestion about imparting education up to the "Intermidiate" class in the High Schools which course, it believes, will help to place increased educational facilities in the way of poor students. The paper then dwells on the great importance of making primary education free and compulsory and remarks that the Indian public will learn with feelings of regret and suprise the fact that that aspect of the question has not been discussed in the Conference even in a general way. According to the Sánj Vartamán the public are very thankful to His Excellency Lord Chelmsford for directing that the proceedings of the Conference should be conducted in public. While recognising the liberal character of the educational policy of the Government of India from the beginning, it believes that education has not yet made sufficient headway and that the speed at which Government wish to proceed is calculated to cause disappointment. It remarks that the greatest desire of the public is to see that primary education becomes universal in the land, and adds that it has been disappointed in its hope of receiving some joyful tidings from the Viceroy in that connection. The paper observes that much has happened since 1913 and it cannot comprehend why the educational policy declared by the Government of India in that year should not now be reconsidered with a view to introducing new reforms. Adversely commenting upon the personnel of the Conference, the Hindusthán remarks that it will not wonder if its readers will feel surprised at a conference composed entirely of foreigners sitting to consider the defects in the educational system in India. It considers it a misfortune for the people that these foreigners have so long been in charge of Educational Departments in this country. The paper then proceeds:—It is natural that foreigners can have little knowledge of our wants and our aspirations. It is their peculiar nature to keep foreigners (Indians?) dependent upon them and naturally they cannot sympathise with our national aspirations. It can be easily understood on what lines persons with such a bent of mind will run our educational system. We cannot expect much from them. If the educational system of the country is not based on a national footing in spite of an opportunity presenting itself and if, consequently, our brother countrymen remain ignorant the whole blame for it will rest on the heads of the administrators of the department. The Jám-e-Jamshed remarks that the policy of excluding recognised Indian educationists from the Conference will never receive public approbation, adding that it would not be strange if the public did not take any interest in the proceedings of such a conference. The Praja Mitra and Pársi expresses its gratification at the Director's Conference supporting the public demand for giving those Municipal and District Boards that wish for it the power to levy a special cess for the extension of primary education.]

Message (6), 21st, 25th and 26th Jan.

52. The Message, commenting on His Excellency the Viceroy's speech before the Conference of Directors of Public Instruction, declares that "the encomiums which His Excellency showered on the service are much more than they have deserved", and in a subsequent issue observes:—"The Viceroy's introductory speech at the Conference of Educational Directors was satisfactory so far as it went. We underline the closing clause, because we believe that His Excellency has omitted all reference to questions on which authoritative expression is eagerly awaited in the country. .... The representatives of India assembled at Lucknow pressed for 'self-government in education', among other things......... What has Lord Chelmsford to say in regard to this? The problem of education in India cannot be fully solved by a shirking, drifting and shifting policy.

Truths have to be boldly faced and tackled. But it is perhaps inconvenient to do so, and like a statesman, who does not want to do much, he wisely avoids going to the root of questions and emphasises aspects which are already familiar to the public and which, without committing Government to any definite policy, go a long way to raise hopes and tend to soften opposition. In speaking of education through the medium of the vernacular, His Excellency said: 'I would ask you and ask myself as University men how should we have fared in our education if it had been wholly through the medium of a foreign tongue'? We shall not spoil the effect of this pointed question by dilating on the point. The case for the teaching through the vernacular cannot be better stated in such a small compass. We shall, however, request His Excellency to ask himself a question, which arises out of the query which he has addressed to the Directors.......... Will he similarly ask himself and the Directors, what they and himself would have thought of a system of education, in the determination of which their countrymen had no voice,—a system in which all control and initiative rested with persons who were not their countrymen, who had a different civilization, whose ideals were different, and whose interests sometimes came into conflict with theirs." [In the next issue the paper, after observing that His Excellency's experience of educational work in the London County Council "will not prove of much avail" in India, goes on:—"From his speech we find no manner of encouragement to believe that the problem of education is going any more now than before to be solved in accordance with the needs and requirements of the country.......... No one will deny the value of enlisting the interest and sympathy of the general public in educational questions. But the best way of bringing home to the people the paramount importance of education is not for the half a dozen or so of European Directors of Public Instruction to meet at Simla or Delhi and deliberate within closed or quasi-closed doors.......... His Excellency has been careful to avoid misunderstanding by declaring frankly that it is not the intention of Government to go back on their past policy. The policy which it adopted in 1913 is to continue unaffected in 1917! His Excellency has recognized the need for growth in certain well-trodden directions; but such growth must wait pending the conclusion of the war and God knows how long thereafter. However, the plea for the non-inclusion of non-official Indians in the deliberations of the Conference can hardly be treated as a serious proposition. If this portion of the speech is carefully read, one would begin to suspect that His Excellency was speaking with a sense of having a heavy weight on his mind. [The paper next refers to the remarks of His Excellency on the necessity of having trained teachers and says:—] We do not mean to say that no training is necessary for teachers. But we want that training to be such as will give free play to their natural powers and not stunt them. We do not agree with His Excellency when he speaks of the training of the teachers as a matter of paramount importance, as the alpha and the omega of educational efficiency. Education has too long suffered already under the iron bands of an unduly exaggerated notion of efficiency and it is bound to continue to suffer so long as the present ideas dominate the minds of those who have got the entire direction of education in their hands. If that is one of the principal questions for which this conference has been summoned, we cannot certainly congratulate the Government of Lord Chelmsford on its wisdom."]

Mahrátta (5), 28th Jan.

53. "His Excellency said that there was no question of springing a new policy and, therefore, no non-official was admitted into the deliberations of that body. We fully trust him but we cannot follow his logic. Does he mean that non-officials should only be consulted when the policy of education is to be framed and not on any other occasion?......... On the question of the relative advantages of English and the Vernaculars as the media of instruction no Viceroy was more emphatic and outspoken than Lord Chelmsford. He frankly favoured vernaculars as the best media of instruction and said that if such a vicious system of giving instruction through a foreign tongue as now obtains in India had been in existence in England, he doubted whether Englishmen would not have abandoned the task in despair......... The difficulties invented by the officials are purely imaginary, and the Viceroy also seems to be labouring under the idea that text-books in the vernaculars cannot be had. This idea is erroneous. The Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University has shown that any subject can be taught in Bengali, and if there would arise a demand for vernacular text-books, writers of them cannot be wanting, nor would the language stop short of the mark. What is true of Bengali is equally true of any other cultured language, and we perfectly believe that if vernaculars be fixed as the media of education, the difficulty of obtaining suitable text-books can be surmounted in a very short time."

54. We agree with His Excellency in his demand that education should remain uncontaminated by politics. Had this sacred character of education been recognised by the authorities the present outcry against their policy would never have arisen and illiteracy would long have left the land. The so-called well-wishers of British rule in India foolishly scented danger to it in the spread of education in the country, with the result that it was made dearer and the study of English history was boycotted in our colleges. Radical changes being badly needed in our educational system, Government could well have availed of the present opportunity and taken into confidence our non-official educational experts such as Sir Gurudas Banerjee, Mrs. Besant, Dr. Bhandarkar, Principal Paranjpye and others. But unfortunately the Educational Department is disinclined to consult Indian public opinion as regards its policy, though this is a subject, of all others, in which Indians and Europeans can well co-operate on a footing of equality. But 'prejudices die hard', and non-official Indians are excluded from such conferences on one pretext or another. We are thus made to feel the want of Home Rule at every step. Though Home Rule is badly needed in all matters of internal administration, Government should have no objection to grant it at least so far as education is concerned. [The Prakásh writes approvingly of the advice given by His Excellency to the younger generation, but declares that their present faults can be traced to the faulty system of education under which they have been trained, for which the originators of the system are alone responsible. It points out that it is not just to give one sort of education and to look for quite another sort of results, and it appeals to His Excellency to see that racial considerations differentiating between the black and the white no longer obtrude themselves within the sacred precincts of the temple of education.]

Islámic Mail (4), 21st Jan., English edition.

55. Referring to Lady Chelmsford's "thoughtful little speech on the subject of female education" delivered at the Brahmo Balika Sikshalaya at Calcutta, the Islámic Mail remarks:—"Her Excellency has taken a deep interest in the advancement of Indian women and what with her familiar intercourse with the Hindu and Muhammadan ladies at Delhi which have already made her so popular with them and what with her association with schemes for their advancement such as the Purdah Club at Delhi and Simla, we can measure her great and lively interest in all that concerns the women of India and at the same time gauge her depth of views and insight into the delicate problems which entangle the cause of female education in India. [The paper here quotes the portion of Her Excellency's speech in which she declared that female education should proceed on lines which would inculcate the special ideals of home and its duties and that in schools for Indian girls the great gifts of the race for arts and home education should be encouraged on purely Indian lines.] We fervently hope that all those noble souls who are engaged in improving the lot of our women and yet turn out so small work in spite of all their zeal and energy will make a motto of Her Excellency's words. Our great misfortune is that our benefactors although imbued with all the lofty ideals and generous propositions for uplifting our backward classes know so little of the people and their requirements, their customs and their idiosyncracies that most of their efforts go astray and their energies are wasted. They innocently graft western methods and think that all that has proved so fruitful in their own country may equally prove beneficial here, but the differences of habits and temperaments assert themselves and nullify their noble endeavours to help our progress. This is in evidence everywhere, in politics as well as in social matters, but nowhere more so than in the case of female education where western methods have proved a complete failure and quite naturally too. The western and eastern modes of life, especially among the women, are vastly different. There is nothing in common between the two and they are as poles as under. What is regarded as a virtue in the one is regarded as a vice in the other. We want the women to take the charge of our private life, to manage the household, to bring up children, in short to be the mistresses of the hearths and take off the cares of the home from us......... Let us hope that the generous solicitude and noble efforts of the Vicereine would stimulate the promoters of female education to fresh efforts and with such high souled ladies as the Begum of Bhopal, the Maharani of Baroda, the Maharani of Vizianagram and other helpers, enligtened Lady Chelmsford may rest assured of an easy success in her noble efforts for the uplifting of these depressed of the depressed, the women of India."

Comments on the announcement of a Government grant of one lakh for scholarships for Muhammadans in Sind.
Islámic Mail (121and 4), 22nd Jan., Urdu Edition; and 28th* Jan., Eng. edition; Sind Journal (9), 18th Jan.; Muslim Herald (123), 26th Jan.

56. Referring to the address recently presented by the Muhammadans of Sind to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay, the Islámic Mail expresses its thanks to Government for granting rupees one lakh for scholarships for Muhammadan students in Sind. It takes occasion to state that the Mussalmans stand in very great need of this kind of help just at present, and it urges Government to utilise the interest accruing on the munificent gift of Haji Saboo Siddique for a similar purpose in the Presidency proper, which would go a great way in transforming the dissatisfaction caused by Government's decision in the matter of Sir Yusuf Soudagar's donation into a feeling of gratitude. [The Sind Journal remarks that both Government and the Muhammadan Community deserve to be congratulated on the fact of the grant by Government of one lakh for scholarships for Sind Muhammadans. The Islámic Mail, in its English edition, remarks :—"We are deeply indebted to His Excellency for his generous gift and hope he will help towards a settlement of Haji Sabu Siddiq's donation in the same liberal spirit, so that Muhammadan money is used to advance the cause of Moslem education which is the crying need of our community. One who helps us in it is the real friend of the Muhammadans." Referring to the grant of rupees one lakh for distribution as scholarships among the Muhammadan scholars of Sind the Muslim Herald expresses its thanks to Government on behalf of the Muhammadan community. It urges the people of Sind to take advantage of this munificent gift, and it hopes that the grant will be a recurring one.]

MUNICIPALITIES.

The Bombay Corporation and free primary education in the City.
Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

57. The Kesari declares that in view of the commanding position held by the Bombay Municipality in the whole of India, the public naturally expect it to take the lead in the matter of making primary education free and compulsory within its jurisdiction. It, therefore, regrets to see the attitude taken by the Corporation with regard to the question inasmuch as it is likely to affect the future of primary education in the whole of India. It, therefore, appeals to the Corporation to reconsider the matter in view of the many public meetings that are being held in Bombay on the question.

The period for submitting objections to the town planning scheme for Bhamburda (Poona) should be extended.
Kesari (95), 23rd Jan.

58. The Government Notification regarding the town-planning of Bhamburda, near Poona, published in the Government Gazette, dated the 28th December 1916, and notifications published by the Poona Municipality in the Dnyán Prakásh and elsewhere do not seem to have served the purpose for which they were meant, inasmuch as they were not published in such a way as to draw to them the attention of the people of Bhamburda who have to submit their objections to Government before the 28th of January 1917. The Government Notification in the Gazette is in English and the Municipal President's type-written notification, which was affixed at a few places in Bhamburda and which was also published in the Dnyán Prakásh, is also in English and moreover bears no date. There has thus been a misunderstanding as to the date before which the objections are to be submitted. Under these circumstances we request Government to extend the period for submitting objections. We would also suggest that the non-official members of the Poona Municipality should enlighten the people of the village on the nature of this new piece of legislation to secure their co-operation in working out the scheme. The Poona Municipality should prepare a scheme of its own since it will be less costly and more agreeable to the poor people concerned than the one prepared by Government experts.

Comments on the making of primary education free and compulsory in Bhopál State.

Muslim Herald (123), 26th Jan.

59. In the course of a highly eulogistic article on the beneficient activities of Her Highness the Begum of Bhopál especially in the cause of spreading education among her own subjects and the people of India generally the Muslim Herald states that Her Highness has set the seal of triumph on her endeavours by making elementary education free and compulsory in her State. It holds that this statesmanlike act of hers will be an additional argument for imparting free and compulsory education in India.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the Report of the Public Services Commission.

Young India (11), 31st Jan.

1. Writing in Young India "V. R." describes the Report of the Public Services Commission as a singularly one-sided and inept affair and remarks:—"If at the beginning of the outbreak of the war, it was considered unfit to be published, all the greater reason now why it should not have been thrown at the head of the people at this stage. On account of the disappointment over the indifferent treatment accorded to this country in the matter of the War Conference and the discontent due to various other causes, the public mind is in such a condition that there would not have been a greater mistake on the part of Government than the publication of this report.......... We do not know if the publication of the antiquated findings of the Commission is intended to try further the patience of a patient people. Whatever may be the case, the people of this country will, we have no doubt, treat the report as absolutely impossible. If there is one noteworthy feature in the majority's findings it is the offensively egotistic assumption of racial superiority. Throughout the report, this feeling of superiority of Europeans over non-Europeans obtrudes on one's notice much more frequently than is desirable. It is further assumed that the Indian Civil Service and allied services are the monopoly of Europeans and there is a too obvious reluctance to admit the indisputable right of the children of the soil to even a small share in the administration of their own country. Whatever the Indian Civil Service may have achieved—we do not deny that it has some fine work to its credit—in the past, it has degenerated in the present day into a rigid super-caste, as all closely organized and jealous bodies tend to do in the long run. And it is a mistake to flatter it into the belief that it is indispensable. On the contrary, it could be tolerable only so long as the present irresponsible and bureaucratic form of Government lasts. It is strange that the Commissioners who insist on the European monopoly of the Civil Service of the country as well as on its indispensable character should have failed to recognize the lesson which history has to teach. The domination of one people over another can only last so long as the other people have no national consciousness. Once the seed of this consciousness has been sown and it has begun to blossom, the domination must necessarily evaporate into thin air.......... In other respects, the report mainly concerns itself with various details about the pay and emoluments of office, and a string of recommendations it put forward proposing the raising of pay here, the increase of pension there and better facilities for leave in a third place. Welcome as these are from the point of view of those whose pockets they will fill, they have for the Indian taxpayer this sinister significance that the Commissioners show a reckless disregard of the crushing financial effects which would follow were the changes now proposed given effect to.......... We will be failing in our duty if we did not congratulate Mr. Rahim on the very able and courageous manner in which he has fought for the rights of his countrymen. India ought to be and is proud of this son who has borne aloft the sacred banner of her rights against great odds. It is a thousand pities that the cruel hand of death snatched away prematurely from his side his great leader. It is true that the views expressed by Mr. Rahim were largely shared and even virtually approved by the departed patriot. Still had he lived, he would have been a veritable tower of strength to our cause in the Commission and in the anxious and trying moments, when Mr. Rahim was left alone to fare an adverse majority, and the difficult situation created by the attitude taken up for unexpected reasons by Mr. Chaubal, his leadership and wisdom would have stood Mr. Rahim in good stead. It was a great trust committed to the hands of the Indian members of the Commission; Mr. Chaubal has failed to justify that trust and has rendered a positive disservice to his countrymen. The report is a singularly unhappy expression of the vast gulf that divides opinion in regard to the essentials of Indian administration as between Indians and non-Indians among whom are the Anglo-Indians. And we would strongly recommend Government to relegate it to a secure and undisturbed place on the upper shelves of its Secretariat record-room and there let it rest for ever."

Message (6), 30th and 31st Jan.

2. "Such is indeed the letter and the spirit of the recommendations made by the majority that it would be distinctly for the good if the report is consigned to the limbo of oblivion which it so richly deserves. The only redeeming feature of the whole report is the well informed criticism of Justice Abdur Rahim, who has shown that if in 1893, the time had come for holding the competitive examinations in England and India simultaneously, it is now long overdue. Perhaps, as many people have come to the conclusion, the time has now come for holding the examination solely in India. That is the only remedy for all the evils from which the administration of this country is suffering and the position which has hitherto existed must be thoroughly reversed. Indians should no longer be treated as beggars at their own doors.......... We do not wish to ascribe motives to anybody, but on reading through the report with the more than ordinary care it deserves, we have come to the definite conclusion that the Commissioners are by no means well disposed towards any policy that would break the sole monopoly which Europeans have enjoyed in the Indian Services from the early days of the East India Company.......... We do not blame Government for what happened in the past. But we now demand that it shall no longer be repeated.......... Those who read the signs of the times aright will perceive that the current of discontent has already gathered such volume and force as to make it inexpedient to resist it both on the ground of justice and statesmanship. He who fails to take timely note of it and raise a finger of warning against neglecting it is a traitor both to England and India; for he does thereby a great harm to the cause of both the countries." [In its next issue the paper says:—"The majority have recommended that approximately three-quarters of the number of posts in the superior branches of the Educational Service, both collegiate and administrative, should be recruited for in Europe and one-quarter in India. It is difficult to imagine whether it is the opinion of the majority that the superior branch of the Indian Educational Service should be filled by men selected not only in England, but in France, Germany, Spain and Turkey. In this land of miracles, so many strange things happen that we need not wonder if in the future the task of civilising the 'politically backward communities of India' is jointly shared by all the European peoples including of course our Turkish brethren who are as much European, if it denotes a geographical expression as the Portuguese or the Scandinavians. Presumably for this purpose, the Commission would have three-fourths of the number approximately, that means a little more again if you please, reserved for recruitment in Europe. But they are generous enough to recognize the Indian claim for more and more appointments and have, therefore, suggested that 'as new posts are created, recruitment in Europe and India should be so adjusted that the additional officers will be taken half from the one country and half from the other'. Of course, the existing cadre is not to be disturbed and a half and half share is thinkable only as a new harvest begins to be gathered. For the time being, however, the granary will be closed against all non-Europeans, though they may pick up the scatterings round about."]

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 4th Feb., Eng. cols.

*3. "The report on the face of it has come as a serious disappointment to the country on the very morrow of her awakening.......... More than even the rejection of the proposal of simultaneous examinations the inglorious failure to 'make positive recommendations' and the attempt to baulk the clear issue on the functions of the judicial and executive branches will cause serious heart-burning. The keen dissatisfaction that the system arouses is admitted, yet administrative exigencies are relied upon 'to carry the process of separation further, stage by stage.' The public have little faith in such evolution. The bureaucracy is notorious for its tenacity for power and to the Indian it is difficult to conceive of the Anglo-Indian letting his hold go off that power. Nothing will go so much to discredit the report as this failure to decide an issue on which the Commission had the clearest possible terms of reference and for a sensible solution of which the public had long looked......... We should think much of the now precious paper and ink would be saved if the Secretary of State and the Government of India immediately declared that in view of the change in the angle of vision and the obsoleteness of the report itself they did not propose to work upon its recommendations."

Indian Social Reformer (3), 4th Feb.

*4. "One of the weakest features of the Report is, indeed, the reckless zeal with which increases of salaries to officers already drawing high pay have been recommended. The Commissioners recommend that there should be no more recruiting for the Indian Finance Department in England (we cannot understand why they presistently use 'Europe' to designate the United Kingdom), but for the present they do not recommend the adoption of a similar course in respect of the Customs Department, 'owing to the large share in the trade of the seaports held by Europeans.' If this principle be sound, the appointment of Director of Agriculture must be held by a Koli, that of Veterinary Superintendent by a Mahar, that of Excise Commissioner by a Bhandari, of Comptroller of Currency by a Marwari, and the Inspector-General of Police by a Chapparband or a Ghantichor. Sometimes the inconsequential irrelevance of the Commissioners is such as to provoke ridicule."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 29th and 31st Jan.; Hindusthán (17), 29th and 31st Jan. and 2nd Feb.; Navsári Patrika (66), 28th Jan.

5. Referring to the Report of the Indian Public Service Commission, the Bombay Samáchár remarks that the lines of progress that were thought sufficient for India before the war have grown obsolete now and adds that if the narrow principles of pre-war days are still adhered to it will give a great shock to the new aspirations that have grown up in the minds of the public. It observes that the Commission has failed to rise above the old condition of things for the improvement of which it was appointed and has kept unredeemed the promises made to the Indian public through royal proclamations and for the fulfilment of which they were looking forward through the results of the Commission. The paper deprecates the Commission's opposition to the demand made by the Indian public for simultaneous examinations and expresses the hope that this view of the Commission will not find favour with the higher authorities. It does not approve of the system of recruitment for the Civil Service recommended by the Commission and remarks that merit should be the only criterion for admission to the service. [In the subsequent issue the paper quotes from the Report of the Commission the percentage of Indians employed in State service in different grades and remarks that these figures will show that the principle embodied in the Queen's proclamation for observing no distinction of caste, colour or creed in the public service has not been translated into action. It objects to the principle of fixing proportions for Europeans and Indians and remarks that if high merits be not made the only test for entering the public services the Indians will scarcely prefer to have a larger share in them than at present at the sacrifice of the efficiency of those services. The Hindusthán refers to the Commission's recommendations fixing the proportion of Indians to be employed in different State departments and urging that recruitment should be made at present in England for particular departments but that ultimately it should take place in India, etc., and remarks that India will not now rest satisfied with such half-hearted measures and with recommendations loaded with such deceptive conditions. It observes that India has cried herself hoarse, but she has not been able to make herself heard. What is the alternative, inquires the paper, when those who have ears will not hear and those who have got eyes will not see? It is for this reason, it adds, that India has begun to make her demand for Home Rule. Continuing its comments upon the Report in its subsequent issue the paper remarks that the members of the Indian Civil Service are known in some quarters as the ruling class or clan for this reason that they have formed themselves into a body, a touch to one portion of which is known to vibrate the whole. It maintains that [illegible] has opposed the proposal for holding simultaneous examinations [illegible] in India and England because its members were haunted by the [illegible] of the possible harm that would be done to vested interests if the proposal was acceded to. It also remarks that the reduction recommended by the Commission in the age limit for I. C. S. Examintion is likely to be interpreted as an attempt to debar the Indians entirely from the service. The paper hopes that the Secretary of State for India will not accept the perverse recommendations made by the Commission but will deal with the aspirations of the Indians in a liberal spirit. Commenting further upon the subject in its issue of the 2nd February the paper takes the opportunity to refer to the rumour that it was the disappointing recommendations contained in the ill-fated Report which plunged the late Mr. Gokhale in deep despair and hastened his death. The Navsari Pátrika remarks that the "precious" recommendations made by the Public Services Commission have spread great disappointment everywhere. It observes that if the Commission had devoted only a thousandth part of the trouble they have taken to sing the praises of the work done by Government, to gladdening the hearts of the Indian people the loyal Indian nation would have been highly pleased.]

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 29th, Eng. and ver. cols., and 31st Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 27th Jan.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 29th and 30th Jan.

6. Commenting upon the report of the Royal Commission on the Public Services in India the Praja Mitra and Pársi remarks:—"We do not imagine that there will be any great controversy on this report, which is so evidently conservative in its angle of vision and which is so out-of-date in its halting and half-hearted recommendations.......... When the report says that 'in many of our recommendations the spirit of his (the late Mr. Gokhale's) counsels will be found reflected', we feel that this is merely a self-compliment which the Commissioners need not have taken; the 'spirit of his counsels' is better reflected in the minute of Mr. Justice Abdul Rahim.......... No doubt a careful reading of the contents of the report shows the Commissioners' solicitude to be just and careful of the rights of Indians; but the requisite spirit of statesmanship is conspicuous in its absence.......... If the soul of India is to be satisfied, it wants more nourishing corn than is vouchsafed in the coldly critical and unimaginative pages of a report that abounds in details but lacks in statement of general principles. It pays too much attention to the retention of Englishmen in the various public services and this is a fundamental misconception which vitiates the whole report.... We really looked for something more definite; instead, we get a sort of mathematical puzzle, with proportions that are disproportionate and scales of salaries that are more like tempting bunches of grapes than substantial food. The Aitchison Commission on Public Services, appointed as far back as 1886, i. e., more than thirty years ago—recommended the larger employment of Indians in the Public Services; but that was thirty years ago. Is the Islington Commission only a new edition of the Aitchison Commission; a few more openings here; a little more pay there; a new classification in this service and a new system of recruitment in another? Is that all? What India waited anxiously for was for a big jump forward; a new policy based on a just appreciation of the merits and claims of Indians, rather than a mere revision of antiquated policy founded on efficiency of administration and 'the necessity on various grounds, of retaining an adequate European element'. The result of all this need not be stated any further than in the well-known words which we have placed at the heading of this article 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.'" [In its Gujarati columns the paper remarks that in the face of the Commissioners' own declaration to the effect that Englishmen of first rate abilities refuse to come out to India, their advocacy of the principle of maintaining the British element in a large proportion in the higher grades of Government service will not be regarded as justifiable. It cannot comprehend how the employment of Indians in larger numbers would militate against British policy and principles when the latter have been all along breathing in British literature and are nurtured in the atmosphere of British traditions. In its issue of the 31st January the paper observes that it is only natural that the London Times should praise the Commission's recommendations regard being had to Sir Valentine Chirol's connection with that paper and his relations with the Round Table. It, however, declares that the Times being now known to be a party organ, its lucubrations will not have any weight with the more thoughtful sections of the British public. The paper regrets that Reuter's agency has, while cabling in detail the opinion of the Times, avoided noticing the views of the Liberal and Labourite organs. The Sánj Vartamán, while appreciating some of the recommendations made by the Commission, remarks that the report, taken as a whole, will fail to create any impression on the minds of the public. It is of opinion that the Secretary of State for India and the Indian Government have committed a mistake in publishing such a report at the present juncture. The principle, they have enunciated, of fixing proportions for Englishmen and Indians, with regard to recruitment for the public services will increase, instead of diminishing, public discontent. While expressing gratification at the separate minute made by the Honourable Mr. Chaubal, it wishes that he had not signed the report at all because by signing it, he has endorsed the general principles laid down by the Commission. It observes that the Indian public are thankful to Mr. Chaubal for the honesty of purpose with which he has represented the case of India, in which connection the paper gives the palm to Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim. The Jám-e-Jamshed also does not approve of the recommendation of the Commission for the retension of a large proportion of Britishers in the superior grades of the State services in India. Referring to the Commission's refusal to favour the holding of simultaneous examinations for the I. C. S., the paper supports Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim in holding that the Commissioners are not right in their view that India does not afford adequate facilities for the study of the subjects prescribed for the I. C. S. examination. It, however, expresses its gratification at the recommendation for making nine appointments for the Civil Service directly from India. In its subsequent issue the paper refers to the personnel of the Commission and inquires how Indian interests could be expected to be safeguarded when the leader of the Round Table, Sir Valentine Chirol, was included in its composition with Lord Ronaldshay, Sir Theodore Morrison, Mr. Sly and others to support him. It then enumerates the suggestions the London Times threw out for the benefit of the Commission at the time of its appointment in 1912 and expresses the opinion that the present recommendations of the Commission are but a revised edition of those suggestions. The paper believes that the people will receive with sorrow the recommendation made for reducing the present age-limit for the I. C. S. Examination and declares that it would be no exaggeration to say that the proposal amounts to entirely closing the doors of the I. C. S. against the Indians. The paper then goes on to remark that the Indians are thankful to Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim for his services to India as a member of the Commission. It also compares the complaint raised by the Anglo-Indian press against the Commission's recommendations to the crocodile's tears shed by an old woman over the death of her young co-wife who monopolised the affection of the husband.

Gujaráti (13), 28th Jan.

7. India has advanced by leaps and bounds since the appointment of the Public Services Commission and its report which has recently been published is therefore fitly considered to be antiquated and out of date. Such a report can never be expected to meet with the approval of the Indian people; it might be preserved as a curiosity on the shelves of the India Office. India now wants to boycott civilians from the Executive Councils and it further wants Swarájya and not a rule according to the wishes of the Civilians. At such a juncture this Commission, as if it was crushing India under an Himalayan mountain-load of favours, recommends the allotment of 25 per cent. of the total number of posts to Indians! It does not favour simultaneous Civil Service Examinations even though the House of Commons had recommended such a step in 1893. It is highly surprising that the Commission has pronounced no opinion on the question of the separation of the judicial and executive functions. The solution of which has been repeatedly demanded by Indian opinion and the urgency of which is recognised by the Government of India. The mountain in labour has brought forth a mouse! It is now high time a fresh Commission was appointed for conducting a new enquiry.

Sandesh (103), 1st Feb.; Kesari (95), 30th Jan.; Dnydn Prakdsh (34), 30th Jan. and 1st Feb.; Prakdsh (102), 31st Jan.

8. The Commission's Report gives us practically nothing, which was what we had expected from the very first. The Indian public wanted Government not to publish the Report in view of the high expectations raised by India's participation in the war, but they have disregarded the suggestion and have dared to give publicity to the utterly worthless recommendations of the Commission. As the country now wants Home Rule, nobody need take the trouble even to discuss the Report. We are not at all surprised at the utterly unsatisfactory character of the recommendations, but we are pained at the fact that the Honourable Mr. Chaubal should have dared to sign it. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim and the Honourable Mr. Chaubal are both sons of Ind, but it is most shameful that while the former should have had the good sense to discharge his debt to his mother-land, the latter should have been fatuous enough to deny that obligation. That the Honourable Mr. Chaubal could not go against the wishes of the nine European members indeed shows commendable moral courage! But what could Mr. Chaubal do when even Bhishma and Drona, the Puranic heroes, had to forsake the righteous cause for the sake of the salt they had eaten! Fortunately, however, for India, Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim, though similarly circumstanced, was not tempted to say ditto to the other Commissioners and has thus shown a spirit of sterling independence worthy of the utmost praise. The Report will serve to confirm the general opinion that these Commissions are appointed only to baulk the fulfilment of the people's aspirations. [The Kesari remarks:—Our benign Government might perhaps have thought that Indians were waiting on the tiptoe of expectation for the Report, but we beg to assure them that nobody cared for it as no good was expected therefrom. The Commission was, as a matter of fact, only an attempt to hypnotise the people for a time. A brave show was indeed made and hundreds of witnesses were examined and the final act closed with the retirement of the Commissioners to the cool breezes of England for drawing the necessary inspiration to write the Report; but all the while the people of India were simply laughing in their sleeves at the grand jugglery that was being gone through. [Here the paper refers briefly to the former Service Commissions and to the simultaneous examination resolution passed by Parliament to show how they all failed and goes on:—] Misfortune has been dogging the steps of India, and whatever recommendations have been made for its welfare have been put an end to by a stab in the dark before they could be acted upon. The present Commission's recommendations are not worth even the paper on which they are printed, and we wish it had not been appointed at all as that would have saved India an enormous waste of public money and time. We indeed feel shame, though Government may not do so, at the fact, that the rotten thing the Commission has brought forth does not furnish even a shred of evidence in proof of the sentiments of justice actuating Government. On the contrary, though the Commissioners have throughout the Report pompously proclaimed their intention to do away with the colour distinction in the public services, it may safely be said that they have by their own recommendations imprinted that distinction in flaming characters on the face of the British administration in India. The Dnydn Prakdsh also declares that the Report ought to have been shelved as its publication has only given rise to general discontent. It expresses surprise that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, Mr. Fisher and Sir Theodore Morison from whom much was expected by the Indian public should have in the main supported the Report of the majority. It goes on:—Though the Honourable Mr. Chaubal has signed the majority report, his minute of dissent shows that he disagrees in many of its retrograde recommendations. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim's minute alone reflects the real public opinion of the country. The Commissioners talk about the necessity of maintaining the British tone in the administration in justification of their recommendation for having an overwhelming proportion of Englishmen in the higher branches of the Services, but we doubt if that tone can be maintained by means of the men now recruited in England who show a great falling off from the old standard of merit. That is one of the reasons for the new demand for holding all the examinations in India alone. In a subsequent issue the Dnyán Prakásh expresses itself utterly dissatisfied with the recommendations of the Commission as regards the Civil Service Examination and says:—If there be any truth in the solemn pledges given over and over to India by our sovereigns, then the authorities must be prepared to carry them out even if the number of British officers in the administration be reduced to the vanishing point. The scheme proposed for recruiting one-fourth of the Civil Service men in India will never be accepted by Indians as they will permanently occupy a lower position. The wonder is that though Indians have all along been against having entrance into the Civil Service by the back-door and demand open competition, the Commission has thought it fit to recommend the former course for their acceptance. The reduction of the age-limit for the examination in England by three years as proposed by the Commission in open disregard of the opinions of the University authorities in England will practically close that avenue to Indian students in spite of certain concessions proposed to be granted in their case. The Prakásh also condemns the report as most unsatisfactory and calls upon the people to openly express their disapprobation of its recommendations, which it declares to be of an utterly retrograde character.]

Comments on the selections made to represent India on the Imperial War Conference.
Young India (11), 31st Jan.

9. Commenting upon the selections made to assist the Secretary of State on the Imperial War Confe rence, Young India remarks:—"Capable as are the gentlemen selected by the Governor-General in Council, none of them can be considered as the people's representative. The selection of Sir James Meston is distinctly unsatisfactory and unfortunate especially in view of the fact that he has been associated with a mischievous and ill-conceived political movement.......... It is no doubt true that one official is as good as another, and in ordinary circumstances it would not have mattered much whether this, that or any other official had been nominated. But having regard to the character of Mr. Curtis' political mission and Sir James Meston's part in it, we do not think that his selection reflects much credit on the political sagacity of the Government of India. It has been felt and will continue to be felt as a grave insult to public opinion, and it is extremely galling to the sense of Indian self-respect that a man who, without any compunction whatsoever countenanced a sinister political movement should be sent as one of India's representatives. With regard to the Maharaja of Bikaner, we do not wish to say much. The Maharaja is an able ruler and has proved himself to be a statesman of broad and liberal views. Personally, therefore, his selection is welcomed. What is not clear in his case is whether he goes to the Conference as the accredited representative of the Ruling Chiefs or merely at the pleasure of the Government of India, to speak for himself and nobody else. We cannot also regard with equanimity the fact that a great Indian Ruler may not have an honoured place at the Conference, but merely act as a 'companion'.......... We think we may safely assume that he (Sir S. P. Sinha) will not fail to impress on the Secretary of State the need for safeguarding adequately India's interests. The only fear is that because he has now reverted to the official line, he might not feel himself quite so free to plead the cause of his countrymen with a narrow-visioned Secretary of State......... Assuming, however, that he were the unqualified representative and chief spokesman of Indian officialdom, any idea that he is ipso facto the representative of Indian India must be repudiated. The scant attention which Mr. George has given to the subject of India is sorely disappointing."

Kesari (95), 30th Jan.

10. The Kesari congratulates His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner upon his being selected by Government, inasmuch as he deserves the honour for having distinguished himself by taking a prominent part at the recent Chiefs' Conference at Delhi and by rendering important services to the Empire on the battlefields of France and Egypt. The paper, however, accords a very qualified approval to the selection of Sir S. P. Sinha, as it doubts very much if his over-cautiousness and extreme moderation will allow him sufficiently to press India's claims at the Conference. As to Sir James Meston it takes strong objection to his selection, declaring that the people of India have now lost confidence in him on account of his association with the Round Table group of Colonial politicians who want to bring India under the yoke of the Colonies, and remarks that Sir Benjamin Robertson would have been a better selection. It then refers to the many other questions of grave importance that are likely to come before the war Conference for settlement and observes that it was absolutely necessary that a member who would have taken a resolute stand against the Colonies should have been selected. It, therefore, regards the selection of Sir James Meston who has espoused the cause of the Colonies as dangerous as the entrusting of the keys of one's safe to a thief would be.

Gujaráti (13), 28th Jan.

11. While India has secured representation on the Imperial War Conference, she is, unfortunately, not on the same footing as the self-governing colonies. The representatives of the colonies are responsible to their constituents while the Secretary of State is in no may responsible to India; neither are the people of India in a position to refuse to abide by any decision the Secretary of State might arrive at adverse to the interests of India. Thus the Indians have got King Stork instead of King Log. The Secretary of State will be more inclined to safeguard British interests than those of India, and so England may be said to have in him an additional representative on the Conference. The Indian representatives, whose selection has been recently announced, will merely advice the Secretary of State and he is naturally likely to be influenced solely by the representative of the bureaucracy in the person of Sir James Meston. The Maharaja of Bikaner knows very little of international politics and his presence on the Conference will not materially help India. It is said the Maharaja has been selected to accompany the Secretary of State. Does the Secretary of State mean to take him with himself to the Conference to add to his prestige? Is the representative of the Indian States, whose population makes up one-third of the whole of India, to be an ornamental appendage to this Secretary of State? Verily the native rulers of India are held in very high honour. The selection of Sir Satyandra Sinha is a somewhat desirable feature of the choice of Government, but he is merely to advise the Secretary of State! Under the circumstances we doubt whether the people of India will gladly accept any fresh responsibility which the Secretary of State may be instrumental in imposing on India.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 30th Jan.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 29th and 30th Jan., Eng. cols.

12. The Bombay Samáchár, while expressing gratification at the appointment of the three Indian representatives at the Imperial War Conference, asks Government to clear up certain misunderstandings that have arisen with regard to the position they will occupy at the Conference and to make a definite pronouncement on the question. [The Sánj Vartamán expresses hope that full justice will be done to the claims of India at the Conference by allowing her representatives to sit as the equals of those of the self-governing Colonies. In the subsequent issue the paper writes in its English columns:—" The allotment of a definite place to India in the Imperial Conference is a distinct gain.......... She will now have an accredited representative at the Conference. The questions before the previous meetings, though of great moment, did not involve the tremendous issues of vital consequence to the Empire which will be discussed by this Conference. It meets in a moment of crisis. It has quickened the sense of organic union between the various parts of the Empire. A sense of common danger has awakened them to that of common interests. In a word, it has welded them together, as no other circumstance could possibly have done. It has revealed the potentialities of India as an invaluable unit of the Empire.......... The Colonies have come to a better understanding of the position and importance of India in the scheme of Empire, and it is hoped that it will go far to improve the relations between India and the Dominions. Out of the war will arise an Imperial Union, mighty and resourceful, and capable of meeting any possible combination, in the cause of humanity and civilization."]

All the powers are now at heart wishing for peace.
Shri Saydji Vijaya (105), 1st Feb.

13. Remarking that the peace talk has naturally slackened the ardour of the belligerent powers which have all been exhausted and maintaining that only one desire, viz., that of peace now dominates the whole world, the Shri Saydji Vijaya observes:—Everybody realises that it is in the interests of all that peace should be concluded but the difficulty is, who is to break the ice! Thus, no other noteworthy news is forthcoming excepting that we advanced or retreated a few yards on the different fronts, that our condition is improving, that the condition of our enemies is getting worse, etc. Yet, if there is anything that has been attracting attention during the last few days it is with regard to the German submarine activity. A number of steamers are destroyed every week and yet it is apprehended that the Germans are making endeavours to build hundreds of new submarines. Their object in so doing is stated to be to impose a blockade upon England, and that is not unlikely. However, it is also difficult to understand how it is possible for them to build hundreds of submarines in the bustle of the present war. The nations of the whole world now wish that the present lull in the activities might develop into a lasting peace.

Comments on Germany's threat to the neutrals of unrestricted submarinism.
Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 3rd Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 3rd Feb.

14. Commenting upon Germany's threat to neutral countries of unrestricted submarinism, the Praja Mitra and Pársi writes:—We seem to be passing through the last phase of the war which is expected to terminate by the end of May next. Germany has become desperate and its threat to sink all neutral shipping is tantamount to declaring war against them. The threat has created a sensation in America and the attitude of Spain and Holland will greatly depend upon the stand America takes. The defiance which Germany has been hurling against America is partly due to the weakness of her military preparations, and even if America joins the war she will not be in a position to render material help to the Allies from the military point of view. We must be prepared to encounter German brutality of a still worse type than the existing one with the firm hope that the Allies will score a victory within a few months. [The Jám-e-Jamshed expresses its confidence in the ability of the Allied Navy to cope with the threatened submarine menace. It believes President Wilson will be driven to break diplomatic relations with Germany and hopes that the war will come to a speedy and victorious end.]

German schemes for undermining loyalty to the British Government in India.
Islámic Mail (4), 28th Jan., Eng. edition.

15. "The Rheinisch-Westfolische Zeitung, a daily newspaper owned by the Krupp firm at Essen, has written frankly on the subject of undermining British authority in India. It admits that 'to raise a great rebellion in India in these days is a very difficult undertaking.' The German missionaries have been abruptly removed from their spheres of usefulness, and the writer suggests the employment of other missionaries, 'not of German nationality, but of known German sympathies.' They will have to walk warily because the Government of India are 'more or less on the alert.' We fear that these good people will not have the freedom of the road very long, walk they ever so warily. But the German paper expects that 'a vigorous patriotism, coupled with an active brain and the will for freedom' will achieve anything; 'should these three attributes be wanting, religious and national fanaticism might offer a very good substitute. This should be sought first among the Muhammadans and afterwards among the Hindus. German agents will move among the people as neutrals, or even as Englishmen, and will work slowly and steadily.' A leading Berlin newspaper, the Tagliche Rundschau, says a German Indian Association should be established before the end of the war, and it will deprive England of her remaining influence in India. Several other cunning devices are suggested......... India's reply to German intrigue will be found in the armed Indian hosts fighting for the Empire, and the enthusiasm with which the Princes and people of India have rallied round the British flag."

Reflections on the reorganisation of the Empire after the war.

Gujaráti (13), 28th Jan.

16. Writing at length on England and the Empire the Gujaráti says:—It is not necessary for England to be burdened with the anxiety of the administration of India. England should take steps to make Indians responsible for their own administration. The difficulties of England are in a measure due to her own neglect in this resppect. England does not bear the burden of the anxieties without receiving any recompense; she is amply compensated for her troubles. Had England allowed the Colonies, Egypt and India to have their own navies the German raiders would never have been able to cause so much destruction to commerce. Similarly if Indians had been given military training there would have been no lack of men to fight for England and if the free trade policy had not been followed to the advantage of Germany and other countries and to the detriment of indigenous industries, India would have supplied abundant munitions for the war. We do not think that the establishment of the Council of the Empire will be in any way conducive to the welfare or solidarity of its different constituents. The decisions of the Council will be carried by majority and under such an arrangement what would be the fate of India? It would be in the best interests of the Empire that England should have the power to decide questions of international politics. But if a Council of the Empire is established and it is allowed to deal direct with foreign countries all would have to abide by its action without demur, and trouble is sure to arise therefrom. In the proposed reorganisation each part of the Empire should be given freedom to develop its own resources on its own lines and to provide for its own Army and Navy. The Colonies enjoy this privilege, and it should now be extended to India and Egypt.

India's duty to help the Empire wholeheartedly in the present struggle.

Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 29th and 31st Jan.

17. The Akhbár-e-Islám publishes, in two instalments, what is presumably a translation of a letter addressed to it by Mawlana Pir Sayyed Gulam Hussain of Siyorcape, Bhopal State, for publication, wherein the writer, after describing how General Lake, on taking possession of Delhi in 1803, evolved order out of chaos, dwells upon the various benefits that have accrued to India as a result of the British rule, e. g., the introduction of Education, Railways, the Postal System, Telegraphs, Police, Local self-Government, etc. He lays stress particularly upon the freedom of religion enjoyed by the Indian people and remarks that the public cannot feel sufficiently grateful for such a beneficent administration. He asks both Hindus and Muhammadans under what other rule so much happiness could be enjoyed. He reminds them that for all these boons they are indebted to the British crown. The Maulana then goes on to refer to the present war and exhorts the Indians wholeheartedly to help the Empire with men and money in the present struggle not only out of gratitude to the British administration but for the security of their own comforts and happiness. He maintains that if they fail in this duty of theirs they will be stigmatised as an ungrateful nation. The writer concludes by praying for a glorious victory to Great Britain in the war.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 2nd Feb.

18. Mr. Jahangirshah A. Taliarkhan of Surat writes to the Praja Mitra and Pársi exhorting the people to subscribe to the War and Relief Funds and to help Government in all possible ways with a view to bringing the war to a successful termination. He dwells upon the benefits of British rule and the peace and prosperity enjoyed by India under British suzerainty and calls upon the people of India to discharge their obligations towards their rulers. He is of opinion that those who will contribute freely to the War Fund will have helped to keep their own countrymen secure from slavery, oppression, treachery and assassination. He declares that for decades he has been proclaiming it as his firm conviction—a conviction to which he still adheres as strongly as ever—that India could not have got and will never get a Government better than British. The writer, further, expresses the opinion that his countrymen will have to rue it dearly if they will not now help Britain in stamping out the few "anarchists" that exist in the country by giving information against them. He dwells on the great love he bears to his country, and declares that it is that very love which impels him to the exhortation that none should harass the British Government in any way if the country is to be saved from calamities and its independence is to be preserved. He asks how the German "Hun" can be expected to respect the lives and independence of others when he has proved faithless to the Royal House of England to which he is related by ties of blood. The writer, accordingly, exhorts Indians to strengthen the hands of their just rulers in putting down their deadly foe.

The proposed Indian War Loan.
Praja Bandhu (27), 28th Jan.

19. Commenting upon the proposed Indian War Loan, the Praja Bandhu writes:—The Indian War Loan will be as attractive as the British War Loan. We wish, however, that the announcement had been made a little later or a little earlier. In the former case there would have arisen no necessity of raising the Indian loan if it was found that the British loan had been well supported by the Indian public. In the latter case Government would have been able to gauge the full extent of the support given by India to the Empire. The communiqué issued in connection with the Indian loan leaves us in doubt as to whether the amount subscribed is to be presented to England on behalf of India or is to be given as a loan. We would very much like the point to be cleared up at the time of the publication of the Indian Budget.

Sir James Meston's explanation about his participation in the Round Table consultation.
Message (6), 1st and 2nd Feb.

20. "Sir James has cut a very sorry figure in attempting to explain away his by no means happy alliance with Mr. Curtis. The explanation itself is no explanation at all; it is an attempt merely at glossing over things and evading the issues, which were raised in the Honourable Mr. Motilal Nehru's interpellations........... The point we have immediately to consider is whether the alliance of Sir James Meston and his indispensable chela the Honourable Mr. Marris was so simple a thing as is now represented by those two notabilities.......... Sir James has admitted that the Government of India is of opinion that officers should not in future be members of the Round Table groups in India (the italics are ours). But what about the past? Are the breakers of rule and discipline—not to use a stronger expression—are they to go scot-free?.......... For all one knows about Mr. Marris, he is a high Government servant drawing a fat salary and no more. He is in no sense an exponent of Indian ideas and hopes nor is he the spokesman of Indians.......... He is bound to accept without demur and follow the orders of Government whether right or wrong. If on the other hand, he wants to retain his individual rights, his only business is to resign the service. But he cannot retain the one and enjoy the other.......... The same remarks apply more or less to what his Honor Sir James Meston said.......... Sir James may be an old friend of Mr. Curtis for all that the public care and he might as well invite him to come to India, to stay at the United Provinces Government House for a few days, enjoy his hospitality, admire the princely magnificience and regal splendour in which a Lieutenant Governor lives and go back the way he came mightily well pleased. But beyond this, propriety forbade that either of them should go.......... Sir James says that he hoped that Englishmen and Indians brought together in friendly discussion in various parts of India might have hammered out a solution of our (?) more difficult problems. But where was the necessity of importing Mr. Curtis if that was the object? Were there not enough Englishmen in India who would have done better? Is Mr. Curtis such a superman as to help by his bewitching personality and [illegible] people, Englishmen and Indians, into hammering out a solution ?... .... The crowning part of the explanation is that where he speaks of what the Government of India think. The opinion is qualified by the words 'in view of the misunderstanding'. Misunderstanding on whose part? Is it on the part of the Government servants whose complicity in the movement has been discovered or on the part of the people? The point is made more vague still. The Government of India considers that officials should not be members of the Round Table groups in India (note the italics). So, it means that officials should not be members of the groups in India; but they can become or continue as members of groups outside India, and in India itself be associated with them, though not formally as members and not as the brains of the groups. The wording is indeed so dexterous that one would, on a cursory reading, come to the conclusion that something had been gained in the end. On the other hand, the new situation makes matters worse by driving beneath the surface the forces of reaction. Under the cloak of fairness, the explanation appears to us to be no better than a public condonation of those high officials who are publicly charged, without any contradiction, of having conspired with Mr. Curtis in a dangerous political propaganda." [In a subsequent issue the Message remarks:—"Instances are not wanting to show how strict is the supervision exercised by Government over its servants, whether high or low, especially where they happen to be Indians. We know of an Indian Government servant, holding a high position, who had to obtain the permission of the head of his department before he could attend a marriage at his own brother's house, because that brother was a politician, and not only that, he had to keep his superior officer informed of all that was taking place during the few days of his stay. When an up-country politician who had been invited, arrived, he had to inform him forthwith and tell him that he had come solely for the function and would be returning to his place that very evening. The guest who had travelled hundreds of miles in response to his friend's invitation had to be hustled along because of the safety of the Government servant's interests. In another case, a school master was dismissed and harassed because his brother-in-law was a nationalist and had been sent to jail for delivering a speech purporting to be 'seditious'. Yet in a third case, a judicial officer who had loyally served Government for a number of years was sent 'right about' because the C. I. D. had reported against him! Instances of this nature could be multiplied if need be; but we think those we have cited here are enough to show how strict is the censorship which Government imposes on the Indian servants both in the physical and astral planes. But in the present instance, active association in a political movement, fraught with the possibility of serious mischief, is openly professed and an attempt made to justify it."]

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 1st Feb.; Mahrátta* (5), 4th Feb.

21. According to the Praja Mitra and Pársi the statements made by Sir James Meston and Mr. Marris in the Legislative Council of the United Provinces in explanation of their association with Mr. L. Curtis of the Round Table are not satisfactory. In view of the task that body has set before itself, the paper is not prepared to admit the contention of Mr. Marris that the Round Table is a non-political association. Regard being had to the part Mr. Curtis has played in South Africa to the detriment of Indian interests the paper regrets that Sir James Meston should have attempted to demonstrate the utility of the work done by Mr. Curtis and his associates in South Africa. It dwells upon Mr. Curtis' views about the African and the Asiatic people including the Indians and feels surprised that neither Sir James Meston nor Mr. Marris has thought fit to dissociate himself from Mr. Curtis' views which they are represented by Mr. Curtis to share. The paper is of opinion that if Sir James does share the views of Mr. Curtis about India's position in the Empire after the war and if the Colonial representatives on the Imperial War Conference were to ascertain them by means of a cross-examination, they are likely to do much harm to the interests of India, even though they happen to be his personal views. It, accordingly, inquires if under those circumstances, His Honour will not, for the benefit of this country, show the public spirit of resigning the position, which he has been called upon to fill, of acting as an adviser to the Secretary of State for India at the War Conference. [The Mahrdtta remarks:—"The explanation is not satisfactory as it does not explain the cardinal but foolish idea of the Dominion Control of India. This was the offending part and though its discussion will now be suppressed for the time being it will continue its baneful influence till the reckless opinion is publicly withdrawn. Sir James Meston and his colleague haved studiously avoided this point, and such an evasion of it would fail to conciliate and satisfy the anxious minds of the people of India." [The paper then refers to Mr. Marris' contention that the Round Table was a non-political organisation and remarks:—] "Would that Government had seen in the same light the public movements in India! But we know that even innocent men imbued with perfectly loyal motives are being dogged by the C. I. D. which supposes them to be dangerous political organisers. If the Round Table propaganda is non-political, then why should the Home Rule League movements be imagined to savour of politics? Does Mr. Marris, who is himself an Inspector-Genepal of Police, consider the Home Rule movement a non-political one? The Round Table men collect and publish information, stimulate and elicit public opinion, move and seek public support, and so does the Home Rule League. Then why should the latter be not considered as non-political as the former?"]

Sandesh (103), 1st Feb.

22. There are no two opinions about the purity of the motives of Sir James Meston in inviting Mr. Curtis to visit India. It was apparently in the honest conviction that unless Mr. Curtis came into personal contact with Indians of every shade of opinion he would not be able to form any definite opinion. But the question arises why did not Mr. Curtis consult men like the Honourable Mr. Madan Mohan Malaviya, Dr. Sapru and the Honourable Mr. Chintamani just as he sought the advice of Government officials like Sir James and Mr. Marris. We are very grateful to the Government of India for having taken steps to see that Government servants no longer catch the contagion of the Round Table group and offend public opinion. But what should poor Mr. Curtis do when on the one hand his connection with the Government servants has been severed and on the other he finds Indian leaders more than a match for him? We are of opinion that the sooner he renounces his present philanthropic mission and sails for England the better for himself and for this country. Indians will also gladly thank Government when they find themselves rid of this terrible nuisance.

Bombay Samdchdr (55), 3rd Feb.

23. The Bombay Samdchdr writes at length on the activities of the Round Table group and while admitting that Mr. Curtis is actuated by honest motives in his investigations into Indian politics, expresses a wish that Government officials had not associated themselves with the work of the Round Table. It expresses some satisfaction at the explanation given by Sir James Meston with regard to his connection with the Round Table and the announcement made to the effect that the Government of India are of opinion that their officials should not take part in the activities of that body. It, however, wishes that Sir James had given fuller explaination clearing his position with respect to the allegation that he held the same opinions as Mr. Curtis. It hopes such an explanation will be soon forthcoming. It asks Mr. Curtis to study Indian politics by direct contact with the leaders of public opinion in India.

Suggestion that some members of the Bombay Legislative Council should inquire if any high European officers of Government are members of political associations in this Presidency.

Message (6), 2nd Feb.

24 "At the last meeting of the United Provinces Legislative Council, the Honourable Mr. Chintamani asked whether in these provinces some high officers of Government were not members of political associations such as the Anglo-Indian Association. The answer was of the usual type.......... We would strongly recommend the course adopted by Mr. Chintamani to our members in the local Council. There are, we believe, a number of high officials of Government both in the city and the Presidency who come under the category, and the Honourable members, we trust, will take up the matter in right earnest."

Sir Benjamin Robertson and the exclusion of Mrs. Besant from the Central Provinces and Berars.

Young India (11), 31st Jan.

25. Referring to the explanation given by Sir B. Robertson to the Deputation of the Amraoti Provincial Conference on the subject of Mrs. Besant's exclusion from the Central Provinces and Berars and the challenge sent by Mr. B. P. Wadia to him to prove that the address read by him at the Conference on behalf of Mrs. Besant was of a seditious character, Young India writes :—"We hope Sir Benjamin will proceed to prove the charge he has levelled against Mr. Wadia, a loyal subject of the Crown, and if he fails to do so, we trust a higher authority will impress upon him the necessity to make due amends for a statement from a responsible position, which is calculated to mar the reputation of a political leader.......... The reference of the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces and Berar, to his order against Mrs. Besant in his reply to the Provincial Conference Deputation appears to us to be a forcible illustration of the habit of lack of candour on the part of officials in this country. The justification of his act which he attempted last week contradicts the one that was vouchsafed by Mr. Slocock, his esteemed Chief Secretary some time ago.......... Our readers will perhaps remember that replying to an interpellation, Mr. Slocock on behalf of his Chief made a statement, in which it was stated that an important section of the Conference had gone to the Commissioner with urgent importunities to prohibit Mrs. Besant's visiting Amraoti lest the success of the Conference should be jeopardised. This time, the Chief Commissioner has himself come forward to justify his action and said that the order had nothing to do with the Conference. Inconsistency is the soul of bureaucratic politics and we are not at all surprised at this fresh instance of it. What strikes us, however, particularly is the language he has used to describe the emissary whom Mrs. Besant had sent to the Central Provinces. It shows the deep-seated prejudice ranking in an official mind against Mrs. Besant and the noble cause she represents. [The paper here quotes Sir Benjamin's remarks as to the dangerous character of the speech read out by Mr. Wadia on behalf of Mrs. Besant, and then continues :—] Yet, either at the time the speech was delivered by the 'emissary' or later on when the first pronouncement was made in the Legislative Council, no exception was taken to it and the 'emissary' was not brought to book either under the criminal laws of the land or the Defence Act. We don't know if the Chief Commissioner intended his explanation for the ears of the fortunate Deputation only, or for the general public. The Chief Commissioner is a person of some responsibility; but when he begins to talk like this, it is impossible for the public to accept his statements. It was perfectly right that he should have referred to the Conference resolution condemning outright his action, and having referred to it, if he had acknowledged the error of his judgment, there would have been some grace in it. Now, as it is, he has forced himself into an untenable position."

Message (6), 28th and 30th Jan.

26. "Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces has come out with a further instalment of justification for his order against Mrs. Besant. If the first justification which was put forward in the Council some time ago was bad enough, this is worse still and does not certainly help to clear the impression that for some reason or other the local Government lost its mental equilibrium at the prospect of Mrs. Besant's visit to Amraoti. [The paper then refers to the statement of the Chief Commissioner that Mr. Wadia, the emissary of Mrs. Besant, had delivered a speech at Amraoti which was calculated to arouse racial feeling, and remarks :—] Assuming that it was so, why did Government leave emissary unmolested? If the emissary had contravened the law in any respect, it was mere child's play to Government to bring to book the author of such a speech.......... If instead of indulging in vague generalisations and covert innuendos and implications, the Central Provinces Government had, following the commendable example of our local Government, wedded itself to a policy of silence, it would not have made itself the butt of public ridicule. Sir Benjamin also spoke something about the kind of loyalty of the people, in the old platitudinous style. Referring to Mr. Wadia's speech, he said : 'The speech also made a profession of loyalty. All I can say is that this type of loyalty is different from the loyalty and from the real anxiety for the maintenance of the British Government'. He seems obviously to have some extraordinary notions about 'loyalty'. We wish Sir Benjamin had schooled himself under His Excellency Lord Carmichael, before he ventured to let himself go on the subject. If he thinks that Mr. Wadia's layalty was not of that type which permits one to go to His Honour this or that official and declare 'your honor's humble and most obedient servant', we must say that Mr. Wadia is surely guilty of such a charge. If it was in respect of loyalty to the King-Emperor and the British connection, it is another matter and we venture to assert that he and his countrymen are unquestionably loyal. Sir Benjamin's notions seem to have become too much out of place by reason of his stay in the Central Provinces Government House. We trust he will revise those notions before he attempts to speak again on the subject." [In a subsequent issue the paper writes:—"As had been expected, Mr. B. P. Wadia has sent a challenge to the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces to prove his charge against him. The Chief Commissioner, too, when he roundly made those vague allegations must have expected such a challenge. But we doubt whether he will chivalrously accept it and reply to it by prosecuting Mr. Wadia for sedition if his speech at Amraoti was really a 'vilification from the beginning to the end of the British Government'.......... This form of challenging the veracity of official pronouncements is new to official life in India and must have staggered many of them to wake up to the change after fifty years. Will the Chief Commissioner take up the challenge? Let us wait and see."]

Kesari (95), 30th Jan.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 30th Jan; Mahrátta* (5), 4th Feb.

27. Just as a drowning man catches at a straw, Sir Benjamin Robertson failing to discover any substantial ground for the exclusion of Mrs. Besant, has tried to invest Mr. Wadia's speech with a terrible character. We all really pity him for his fruitless attempts to justify the serious blunder which he committed in passing the order against Mrs. Besant. Did he pass the order on the strength of some prevision as to the character of the speech which Mr. Wadia was to deliver? Moreover, if Mr. Wadia's speech was inflammatory, why was he not prosecuted? Sir Benjamin Robertson has thus punished the innocent and such mistakes on the part of the rulers are most indefensible. Manu says: A king who punishes the innocent and lets go the guilty suffers seriously in reputation and also goes to hell. [The Dnyán Prakásh remarks that the challenge given by Mr. Wadia to Sir Benjamin Robertson is a straightforward one and hopes that it will be taken up in as straightforward a manner by the latter.] [The Mahrátta writes:—"The Commissioner asks us to decide the nature of this political demonstration by the speech of Mr. B. P. Wadia,—the emissary of Mrs. Besant—which was in his opinion 'a vilification of the British Government from beginning to end.' We cannot follow him at all. In the first place the speech of Mr. Wadia was not such as has been described by Sir Benjamin Robertson. Secondly, the indignant speech, unpalatable as it was to the authorities, was the result of the order and not the cause of it. If sufficient provocation is given, even an ordinary man uses very strong and condemnatory language and the courts of law absolve him partially from the blame for that reason. Mr. Wadia, as every one else, was provoked by the unjust and unnecessary order issued against Mrs. Besant and the strong language was the necessary result of that. So if at all anything is to be judged from his speech it is the degree of provocation given, and not the nature of political demonstration. The Commissioner labours under a confusion of the cause and effect and his reasoning is therefore perfectly unsound."]

Comments on Dr. Keith's proposals with regard to India in his work entitled "Imperial Unity and Dominions."

Young India (11), 31st Jan.

28. Continuing in Young India his review of Dr. Keith's book entitled "Imperial Unity and Dominions" [Vide paragraph No. 37 of Weekly Report No. 4 of 1917], Mr. S. Banker passes in review the Doctor's opinions with regard to various schemes proposed for giving the self-governing colonies a larger share in the government of the Empire. He then proceeds to consider the proposals contained in the book with regard to India and concludes as follows:—"All this has led Dr. Keith to the conclusion that 'the Dominions cannot expect to be allowed to determine the destinies of the Empire of India' and that 'from the point of view of the Imperial Government it is clear that in their general foreign policy they must expect to have in future to consider the views of India with as much care as they consider those of the self-governing Dominions'. He adds 'their duty in either case is identical, and must be carried out without favour to either'. This brings us back to the question of representation on the Imperial Conference and he puts forth our claims in terms, which entitle him to our gratitude. He says: 'It is inevitable, therefore, that India should be allowed a voice in the Imperial Conference just as any self-governing Dominion is allowed: it is indeed ludicrous to think that New Zealand, South Africa, and Newfoundland are to be ranked as superior to the Empire of India: it is right, further, that that voice should be uttered by a representative of India, other than the Secretary of State for India, and preferably by a member of the Indian race'. If Britain still has statesmen and thinkers, so just and liberal as Dr. Keith, we can with reason hope to attain our goal without bloodshed."

What sort of system of administration the "progressive moderates" among the Muhammadans want.

Islámic Mail (4), 28th Jan.

29. "People—even officials—ask us what we 'progressive moderates' want. It is difficult to say all in a moment what our scheme of reform would be. But we can readily say what we do not want. We do not want a revival of Brahmanical rule—a 'lawyer Government'. A Government in which the landed classes do not take part can in no sense of the word be called a representative Government, and unless you educate the landed classes and make them fit for participating in your scheme of Home Rule or self administration it is no use to ask for it. India, unlike Europe, is an agricultural country and it would not do for a few westernised lawyers to sit in their studies and libraries and govern those who toil in the field. If it is to be governed by an outsider then the British officials are the best people. They are far better than our lawyers and every Indian, unless he is educated and aspires to govern his uneducated brethren, prefers them. Go to the artisan class or to the landed aristocracy and not one of them will be happy with the idea of being governed by them. On the contrary they entertain a dread—of 'Babu Government'. The lofty character of an English gentleman who, as the late Nizam—a shrewd judge of men—used to say, is the finest specimen of humanity, inspires confidence and esteem, which the Indian politician lacks. Create the character, educate the masses, not only the low classes but the great Zemindari classes, or as Lord Curzon said, fit the country for self-governmet, and it will come by itself. No power, whether bureaucracy or autocracy will be able to resist the natural forces. But so long as education is the privilege of a selected few, it is idle to expect them to join hands with you: and so long as they stand aloof you can never carry weight either with the British public or with the Govenment of India. The Congress professes to represent the whole of India, but shorn of its galaxy of lawyers, how many Zemindars, merchants and artisans are there? The Hindu points with gusto to the Raja of Mahmudabad and to the Maharaja of Kassimbazaar as the representatives of the landed classes. They are big Zemindars no doubt, but are they really the representatives of the millions of Zemindars in this country? There are about a thousand or more Talukdars in the United Provinces. Does the Raja of Mahmudabad represent their opinions and views? Will they be content to leave their interests in his keeping? Or go a step further. Does the Congress speak on behalf of even the majority of the people of India? Is it really a representative institution as is understood by the term in Europe? We want a real representative Government founded on parliamentary basis and not a lawyers' Government, and so long as the lawyers hold the monopoly of education we would not advise any delegation of administrative authority to them!"

Conflict between the views of the Congress and the Hindu Sabha on the subject of Muhammadan representation on public bodies.

Islámic Mail (4), 28th Jan., Eng. edition.

30. "As the Congress represents Hindu feelings and is largely composed of Hindu leaders there was no necessity for them to appoint a Hindu League separately. But not content with their control of the Congress they have established a separate Hindu League and this League composed of all the prominent Congressists says the views of the Congressists do not represent the opinions of the bulk of the Hindus. In their manifesto to the Congress on the question of separate representation of the Moslem community on the Councils they declared

'We do feel that the Hindus who happen to be there as members of the All-India Congress committee cannot fully represent the views and sentiments of the Hindu community.' What have our Congress friends to say to this?"

How the Hindu-Muhammadan rapprochement is harmful to the interests of the Muhammadans.
Islámic Mail (121), 29th Jan., Urdu edition.

31. In justification of its hostile attitude with regard to the understanding arrived at between the representatives of the Hindus and the Musalmans at Lucknow, the Islámic Mail asserts that the propriety of the appointment of a Moslem Member of the Madras Exective Council had been admitted by all including the organs of Hindu opinion, and ascribes the appointment of a Hindu thereto to the said rapprochement. It attributes the selection of two Hindus to the exclusion of a Muhammadan to assist the Secretary of State at the forthcoming Imperial War Conference to the same agreement, and it entirely disapproves of the arrangement which is so plainly detrimental to the interests of the Musalmans.

The Imperial Institute and the industries of India.
Mahrátta (5), 4th Feb.

32. Referring to the steps proposed to be taken by the Imperial Institute for the utilization of the raw products of India, the Mahrátta remarks:—"The present Under Secretary of State, Lord Islington, is the chairman of the executive Council of the Institute. He was the president of the Royal Public Services Commission and in that capacity he has advocated to expand the industrial institutions of India to train up men of the right type. As such, one might expect that such a sincere and sympathetic Under Secretary would suggest that Indian raw materials should, for the benefit of Indian industries, be manufactured in India alone. .. .. But Lord Islington has belied such sanguine expectations. He says: 'India produced in large quantities hides from which the best leather was manufactured, and the whole of the organisation of that trade had been in German hands. A scheme was being prapared which he hoped would result in Indian hides being made into leather to a much greater extent than hitherto in this country (England) and in the Dominions.'......... The worst of it is that the Government of India is financing this Institute and is expected to contribute more than heretofore. The Institute, presided over by the Under Secretary of State for India and financed by our own Government, is manufacturing a scheme to favour more the industries of other parts of the Empire than our own! Sympathy indeed!"

Comments on the reported intention of Government to continue the system of indentured labour in Fiji for a futher period of five years.
Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 4th Feb., Eng. cols.

33. After remarking that the revelations made by Mr. Andrews with regard to the condition of the Indians in Fiji are astounding, the Kaiser-i-Hind continues:—"It can fill Indians only with a deep sense of humiliation. It ought to fill Englishmen with a deep sense of shame for their responsibility in creating a state of helotry, which one can more easily reconcile with the countrymen of Bismarck than with the countrymen of Wilberforce and Gladstone. That respectable Indian women, simply because they are poor, should be forced to allot themselves to different batches of male labourers is enough to make one's flesh creep with disgust. That this legalised prostitution be actually fostered by English officials is a thing too mean for words.......... It behoves every Indian who has a spark of respectability in him to protest most vigorously against this scandalous state of things. The time is past for taking into consideration either the feelings or the convenience of colonials and others. Their treatment of Indians has been such that they have forfeited every right to be considered gentlemen. We cordially support our esteemed contemporary the Chronicle in its suggestion that public meetings ought to be held all over India, and vigorous protests sent to the Government of India against any further continuance of a system so inhuman. The Government of India will be in honour bound to respect the unanimous wishes of India, or forego their claim to be the protectors of India."

The Hajis and the system of issuing return tickets only.

Muslim Herald (123), 2nd Feb.

34. With reference to the letter of the Honourable Mr. Wardlaw Milne published in the Bombay Chronicle on the subject of the suitability of return tickets for Hajis in which 98 per cent. of the latter are said to have returned to India within six months of their embarkation, the Muslim Herald states that it has received advices from Jeddah, which are confirmed by the oral testimony of many pilgrims passing on their way back through Bombay, to the effect that many Hajis lost their tickets or sold them. It declares that the Agent of Messrs. Turner Morrison & Co. notified the arrival of a certain ship on a certain date for taking back the Hajis which induced them to flock to Jeddah where, however, they were compelled to make an enforced stay of nearly a month before the ship sailed. The high prices ruling at Jeddah obliged many ticket holders to sell their tickets to pay their boarding charges; hence many thieves, moallims (priests), etc., were enabled to return to this country by means of those return tickets which the original holders had either sold or lost. It characterises the system of issuing return tickets as mischievous and troublesome, and it challenges the Honourable Mr. Milne to prove that all those persons who made up the alleged 98 per cent. were those who actually purchased the return tickets at Bombay. It concludes by inquiring if the statements made by Mr. Milne are endorsed by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, who is the President of the Haj Committee or by any member of the Committee or by the Protector of Pilgrims, and it draws the attention of the Government to this matter.

Comments on the resolution to be introduced in the Bengal Legislative Council regarding facilities for Muhammadans in law courts to recite their prayers.

Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 3rd Feb.

35. The Akhbár-e-Islám refers to the resolution the Honourable Moulvi Abdul Kasum is going to bring before the Bengal Legislative Council urging that orders may be issued to give Muhammadan Barristers, pleaders, parties to suits, witnesses and others appearing before the Civil and Criminal Courts in the Presidency facilities for the offering of the Jumma and Zohar prayers and while admitting that such a concession will cause some inconvenience to the Courts and to those whose duty it is to dispense the law, it expresses its belief that if the resolution is passed it will be welcomed by the Muhammadans as a tribute of respect to their religious feelings. The paper expects that such a step on the part of the Bengal Governments is likely to be imitated by other provincial Governments and opines that in that event it will spread great joy among the Moslem community.

In the interests of the Muhammadan students in Sind the Matriculation should be declared as qualifying for Government service and the Sind Pleaders' Examination should be open to all.

Al-Haq (42), 27th Jan., Eng. cols.

36. Referring to the Government reply in the negative to the interpellation of the Honourable Mr. Ghulam Husein as to whether Matriculates can be employed in Government service, the Al-Haq complains that this decision will press hard upon the Muhammadan students. The paper dwells on the admitted fact of the general poverty of the Muhammadans of the province, and points out that the reason why the Muhammadan student prefers the Matriculation to the School Final, even though the latter qualifies for Government service, is that he hopes to secure a scholarship to enable him to go in for College education. The lot of those students who fail to obtain scholarships becomes pitiable. For not only are the doors of Government service closed against them, but owing to the overwhelming competition of the Hindus, they cannot get berths in private firms; and a further avenue hitherto open to them, viz., the Sind Pleaders' Examination, has been closed to them by the recent change in the regulations. Under these circumstances the paper hopes that the authorities will reconsider their decision about the Matriculation examination and also open up Sind Pleaders' Examination to all, with some modifications, if necessary.

LEGISLATION.

Comments on the Bill to amend the Local Boards Act.

Mahrátta (5), 4th Feb.

37. "The Government Resolution on the Report of the Local Boards Committee had plainly declared that the amending Bill would 'apply to all District Local Boards in the Presidency including Sind.' But contrary to that, the Bill gives a discretionary power to the Governor in Council who may direct by notification that the amendment shall apply to any District Local Board. The words 'may' and 'any' instead of 'shall' and 'all' create an impression on one's mind that the Government are not willing to apply the provisions of the new Bill to all districts at the same time. The wording of the Resolution thus runs counter to such a provision in the Bill and we fail to see the reason of this nervousness on the part of the Government. When they issued the Resolution they appeared to be convinced that all the districts in the Presidency were ripe for the proposed majority of the elective members. But after six months they seem to be in a different frame of mind and their pace seems to be halting. We are unable to guess any reason for such a trepidation.......... The Committee had made another recommendation that the proportion of elected members should not be less than two-thirds of the whole. In their Resolution the Government of Bombay had promised that 'subject to due regard for local circumstances' they would be guided by the recommendations of the Committee. But this 'due regard for local circumstances' seems to have unduly influenced the mind of the Government and in the Bill we find no definite proportion but a vague provision that 'the majorty of the members of the whole board inclusive of the president shall be elective members.' The deceptive word 'majority' may in some cases cover a majority of one only and that would not certainly in any way mark a futher advance in the Local self-government of that district.......... Another great drawback in the Bill is the power reserved for the Governor in Council to frame rules for those matters which were formerly determined by statutory provisions. For instance section 7 of the Act 1 of 1884 has specifically provided for the constituencies which were to elect the members for the board. In the new Bill that power 'to prescribe the number and character of the constituencies and the number of members to be elected by each' is reserved for the Governor in Council. Why such a departure is made from the old Act has not been made clear. The Government in their Resolution have wisely decided against communal representation. They have reserved for themselves the power of nomination to make provision for important minorities and other vested interests. Then what difficulty was there to stick to the old Act? In fact the recommendations of the Committee with regard to territorial constituencies are almost identical with the provisions of the Act of 1884. In the statement of objects and reasons, the Honourable Mr. Curtis says that the Bill is intended to provide for the formation of special constituencies only. But in the Bill itself we find that the power is given to the Governor in Council to determine the character of not only the special but all the constituencies. The tendency that is noticed in framing the Bill is to make the provisions unnecessarily wide and vague without any sufficient reason. While the people are demanding that their rights should be determined by statute so that they may not depend upon the whims and caprices of the individual, the Government are trying in the reverse direction and wish to retain that power for themselves."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 1st Feb.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 2nd Feb.

38. The Bombay Samáchár welcomes the publication of the Bombay Local Boards Bill as a further evidence of the solicitude felt by the Government for the welfare of India and of the keen desire they have for encouraging and fostering the utilization of local talent and public spirit in the administration of the country. It expresses its gratification at the clauses providing for the preponderance of the elective members over the nominated ones and the right vested in the Boards to elect their own Presidents. In conclusion it refers to the existing defects in the constitution of the Bombay Municipal Corporation and expresses the hope that Government will be pleased to effect reforms therein in the light of the suggestions made from time to time by the organs of public opinion in the Presidency. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi while welcoming the Bill asks Government to fix the proportion between the elected and nominated members of the Boards so that the proposed majority of elected members may be real and not merely nominal as it would very likely be in absence of definite rules.]

EDUCATION.

Comments on the proceedings of the Conference of Directors of Public Instruction at Delhi.

Hindusthán (17), 30th Jan. and 1st Feb.

39. The Hindusthán characterises His Excellency the Viceroy's opening speech at the Conference of the Directors of Public Instruction as a thoughtful, interesting and luminous pronouncement and one calculated to serve as a useful guide to the educational authorities in India. The paper strongly protests against the discussion by the Conference in camera of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Public Services Commission on the subject of education. It endorses the Viceroy's remarks on the desirability of giving scientific agricultural training, and referring to the establishment of the Sydenham College of Commerce in Bombay, suggests that instead of a solitary college, a number of schools should be established for imparting commercial education. It remarks that the responsibilities of the educational authorities in this country are daily increasing and opines that they cannot, therefore, afford to overlook His Excellency's advice to them to display unlimited enthusiasm, unfailing courtesy and unflinching resolution in the discharge of their duties. [In the subsequent issue the paper makes comments upon the proceedings at the Conference and remarking that persons of an arbitrary frame of mind can brook no control, regards as quite natural the opinion of the majority of the Directors against any arrangement which would compel provincial Governments to utilise the Imperial educational grants for the purposes of primary education only. It is not in favour of still further increasing the cost of education and dwelling upon the miserable condition in which many poor students have to pass their lives in this country, remarks that instead of making education dearer, the authorities should see their way to provide for an increase in the educational expenditure by curtailing the expenditure on other departments of doubtful utility.]

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 2nd Feb.; Kesari (95), 30th Jan.

40. The discussion at the Directors' Conference was both interesting and instructive and, therefore, we think that Government did well in throwing it open to the public. We hope that in view of the opinions expressed at the Conference, the old rule making the amounts of grants to schools dependent on the number of students passing will be restored by Government inasmuch as the present rule which regulates the grants according to the expenditure benefits missionary and European schools alone to the detriment of the interest of schools under Indian management. We also wish that the idea of allowing local bodies to levy a school cess which found general support at the Conference will soon be acted upon. Another important subject discussed at the Conference was the training of high school teachers and the necessity of our Universities providing for a degrees in pedagogy. We very much regret that our Presidency is very backward in both these respects. As the future of secondary education here depends on the satisfactory solution of the question of securing a sufficient supply of well-trained teachers, we hope it will be taken up in earnest by the authorities. [The Kesari trusts that the severe condemnation passed by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford on the present system of imparting education through a foreign tongue will soon bring about an end of the system. It also hopes that His Excellency's pledge for bettering the position of teachers will also be carried out and suggests the establishment of a Provident Fund for them. While it expresses full satisfaction at the attitude taken up by the Viceroy as regards important questions such as scientific education, it characterises the discussion that followed as most inconclusive and wonders why the Honourable Sir Shankaran Nair who presided failed to express any definite opinion on the subjects discussed.]

MUNICIPALITIES.

Alleged jobbery by the Sukkur (Sind) Municipality in a case of sale of land.

Sind Advocate (8), 18th Jan.; Hitechhu (61), 21st Jan.; Praja Mitra (67), 24th Jan.

41. "The great sensation of today at Sukkur—or the greatest we have ever had—is the astounding conduct of a majority of the General Board of Sukkur Municipality in confirming the sale of 15,601 square feet of land to Mr. Bhojsingh, an influential Municipal Councillor and ex-president, as so called frontage at a price of annas 4 a square foot without the necessary procedure of a public auction and in spite of much higher offers before the Municipality; in spite too of the fact that the alignment rate in the quarter in question was annas eight. We have said that the people of Sukkur stand amazed and astounded at this piece of jobbery which may very rightly be called a robbery of the ratepayers' money. But the public need not be uneasy, for by the very unreasonableness, excessive unreasonableness which the friends of Mr. Bhojsingh have shown in this matter they have sounded the death-knell not only of their own reputation for honesty and integrity, but the death-knell of the transaction which they have so brazen-facedly sanctioned at the cost of the public interest. The authorities, we feel perfectly sure, will take the earliest opportunity to set aside this plainly iniquitous and faction-and-favouritism inspired transaction not to speak of the secret intrigues with which this result has been compassed. The broad and salient facts of the case are enough to bring upon the action of the party-maddened councillors reprobation and condemnation from the officials that will not at all be less severe than that which the public are now pouring out." [The Hitechhu observes that, if the facts alleged be true, the abovementioned transaction constitutes a stigma upon the conductors of local self-government in Sukkur. It condemns the action of the Municipality and dwells upon the necessity of an explanation being issued in justification of it. The paper hopes that in the absence of any such explanation the Commissioner in Sind will, in the exercise of the authority vested in him, refuse to sanction the sale in question. The Praja Mitra also writes in a similar strain. It feels certain that the Commissioner in Sind will not only withhold his sanction but will severely deal with those who are responsible for this, what it terms hateful transaction.]

Appeal to Government to deal justly with the petition submitted by the Rani of Jobat.

Rást Goftár (28), 28th Jan.

42. The Rást Goftár narrates the unfortunate circumstances under which the Chief of Jabat has resigned his claim to the gadi and expresses hope that the Government of India will be pleased to give careful consideration to the petition submitted to them by the Rani for the recognition of her son as the heir to the gadi. The paper points out how influential papers like the Madras Mail, the Bengali, the Madras Times and the Indian Patriot have espoused the cause of this unfortunate lady and declares that it is the wish of every one that Government should decide this sad case in a spirit of fairness and justice.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Message (6), 9th and 10th Feb.; Indian Social Reformer* (3), 11th Feb.

1. " We think we have to confess to a deep sense of disappointment and indignation at the speech which the Viceroy delivered yesterday in the Legislative Council at Delhi.......... With reference to the avoidance of controversial subjects in the debates of the Legislative Council, His Excellency complacently thinks, or pretends to think, that 'new members are unaware of the understanding which obtained in the last Council' and gives them a gentle hint that if they raise disagreeable discussion or ask inconvenient questions, the Viceroy would 'exercise with extreme reluctance the powers of disallowance in regard to both resolutions and questions' vested in him.......... A Patna Bill might be concocted in the clouds of Simla; a Sir Valentine Chirol might be entertained at Government House at the expense of people who do not want to entertain him; he might be helped actively by Government in carrying on a private case against a leader beloved of the people; a Wadia might be damned ex cathedra as a seditionist by a Commissioner; the abominable indenture system might be allowed to continue for an indefinite period in spite of the protests of Indians; all these acts, His Excellency, as a lover of the motto 'deeds, not words', would tolerate; but when it comes to debate in the Council, he would suavely remind Honourable Members that his silken glove conceals a mailed fist under it!......... Lord Chelmsford talks of the impossibility of abolishing the present indenture system by 'a stroke of the pen or by the simple fiat of a statutory enactment.' We humbly ask His Excellency, was it after all impossible during all these long years for the Government of India to bring in legislation modifying sections 39 and 40 of the Indenture Act, the latter of which makes it lawful for any parent or guardian of a child under the age of 16 but above 10 to make a contract with another binding the child to serve in foreign colonies and under admittedly unfair and degrading terms, and the former of which makes it lawful for any person above 16—not 18—years to enter into such an emigration contract? The modifying of these sections so as to bring the law in a line with what elementary principles of justice demands, was not surely above the capacities of a Government which could forge the Press Act or the Seditious Meetings Act or the Defence of India Act.......... The Indian Government is unduly suspicious in its heart of hearts, and that is why, in spite of its proclamation of Indian loyalty from the house tops, it refused to avail itself of Indian man-power to the full. We are glad to see that Lord Chelmsford has perceived the mistake and taken a step, though half-hearted and halting, to mend it. It is now announced that while Europeans will be compulsorily trained and employed for military service, if necessary, Indians who will volunteer their services, will be enrolled in their own units for general military service in India for the duration of the war. The reticence of the Viceroy in regard to the conditions of service and treatment—whether they will be simliar to those of Europeans or not—is rather, we cannot help saying, suspicious. However, we may hope that they will not be such as to damp the enthusiasm and ardour which will characterise the response to the call. Again, why is the enrolment of Indians to be operative 'for the duration of the war' only?" [In a subsequent issue the paper writes:—" To speak of mitigating the seriousness of the evil by increasing the sex-ratio is wantonly adding insult to injury and nothing more. Whether he meant it or not, Lord Chelmsford has betrayed himself into an utter disregard—we do not want to say callousness—of all fundamental moral considerations which govern civilised humanity, when from his high place in the Imperial Council he made the proposal. Beneficent as may have been His Excellency's intentions, we cannot help remarking that the proposal is too infamous to be countenanced and is certainly unworthy of the Government of India." The Indian Social Reformer remarks:—" Why this excessive tenderness for absentee shareholders in soulless financial corporations? Government must clearly understand that the country will not tolerate this monstrous system a moment longer than it takes to promulgate prohibitive legislation."]

Mahrátta (5), 11th Feb.

2. Referring to His Excellency's announcement that the Government of India's despatch on post-war reforms had already been sent to the Secretary of State, the Mahrátta remarks:—"Why he took so long to let us officially know what he calls the open secret of the reforms despatch is not very easy to understand. What he told us now could have been told by him some six months before. Much energy, trouble and agitation could have been saved thereby. This inveterate slackness of Government was evidenced also in connection with some paltry measures about the indenture system. The Viceroy said that Government were not sleeping over their pledges.......... All these attempts, feeble though they are, were made by them without the knowledge of the public and this ignorance of the latter is at the root of much discontent. It is not that the Viceroy can only speak in the Legislative Council on this matter. He has got his Gazette or he can issue press notes to infrom the public from time to time and show that Government are taking a keen interest in all these problems. Instead of doing this the authorities keep their mouth sealed and when the public begin to be seriously convulsed about it then and then only they give out what by that time remains no longer a secret. This attitude of grim silence takes away from their actions what little grace they can lay claim to. Such a procedure stiffens the attitude of the public and both the parties view each other with suspicion and remain always in a state of tension. This is much to be deplored and we earnestly hope this habitual slackness would yield in future to continuous efforts to enlighten the public on matters affecting them.......... The Viceroy has promised a speedy solution of the indentured labour question in May next and India will believe in his assurance of its fulfilment without unnecessary delay. But what they cannot and will not tolerate are the new indentures...... The compulsory service of the Europeans and voluntary service of the Indians are measures which will be received with unstinted praise by the public. The Viceroy has, however, failed to enlighten the people on one important point. He has not told us whether the commissioned ranks are open to the Indians. The crux is there and the galling sense of inferiority created by denying the ranks to the sons of the soil has, we think, obstructed the flow of man power in that direction. If merit does not count when even life is at stake, none on earth would be tempted to risk it. We have been told that this question would be solved after the end of the war. Commonsense revolts against this argument. If the war is to be won, the means of winning it must be undertaken during, and not after, the war.......... Commissions follow enrolment and the Government of India should have seen their necessity. But hesitation and procrastination have been our enemies as fatal as the German guns and we are sorry to say that our Government are still in their grip."

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 11th Feb., Eng. cols.; Rást Goftár (28), 11th Feb, Eng. cols.

3. "The speech which His Excellency the Viceroy delivered before the Imperial Legislative Council must be received with mingled feelings of disappointment and regret on the one hand and of satisfaction, hope, resolve and confidence on the other. It has fallen short of that masterly statesmanship with which the official utterances of Lord Chelmsford's illustrious predecessor were marked. The appeal to avoid controversy would surely meet with that prompt response which was accorded to Lord Hardinge's similar appeal two years ago. But while referring to feelings of impatience and discontent, His Excellency might well have remembered how far Government themselves were responsible for these feelings being 'not unnaturally generated'. It is the Government of Lord Chelmsford who have broken the unwritten understanding and the Viceroy cannot now complain that it does not obtain at present. Without a reference to such and many other matters like the question of indentured labour which is agitating all India and the report of the Public Services Commission and the Reforms Memorandum, the Viceroy had enough material to make his speech acceptable to the country. The successful prosecution of the war is the one subject before the civilised world and if the Viceroy had confined himself to it he would have spared the country many an offensive remark.......... The puerile attempt to avoid a clear answer to the Reforms Memorandum will shake public confidence in the Viceroy's sympathy with the country's aspirations.......... So far as is in India's power Lord Chelmsford's appeal to assist Government in making the war loan a real success will not go in vain. But the fact of India's limited wealth cannot be unknown to those who are responsible for its government. The country should feel thankful to the Viceroy for presenting in its true colours our position on the frontiers, in Persia and in Mesopotamia. The situation is by no means easy and while we depend upon British diplomacy for success in these regions there is no knowing when German intrigue may turn the tables. The need for the Defence of India Force therefore is all the greater. The compulsory enrolment of Europeans presents to us in an unmistakable manner the gravity of the situation. We are confident India realises it and the desire of Indians to serve the Empire in this hour of its greatest peril will be practically established by a great and ready response to the Viceroy's appeal for enrolment, a response that by its magnitude alone shall stun the Hun." [The Rást Goftár observes:—"The Viceroy's speech in the Council at Delhi is replete with momentous issues announced with that firm yet sympathetic mode of expression which characterises His Excellency's utterances. We are thankful so far to His Excellency for his regard for Indian aspirations; and reading between the lines his reference to the Reforms Memorandum which was lately presented to him by the non-official members of his Council, we feel we are not wide of the mark when we anticipate such action from his Government in the near future as will substantially gratify the Indian needs embodied in that memorial."]

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 9th Feb.; Sandesh (103), 9th Feb.

4. The Dnyán Prakásh is utterly dissatisfied with His Excellency's speech which it characterises as one deliberately intended to clip the wings of India's high aspirations and declares that no one should hereafter indulge in the delusion that Lord Chelmsford will, like Lord Hardinge, assist in their fulfilment. It observes that His Excellency's duty, at the present juncture, lay not in putting a damper on the political aspirations of Indians, but in taking the lead in sympathetically placing them before the Imperial Government, and it regrets that India is unfortunate in not finding such statesmanship in Lord Chelmsford. As regards His Excellency's complaint that the understanding about refraining from bringing forward controversial matters has not been properly observed by non-official members, the paper asserts that it can be clearly shown by an overwhelming number of instances that it was not the popular party but Government itself that was guilty of a breach of the compact, Government having only screemed itself behind it on several occasions to evade the solution of questions inconvenient to itself. His Excellency's references to the reported continuance of the indentured labour system are regarded by the paper as most disappointing and it calls upon Government to publish the whole of the correspondence it had with the Colonies about the matter to reassure the puplic that no final promises have been made for its continuance. His Excellency's statement about the recommendations of the Public Services Commission being taken into consideration at an early date is regarded by the paper as possessing no importance in view of their retrograde character, and referring to the announcement of His Excellency that the Government of India's despatch on administrative reforms had preceded the memorandum of the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council, the paper takes it to mean that not much should be expected in the direction of the fulfilment of popular aspirations under the present regime. [The Sandesh also expresses its disappointment at the speech and declares that when His Excellency wants the people calmly to wait further for the abolition of the indentured labour system, it only means that he does not at all feel for the sufferings of the labourers. It fails to understand why the Viceroy should choose to take up the cudgels on behalf of the Colonists instead of on behalf of the coolies who are his own subjects. It welcomes the announcement that Indians will be allowed to enlist in their own units for military service and expresses the hope that many Indians will take advantage of the concession and help Government. It, however, wants to know why the concession is only for the period of the war. It also remarks that if compulsory service could be introduced among the British-born Europeans in India by 'a stroke of the pen' it would have been equally easy to declare Indians eligible for higher military posts, and it concludes by observing that though Indians will feel grateful for the concession now made, His Excellency's speech leaves the impression on the mind that Government only looks to the removal of its own difficulties and not to the rights of its subjects.]

Sánj Vartamán (29), 8th Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 8th Feb.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 8th Feb.; Bombay Samáchár (55), 10th Feb.

5. Referring to the speech recently delivered by His Excellency the Viceroy at the session of the Imperial Legislative Council the Sánj Vartamán expresses its high sense of gratification at the readiness on the part of Government to enrol Indians for general military service in India during the continuance of the war and wishes that Indians will come forward in large numbers to avail themselves of this valuable right though conceded only temporarily. It hopes that the announcement made by His Excellency about the measures that have been taken to check the lawless activities of the Mahsuds and Mohmands will set at rest the rumours that have been afloat for some time past about conditions on the North-Western frontier. The paper wishes that the new Indian War Loan may be taken up by the people on such a large scale as would be in keeping with the prestige of India and it feels confident that the Indian princes will not fail to contribute to it very liberally. It remarks that while India will remain satisfied at present with the arrangement which will allow the Indian representatives merely to express their views in the War Conference without having any right to vote, she hopes that it might be so arranged that, in future, the Indian representative on the Conference will be a person selected by the Indian people themselves and having a position in the Conference equal to that of the various Colonial representatives. [The Jám-e-Jamshed commends the feeling of sympathy with Indian aspirations which permeates the whole of the Viceroy's speech at the Council. It also hopes that His Excellency's appeal to contribute largely to the new Indian War Loan will not fail to find a whole-hearted response from the Indian people. It is of opinion that the popular leaders should bring this appeal of the Viceroy to the notice of the people residing in their respective districts. While not demurring to the continuance of the present system of indentured Indian labour for the time being and recognising the desirability on the part of India to adopt a just and liberal policy towards the Colonies in order to enable them to adjust their labour problem, the paper inquires what right these Colonies have to expect such a liberal attitude on the part of India when India's own sons are contemptuously treated in those self-same Colonies. It expresses the opinion that Indians will not accept any system, improved or otherwise, of indentured labour unless their brethren residing in the Colonies are allowed to enjoy the rights of British citizenship. The Praja Mitra and Pársi also makes appreciative mention of the Viceroy's announcement about throwing open, though temporarily, the military service to the Indians and hopes that this policy of trust in the Indians in this manner will prove productive of good results. It also maintains that under existing circumstances there could not be a more felicitous arrangement than the present one which permits the Indian representatives to express their views freely in the forthcoming Imperial War Conference. The Bombay Samáchár endorses the Viceroy's admonition to the members of the Council to exercise the necessary patience at the postponement of matters in which they may be taking very keen interest, in times like the present. It wishes that the minimum contribution to the proposed new Indian War Loan may be made as small as possible to enable all sections of the public to contribute their mite towards it.]

Intelligent and patriotic young men cannot help being extremists.

Kesari (95), 6th Feb.

6. In the course of a laudatory article on the career of the late Dr. Patwardhan who recently died at Poona, the Kesari observes :—The deceased after coming to Poona started a political paper. Extremism in politics is not the distinguishing feature of the present generation alone as imagined by some. Intelligent and patriotic young men can never help being extremists. This rule was exemplified in the case of the late Mr. Justice Ranade by the outspoken and severe language he used in the course of his paper on the Indian mutiny which he wrote while still a student. Similarly Dr. Patwardhan in the very first issue of his paper surprised his contemporary moderates by declaring "History shows that the tree of liberty was ever watered by the blood of despots".

India should now be released from the scourge of that ruling caste the bureaucracy.

Sind Advocate (8), 25th Jan.

7. "The war has now made it clear that India is a valuable asset in the Empire. The Congress has hammered continuously during the last thirty-one years for a larger share in the government of the country and the time is now mature that the scourge of the ruling caste the bureaucracy be removed and India regain her position as a self-governing unit in the Federal Empire after the war, and not remain a thrall to the bureaucracy coupled with the domination of the colonies that the conspirators of the Round Table are thinking of imposing upon India. 'British statesmanship', in the words of Dr. Gour, 'has in the past enthusiastically supported the cause of liberty, unsheathing its valient sword for the freedom of the weak and smaller nations and it will now appreciate the aspirations of the people of India and meet them in no ungrudging spirit henceforth treating her as a trusted partner and not merely as an humble dependent'."

Comments on the Madras Government's prohibition of Mr. Wadia's Amroati speech by Madras papers.

Message (6), 4th Feb.

8. Referring to the order issued by the Madras Government prohibiting the publication of Mr. Wadia's Amroati speech by newspapers, the Message remarks :—"The action of the Madras Government is only the logical outcome of the ex cathedra remarks indulged in by the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces before the 'loyal' body of the Provincial deputation. But we wonder why if the matter is, as they want the public to believe, 'prejudical to public safety,' they should resort to tortuous methods. .... The C. I. D. is ready at hand and what the local Governments have to do is simply to press a button in the Secretariat and the whole array of criminal law officers from the snow-clad Himalayas to the scorching plains of Cape Comorin can be set in motion. Instead of a simple procedure like this, the speech is delivered in the Central Provinces; three months are allowed to elapse; one local Government wakes up and scratches its head to find out if Mr. Wadia delivered a speech and then puts it forward to justify its action against another person. There is a challenge and instead of the Government that is directly concerned coming forward to take up the challenge, another local Government, hundreds of miles away, resorts to the application of a break to newspapers there. Is this not a very clumsy procedure? Mr. Wadia had not yet repeated his speech; he only intended to do so and instead of sending half a dozen or a dozen notices round to various newspaper offices in Madras and wasting so much valuable stationery—one single notice sent down to Mr. Wadia's office directing him under the bludgeon rule 3 of the Defence of India Consolidation Rules to abstain from repeating the speech in any form as he had intended, would have put an end to the whole matter."

Kesari (95), 6th Feb.

9. The indiscreet come to grief in a hundred ways: we are reminded of this Sanskrit adage when we see the bureaucrats vying with each other in the adoption of impolitic measures. The Bombay Government was the first to set the ball rolling against Mrs. Besant and the Central Provinces followed suit. But poor Sir Benjamin Robertson in his attempt to justify the thoughtless prohibition issued against Mrs. Besant by his high-handed subordinates fell foul of Mr. Wadia and came completely to grief in the process. Mr. Wadia, to prove the groundlessness of the accusation against him, proclaimed his determination to publish his speeches in Madras and challenged Government to proceed against him. Sir Benjamin's brother bureaucrats of Madras, therefore, went to his rescue and prohibited the Madras Press from publishing his speeches. This act on the part of the Madras Government may be said to be the crowning portion of the whole edifice of injustice, for they have robbed Mr. Wadia of the only means available to put his case before the public. This is like gagging a man while belabouring him with blows. Highhandedness, we think, cannot go further. In issuing their queer order the Madras authorities seem to have paid no heed to its impracticability, for they have given no idea as to the contents of the speeches which they want the Press not to publish. What will the authorities do if the speeches are published elsewhere outside Madras? In short, every attempt the bureaucrats will make to uphold the injustice of the action of the Central Provinces Government will only add to its repulsiveness. Government have, therefore, no other alternative but to admit their error and withdraw the prohibitory order.

Young India (11), 7th Feb.

10. "It seems that it takes three provincial Governments to complete and justify the repressive action against Mrs. Besant and her propaganda. The Bombay Government started off with a Prohibitory order against her. The public expressed its protest in unmistakable terms. What was there peculiar to the Bombay Province, they asked, that made this order necessary, when no other provincial Government had thought such exclusion necessary for the peace and safety of the territories under its rule? The answer came from the Central Provinces and Berar Government: 'Oh no, we also think Mrs. Besant dangerous: we shall also exclude her from our province.' But this step seemed to need an explanation—the first had not—. And so the public had an explanation, a double dose of it. The effort, however, inculpated not only Mrs. Besant, but her 'emissary' Mr. B. P. Wadia, and Mr. Wadia came out with a candid exposition of his loyalty and a challenge to the Central Provinces and Berar Government to prove his 'disloyalty'. The most troublesome part of the whole business was that Mr. Wadia's loyalty is the loyalty of the vast mass of thoughtful Indians. And then there was the challenge; so the Madras Govenment had to come to the rescue. It prohibited Mr. Wadia from carrying out his challenge. The Madras Government probably regards its present action as the logical continuation of its own former action against the New India. Any way three Governments have supported each other by actions, which in their estimation, jointly serve as the justification of the repressive measures against Mrs. Besant. May we point out that Government has, in this matter of repression, driven itself into the position of the man, described by Gladstone, who 'knowing that medicine may be the means of his restoration to health, endeavours to live upon medicine'? and Gladstone has also pointed out that 'Nations (we add, Governments), no more than individual, can find a subsistance in what was meant to be a cure. But has it been a cure'?"

Praja Mitra and Pârsi (24), 7th Feb., Eng. cols.; Hindusthân (17), 6th Feb.

11. "Even in normal times, we should expect a Government to be occupied with more serious and useful business than serving orders upon and aginst Mr. B. P. Wadia. Who is Mr. B. P. Wadia? Who cares what he says and what he writes? Does the Government of Madras seriously believe that the Defence of India Act was intended to give advertisement to, and enhance the consequence of, people like these? The psychology of the official mind is at times amazingly obscure. Instances like these make it clear, that with certain officials in India, sedition and disaffection are an obsession which will not be removed even by the hardest and clearest facts. It is a pity that occasionally in consequence of this obsession Governments are found which are weak enough to allow themselves to be betrayed into puerile and ridiculous situations. Can anybody to whom the notion of a seditious and disaffected India is not a perfect and oppressive nightmare seriously believe that the speech over which all this fuss is made, or for matter of that any speech that even an 'emissary of Mrs. Besant' could make, makes any impression, undesirable or otherwise, upon the public?......... The emissary made a speech which we do not remember made any very great stir in India when it was made. We had absolutely forgotten it, until the Chief Commissioner chose to unearth it by attacking it as breathing the spirit of disaffection 'from beginning to end'. Assuming it was such, who has been disaffected? In what part of the country has the standard of rebellion been raised in consequence of Mr. B. P. Wadia's speech, or for the matter of that any speech even of his guru Mrs. Besant?.......... It is amazing how some officials will not see that the best way to kill undesirable agitation is to ignore it. To take notice of it in the shape of solemn Government orders is the surest way to keep it alive and enhance its influence.......... We hope the infection will not spread beyond Madras, and that no other Government will be so ill-advised as to give importance to a matter sufficiently insignificant." [The Hindusthán writes:—These orders afford a fresh example of the strange uses to which the Defence of India Act is put. Mr. Wadia delivered his lecture at Amraoti, Guntur and Madura and it is believed that at none of these places the lecturer created any emotion or enthusiasm amongst his hearers. Now after three months the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces condemns the speech on the ground that it was vilification of Government from beginning to the end. If the Government of the Central Provinces found the speech objectionable they should have prosecuted Mr. Wadia in a court of law and proved the serious allegations they have brought against him. [The paper then refers to Mr. Wadia's challenge to Sir B. Robertson and the order of the Madras Government prohibiting him from repeating his speech in Madras, and continues:—] In passing the order the Government of Madras have made certain allegations against the Press at Madras which they should have refrained from doing. We do not think the Government of Madras have acted very wisely in not allowing Mr. Wadia a chance of letting the people judge the nature of his speech and thus restricting the liberty of speech. We do not think that the Defence of India Act was ever intended to be put to such a use. A very bad impression has been created on the mind of the public by the misuse of the Act and it will be very difficult to remove it.

* Mahrátta (5), 11th Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 6th Feb.

12. "The position of the Madras Government is pitiable. Whilst trying to save the prestige of Sir Benjamin Robertson they have sacrificed their own. For, they were obliged to prohibit the publication of the same speech of Mr. B. P. Wadia which they themselves had allowed him to deliver twice in their own province, once in Guntur before Amraoti and once in Madura after Amraoti! What they did not then consider as prejudicial to public safety was considered by them as such after Sir Benjamin's earnest requests. We cannot imagine that the C. I. D. of the Central Provinces cares more for the 'public safety' than the C. I. D. of Lord Pentland's Government. Both are charged with the same duties and both are certified as efficient by their superiors. Lord Pentland also is as much anxious to save his public as the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces. Then why should he prohibit what he himself has allowed not only once but twice? We thought that he would judge every action, whosesoever it may be, on its own merits. When the sensitive Bombay and Central Provinces Governments prohibited Mrs. Besant from entering their Provinces Lord Pentland did not follow them by interning Mrs. Besant in a corner of Madras and he yet allows her to go freely wherever she likes. We therefore thought that what he himself once considered as innocent would not be judged by him as offensive simply because some one said that it was so. But the prestige of the colleague blinded him so much that whilst trying to save him he has betrayed his own inconsistency." [The Dnyán Prakásh also condemns the action taken by the Madras Government and declares that it is bound to lower it in the estimation of the public.]

Comments on the statements made by Sir James Meston and Mr. Marris in the United Provinces Legislative Council with regard to their connection with the Round Table.

Young India (11), 7th Feb.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (21), 11th Feb., Eng. cols.

13. Young India declares that the explanation given by Sir James Meston in the United Provinces Legislative Council on the subject of his connection with the Round Table was "an altogether futile affair," affecting as it did "a certain profuseness of information and candour" about trivial and irrelevant matters. It then continues:—"As regards those things about which the public were and are particularly anxious to have personal and authentic explanations from the officials concerned, there was a significant economy of exposition. The statement, therefore, leaves matters exactly where they stood and the public must now be strengthened in the impressions which it had already formed. Sir James Meston was at least courteous and accommodating to a certain extent: Mr. Marris, as befitted a Police Officer in India, was both brusque and contemptuous. He seemed to have a grievance against the Indian public. What can the Indian public have to do with the doings of a high official of Government? What right have they to scrutinise his actions? Is it not enough for them that he has come to this land of regrets and graciously undertaken to train them in the arts of self-government? And that great and noble institution, the Round Table, how presumptuous of them to criticise it and how foolish of them to regard it as a political association? The Indian public, however, has the support of the Government of India in this matter—at least it may be so presumed from the fact that they have expressed an opinion that officials should not be members of that body. Sir James Meston agrees with that opinion—on second thoughts. Mr. Marris apparently does not, but must unfortunately submit." [The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"His elaborate attempt to justify his unjustifiable participation in the Round Table propaganda will not deceive the Indian public. What is especially noteworthy is the thinly disguised fact that the Government of India very rightly disapproved of his taking part in the political endeavours of Mr. Curtis, and that Sir James Meston has been publicly forced to acknowledge the justice of the position taken up by the Government of India. After all this it was inevitable that Mr. Marris should follow in the wake of his superior. But he might have done so more gracefully and desisted from such a ridiculous statement as that the Round Table organisation 'is not conducting and never has conducted a political propaganda.' Is this audacity or stupidity?......... It is some consolation that in future at least Mr. Curtis and his like will not dare to parade their unjust opinions on Indian politics under the cover of official names and official patronage."]

Kesari (95), 6th Feb.

14. We are surprised at the boldness of Sir James Meston when he calls the Round Table group a non-political body. In that way the Indian National Congress also would be non-political. Why then did Sir James and other officials show so much hesitation in allowing Government servants to attend its sessions? Or perhaps it lies entirely in the hands of the C. I. D. to determine the character of particular institutions, for they have in the past declared that institutions like the Shivaji festival, the Ganpati festival, the Swadeshi movement and even the Paisa Fund were political, and there have been instances in which Government servants have been dismissed from service for writing articles on educational reform, for sending their sons to the Samarth Vidyalaya and for similar other heinous offences. We may safely say that if some day hereafter some official contributor to the Round Table, convinced of the justice of the demand for Home Rule, writes in favour of its grant to India, his white skin will not save him, and he will have to bid good-bye to India at once. We know how the Bishop of Madras came into trouble for siding with the South African Indians and the coolies in Fiji in their troubles.

Gujaráti (13), 4th Feb.

15. The Gujaráti takes exception to the statement made by Mr. Marris in the United Provinces Legislative Council to the effect that the Round Table 'is not conducting and never has conducted a political propaganda and that it is a non-political association' and writes:—It is really ridiculous on the part of Mr. Marris to have made such a statement after having served in the police and after having known the manner in which the Press Act is put into operation in this country. What is the meaning of a non-political association? What is meant by political propaganda? If the Round Table group is not a political association why should the National Congress be considered a political body? Why should the members of the C. I. D. be deputed to report its proceedings? Are those who take part in the Congress dishonest? Why should Mr. Marris look with displeasure on the objects which the Congress means to achieve in future? Mr. Marris declares that he has every right to take part in discussions over imperial questions. If that is the case, where was the need of any explanation on his part? And why should the Government of India then have asked their servants not to take part in the deliberations of the Round Table? If Mr. Marris has a right to discuss Imperial questions, Indian officials have a fortiori a right to discuss matters pertaining to the welfare of India. At the Council meeting it was not made clear as to why the Round Table circulars were published at the Government Press and whether it was true that Mr. Curtis had framed his opinions after consulting Sir James and Mr. Marris. Nor was any explanation given as to what information was supplied to Mr. Curtis by Sir James and Mr. Marris.

Comments on Sir Benjamin's definition of loyalty.
Young India (11), 7th Feb.

16. In the course of a lengthy article contributed to Young India, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas writes:—"The Bombay Chronicle has done well to sound a prompt note of alarm in regard to the new danger that faces the Indian patriot. If Sir Benjamin Robertson's precedent is accepted,—and we have no doubt that such a useful precedent will be promptly catalogued in the armoury of repressive weapons belonging to the bureaucracy,—it will be no difficult, in fact, a very easy, matter for any one in authority in this country, who has an awkward position to defend, to suppress and bring to political ruin outspoken and inconvenient critics of the administration. [The writer here describes the action taken by the Central Provinces Government against Mrs. Besant, the explanation in defence of it given in the Central Provinces Legislative Council and the further explanation given by Sir B. Robertson to the Provincial Conference deputation. He then continues:—] It is difficult to characterise in moderate language the impropriety and the injustice of this procedure. It is absolutely lacking in everything that justice or ordinary fairness demands,—even of an official armed with the provisions of the Defence of India Act. The Bombay Government has used the Defence of India Act against Mrs. Besant, but, at least, it has the fairness and decency to preserve silence as to its reasons and to refrain from assailing her with charges which she has no opportunity to answer. In the first place, Sir Benjamin Robertson makes use of an utterance of another party to justify his action after the event. In the second place, he constitutes himself the Court to decide an issue which it is for the Courts alone to decide and, which is notoriously intricate even for Judges to do. Having done so, he proceeds to pronounce a public judgment on a man whom he has not heard in his defence and without producing a tittle of evidence in justification of his pronouncement.......... The author of the speech takes the only course open to a honourable man. He declares the charge against him to be utterly false and challenges Sir Benjamin Robertson to prosecute him, and he immediately takes steps to justify himself by repeating the speech in order that the public may judge for themselves. Then the Government of Madras steps in to assist Sir Benjamin Robertson out of his difficulty. Mr. Wadia is prohibited under the Defence Act from delivering his speech, the newspapers are forbidden to publish it, and thus everybody having been effectually gagged, the gentleman upon whom this atrocious slur has been cast is absolutely deprived of the opportunity of defending himself against a charge, which, if it were sustainable, would unfit him to take part in legitimate constitutional political propaganda. All that can be said is, that, if this procedure is condoned by the Government of India, those taking part in political work in this country must make up their minds that the protection of the Courts does not exist for them and that they are liable to be condemned publicly and officially as seditionists without being allowed to say a word in their own defence. The matter becomes all the more grave, when we remember that there are two standards of loyalty by which men are thus to be judged. There is, first, the standard laid down by the law, as interpreted and upheld by the Courts, against executive attempts to go outside it; and, second, the standard of the bureaucracy. And if the procedure adopted in the case of Mr. Wadia is to be a precedent, the bureaucracy will be at liberty to enforce their own standards against that of statute law as interpreted by the highest judicial authority....... The true loyalist in India is he who not merely respects and obeys the Government established by law,—mere obedience is the lot of slaves and animals,—but who intelligently and honestly endeavours to be loyal as well to his own country......... The bureaucracy in this country persistently attempt to set up a position which goes far beyond this. Their standard, as shown in their attempt for instance to secure the conviction of Mr. Tilak and in other instances, is one of loyalty or rather subservience to themselves. .... Such a position, as clearly held by the High Court, is unsustainable... But the bureaucracy will still try to stick to the claim which has been disallowed by the highest judicial authority. Now we do not know what Mr. Wadia actually said in his speech on Home Rule at Amraoti. But Sir Benjamin Robertson and the Madras Government, by suppressing the evidence, leave us no alternative but to make assumptions, which we are entitled to do. And our first assumption is that the speech was not seditious within the meaning of the law, or the Central Provinces Government would not have failed in its duty to prosecute the author. It must, therefore, have been seditious or disloyal,—the same thing,—according to a standard of loyalty arbitrarily set up by Sir Benjamin Robertson and accepted without question by the Government of Madras. That is the new danger. The Indian politician may keep within the bounds of the law and be perfectly honest and loyal in intention, in word and in deed......... But it is not enough. He must conform to the standard of loyalty arbitrarily laid down by Sir Benjamin Robertson,—and his like—who takes upon himself to distinguish between one kind of loyalty and another without condescending to offer even a tittle of the evidence on which he bases his decision. This is indeed bureaucracy in excelsis—bureaucracy with a vengence! It suggests a tyranny from which there is no escape. The new danger which thus faces us is more grave than any that has previously arisen through the arbitrary assumption and use of unheard-of powers by the Executive, and it is essential for all to combine in concerted action to secure our deliverance from it."

India should resolve never to submit to the tyranny of the Colonies through a reconstitution of the Empire on federal lines.

Young India (11), 7th Feb.

17. Mr. I. K. Yajnik, writing in Young India, thus concludes a review of Mr. Worstold's work entitled "The Empire on the Anvil", "which advocates wholeheartedly the establishment of a Federal Parliament and Executive with the representatives of all the component parts of the Empire on them":—"It is thus clear that whatever the merits of the proposed federal constitution, so far as England and the Colonies are concerned, it would spell signal disaster to India's political and economic condition. With an irresponsible executive within and the prospect of an Imperial Federation without, India would be reduced to a state of utter humiliation and helplessness, beyond anything hitherto conceived by us. While the whole Indian Nation is looking forward to a substantial elevation of its political status after the war, strong fetters are being forged for it elsewhere. This we hope would awaken us from our rosy dreams to a realization of the dreadful reality. Fortunately the clang of the heavy fetters has sounded in our ears and, if we are true sons of the Mother, whom we love and adore above everything else, we shall resolve never to submit to the tyranny of the five nations."

Lord Sydenham's second article on "The Danger in India" in the Nineteenth Century and After.
Message (6), 6th Feb.

18. Referring to Lord Sydenham's second article in the Nineteenth Cenutry and After on "The Danger in India," the Message remarks :—"Ill informed and prejudiced writings of mean and perverted minds will not help the cause of the Empire; they only add to the bitterness of disappointment and discontent and it is the sacred duty of every one who is interested in the preservation of the British Empire intact to see that mischievous writings such as the one we have referred to are nipped in the bud. 'It is an ill wind that blows no good to any body.' Writings of Lord Sydenham and the schemes of hare-brained empire builders are of that character, and let it not be said some day that through the indifference or apathy of her statesmen, England lost her noble heritage. Her glory rests in construction and consolidation and not certainly in destruction or disintegration. But neither construction nor consolidation has ever been perfected by the infamous paths which the advocates of the new Utopia have chosen to tread."

Complant that non-officials working for the extension of co-operative credit societies are looked upon with suspicion by the officials in the Bombay Presidency.
Message (6), 10th Feb.

19. The Message, in paying a compliment to the Governor of Bengal on the spread of the co-operative credit movement in that Presidency, observes :—"By saying this we do not wish it to be inferred that co-operative workers in this Presidency have not received any encouragement from Government. But such encouragement has been extremely small and in serveral areas the non-official workers, instead of receiving assistance, have been mistrusted and their movements have been closely and obtrusively watched. In many a district, one of our esteemed friends, who is himself an active and anxious worker in the cause, wrote to us sometime ago, Government officials looked upon these honorary workers as political suspects. This is one of the principal reasons which has induced non-official workers to withdraw, or rather not enter the field at all, in as large a number as could be desired. It is no doubt true that in the head of the Local Government we have a representative of the English landed aristocracy, who takes a keen interest in agriculture and agricultural prosperity, and Radical though he once was in English politics, he seems to have easily succumbed to the reactionary bureaucratism which rules the roost in the local Secretariat. H. E. Lord Willingdon has, therefore, been unable to do for the masses of this presidency what Lord Carmichael has been able to do in his own. Under the strong influence of men imbued with a cynical disregard almost of public opinion, Lord Willingdon has not been able to avail himself of the excellent opportunity which his position offered to do good to the people."

Comments on the severing of diplomatic relations with Germany by the United States.
Sánj Vartamán (29), 5th Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 5th Feb.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 5th Feb.; Hindusthán (17), 6th Feb.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 5th and 6th Feb.

20. The Sánj Vartamán expresses gratification at the bold step taken by President Wilson in breaking diplomatic relations with Germany and congratulates him on having thus upheld the honour of America. It, however, warns its readers against the news published by some of its contemporaries to the effect that America has declared war. It expresses hope that America will soon join the war and help the Allies to defeat Germany. [The Jám-e-Jamshed hails with delight the firm stand taken by President Wilson in protesting against the ruthless submarine policy of Germany. The headline over the telegram column of the paper is to the effect that America has declared war against Germany. The Praja Mitra and Pársi, while approving of the self-respecting attitude taken by President Wilson, considers that the repeated defiance hurled by Germany against America was solely due to the fact that America is not in a position to spare military help in a sufficiently large measure to be able to render effective help to the Allies. It, however, believes that if America joins the war its navy will help the Allies to destroy German submarines and to bring the war to a speedy and successful issue. The Hindusthán considers the step taken by America as a vindication of the principles for which the Allies have been fighting German militarism. It is not very sanguine of America joining the war but feels sure that its navy will be of great use to the Allies if it is forced to declare war against Germany. The Akhbár-e-Islám expresses its confidence in the strength of British navy to crush German submarinism. It expresses joy at what it considers as the declaration of war by America against Germany. In the subsequent issue the paper gives "At last America joins the war" as the heading of its article but in the course of it explains that America has merely severed diplomatic relations and that it may not declare hostilities for a long time as Italy had done. It does not think that the American army would be of much use to the Allies though it would render substantial help in other directions by joining the Allies.]

It would not be sensible on the part of England to carry out the English Channel Tunnel scheme.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 11th Feb., Eng. cols.

*21. "For a number of years a good many people both in England and France have desired to connect the two countries with a tunnel. Hitherto the robust commonsense of English people has resisted the economic temptations of a measure which is fraught with great political dangers. But now that the two countries are fighting in a common cause the tunnel idea has been revived and may meet with a more cordial support than it has hitherto done. To judge from the tone of the Anglo-French press, to-day it would appear as if they would be eternally fighting the Germans and as if they would be eternal allies! War, however, is so intoxicating, and it is so easy to forget that barely a hundred years ago Englishmen and Germans fought side by side against the French. Whatever the present political conditions in Europe may be, it would be rash to do anything on the basis of their perpetuation. However advantageous the Channel Tunnel may prove in a war with Germany, it will forever weaken the great impregnable sea-girdled position of England. It is to be seen if this commonsense view of the Tunnel will still be cherished by the commonsense of England."

A Japanese writer on the future relations of England with Japan and Russia.

Message (6), 9th Feb; Sandesh (103), 9th Feb.

22. The Message reproduces an article from the Modern Review of Calcutta by "A Japanese friend of India" in the course of which the following passages occur:—"The people of India should not sleep in the belief that Japan is going to preserve peace in India in case of emergency during any future war.......... Every thoughtful observer who has any opportunity of studying Japan in recent years will testify with me that the Japanese people to-day regard Great Britain as their first rival in Asia. Hundreds of articles have been published in Japan during the present war by responsible persons expressing the opinion that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance should not be continued after its expiry, and some of them have gone so far as to demand its abrogation during this war. Many Japanese think that the Russo-Japanese Alliance is more suited to their interest; they are inclined to think that with Russia's support they will also be able to eliminate Great Britain's influence in China and in the Pacific! It is beyond doubt that during this war Russia will stand by Great Britain. But where is the guarantee that after this European War Russia will remain so friendly to Great Britain? Russia entered into this war to acquire some territory in the Balkans and also expected that she might get Constantinople through the British aid. So far as we can see the latter proposition is out of the question. If Constantinople be taken Great Britain will be extremely foolish if she allows Russia to occupy it because what guarantee is there that Russia will not use it against Suez, if she becomes opposed to Great Britain as she was in the past? Russia cannot get any warm water port in the China Sea unless she can destroy Japan, and that is beyond any possibility for some decades to come. Russia must have a warm water port as that is very vital for her future. So far as it is known to us according to the published texts of the secret agreement between Russia and Japan (vide "Peking Gazette"), Japan is bound to help Russia in her attempt to get an outlet in the Persian Gulf, and in case Russia attacks India, Japan is bound to help Russia. Now Germany regards Great Britain as her worst enemy, and whatever may be the result of this war she will not be willing to shake hands with Great Britain as a friend. And the other day we heard from Professor Munsterberg of Harvard that after this war is over there will be a German, Russian and Japanese Alliance. Let us hope that this will never come about; but it is absolutely desirable for the people of India to prepare for the worst......... In this case would India be safe? Then, are the Indian people ready to defend their country by warding off the marches of such enemy? Then Great Britain's hands will be tied in Europe, and Australian and Canadian aid will be neutralized for obvious reasons, and we all know that the Turco-German combination had a special programme against Egypt. If ever that calamity comes, what will be the position of India?......... That Great Britain will not, in the aforesaid contingency, be able to help India much is beyond doubt. Then the immediate need for Great Britain, for her sake and for the sake of the preservation of the British Empire, is to take the people of India into equal confidence and have a thorough-going programme of preparedness for them." [The Sandesh also publishes a Marathi translation of the article.]

Comments on the European Registration Ordinance.

Message (6), 7th Feb.

23. "Is India a country in military occupation by the Europeans? We mean, is it after all a truth that Indians, except Eurasians, are to be recognised and treated as possible enemies in their own country? We do not know. But the proposal to compulsorily train every European and Eurasian in India, leaving Indians not only untrained but unarmed, makes us rub our eyes and wonder whether we are not after all a 'foreign element' in our own country! Judging from the writings in the Englishman and the Pioneer, which, whether inspired or not, prove many a time to be remarkable anticipations of official policy and views, and judging also from the Registration Ordinance published two days ago, we believe that compulsory military training for Europeans and Eurasians is not very distant. And we ask: what about the arming of Indians and admitting them to volunteer and commissioned ranks? 'Not yet', replies Anglo-India. Indians have perhaps no business to desire arms—no, not even to save themselves from tigers and lions or thieves or robbers or other nefarious human beings. Indians, again, have no business to be over-scrupulous in matters of self-respect, or honour, except of course, when the liberties and honour of 'small' nations in Europe are concerned. Self-sacrifice is the highest virtue and Indians should cultivate it so as to willingly sacrifice not only the lower self but also the higher self. Otherwise their loyalty would not be 'unconditional' as Sir James Meston would have it to be, nor perhaps like that loyalty which Sir Benjamin Robertson recently told he wanted to see cultivated among Indians."

Sind Observer (10), 20th Jan.

24. "The subject of compulsory service, which is to supersede the present volunteer system in India, is attracting much attention just now, as it is rumoured that the orders of Government are shortly to issue. It is universally acknowledged that volunteering as it exists under the Indian Volunteer Act is a mere costly farce and of no utility whatever to Government. There is no means of obliging attendance at drills or enforcing discipline, and the men cannot be called out for actual military service beyond a very restricted area. There are numbers of men who will not join a volunteer corps because the matter is not being taken seriously, and for the same reason the military advisers of Government will not recommend the expenditure of more money on the volunteer forces till a system is evolved which will promise a good return for the increased cost. The project now on the carpet is to enlist every able-bodied European and Anglo-Indian and, under a law sufficiently strong, to enforce discipline, oblige him to put in a certain period of military training every year. The recent English Volunteer Bill requires a man to put in 40 drills of an hour each in three months and thereafter ten drills a month. With such training we should possess in India an auxiliary force worth the money which must be expended on it if the men and officers are to be turned out efficient soldiers. The present system of selection of officers and non-commissioned officers will have to be drastically dealt with. The number of inepts who receive commissions and stripes nowadays is a matter of grave complaint among keen volunteers. Men are pitchforked into the commissioned and non-commissioned grades without any regard to their qualifications, and others who by attention to their duties deserve promotion are systematically overlooked. Universal training will fall heaviest on the poorly paid and hard worked class of Europeans and Anglo-Indians, and it is to be hoped that Government will take this into consideration when distributing the loaves and fishes. It is quite conceivable that the heads of some mercantile houses and even Government offices will not look with much approval at their subordinates having to absent themselves from office to attend drills, and will endeavour to get their pound of flesh by refusing holiday leave when it has been earned. Government must be prepared to protect those whom they are going to summon to compulsory training. One advantage of the system will be that slackers will not be tolerated under it. No loafing about while others are doing their bit. Every man will have to shoulder a gun and make himself efficient or take the consequences of his slackness. This is as it should be, and we trust Government will not delay any longer in introducing a measure necessary in the vital interests of the State."

25. "The burdens of the war seem to have fallen comparatively lightly on the European community in India. Two years and a half after the commencement of a ruinous war we get here the British European Registration Ordinance, making it obligatory on all Europeans resident in India to register within a month after the issue of the Ordinance. At a time when Englishmen in England are sacrificing not only their time and money but their very lives for the defence of their liberties we find here day after day restaurants and the big clubs full of Europeans intent on pleasure, wasting thousands daily on intoxicating drinks and other luxuries. Cannot the Government do something to prevent all this criminal waste? The few thousands thus saved daily may not help in winning the war: they may, however, materially help in relieving the sufferings of the wounded by providing the comforts of which they stand so much in need."

Cannot Government do something to prevent the criminal waste of money by Europeans in India on their pleasures at this critical juncture?

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 9th Feb., Eng. cols.

26. "The speeches made by the Indian princes on the occasion mark an important stage in the growth of the idea of Indian unity and nationality. Till now a veil of mutual distrust impeded the free flow of sympathy between British India and the States. It was torn down at the banquet, and the rulers of some of the most ancient and historic States of India publicly accepted the position which every one will gladly concede to them of leaders of our people in all that leads to India's unity and national greatness. We congratulate Their Highnesses and we congratulate the people both of their own States and British India on this happy consummation." [Sir Narayan Chandavarkar writing in the paper says:—"Every Prince breathed the spirit of awakened India; every Prince spoke the heart and the language, the hopes, the aspirations of the country at large. The charge that is so often levelled against educated Indians and that has been so cheaply and so irresponsibly given utterance to in unfortunate language by Lord Sydenham in the pages of the Nineteenth Century and After and in the columns of the London Times recently, that those Indians are a class and a cry by themselves, not reflecting the voice of the country, found its cogent answer in the speech of every Prince who spoke at the gathering."]

Comments on the speeches of the Indian princes at the banquet in honour of the Maharaja of Bikaner.

Indian Social Reformer (3), 11th Feb.

27. The Mahrátta, in the course of an appreciative review of the speeches delivered at the banquet, specially refers to His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner's appeal to the British nation to allow India "to work out her destiny under Britain's guiding hand and protection" and remarks:—

Mahrátta (5), 11th Feb.

"In the last sentence the Maharaja has simply paraphrased the Indian demand for self-government within the Empire. His Highness' wise words have found a distinct echo in the Maharaja of Alwar's speech and Indian minds which have been highly strung on this just claim will be relieved of the most disheartening suspicion of being forsaken by the rulers of one-third of India. Indians in British India will, therefore, feel highly gratified at the thought that their interests are entrusted into the safe hands of one who feels himself to be proud to call them as his brethren and sympathises with their aspirations. The occasion was thus unique in the annals of British India. There was always a rapprochement between the Princes and the Government of the land, but there were very few occasions on which it was evinced between the Princes and the people of British India. A wave of joy will pass over all the land when the sentiments expressed by their Highnesses will be found to be in unison with those of the people. War cemented the union between the Hindus and Muhammedans and it has also knit together the Princes and the people of British India. These happy omens for the future loom large on the horizon and augur well for the bright future of India."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 10th Feb.

28. The Bombay Samáchár pays an appreciative tribute to the services rendered by His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner to the Empire during the present war and considers him eminently fitted to represent India at the forthcoming Imperial War Conference. It refers to the speech made by His Highness at the farewell banquet given to him at the Taj Mahal Hotel, Bombay, in the course of which he promised to render all possible help towards advancing the interests of India at the Conference and expressed a hope that British statesmen would do justice to the claims of India by placing her on a satisfactory footing in the Empire and considers these sentiments as conclusive proofs of His Highness' solicitude for the welfare of India.

Protest against the giving of a public reception in honour of India's representatives at the Imperial War Conference, Message (6), 8th, 10th and *11th Feb.; Sandesh (103), 8th Feb.

29. "We referred some days back to a new movement which is afoot in London to give a fitting reception to the overseas representatives to the War Conference. Apropos of this a suggestion has lately been made by an anonymous writer that before the representatives selected by the Government of India leave these shores, the citizens of Bombay should accord them a hearty send-off. We should have rather assented to the suggestion that the Government House should do so and that the Secretariat should turn up en bloc at the Apollo Bunder or Alexandra Dock or wherever else these distinguished representatives of the Government of India embark to wish them a bon voyage. The suggestion that the citizens should give a public reception ought to be firmly discountenanced. Because, those who are selected by the Government of India are in no sense the people's representatives, even if as Sir S. P. Sinha said the other day, he and his distinguished colleague His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner would put forward before the Secretary of State for India the Indian point of view, and because it is clear that they are not going to the Conference as India's representatives. If the people want to show their appreciation personally of these two gentlemen, we have nothing to say against it. Both Sir Satyendra and the Maharaja Bahadur are estimable men and are, after all is said and done, our own countrymen. And we should not hesitate to honour them in their individual capacity, much as we may differ from their views. But there would be absolutely no propriety whatever—indeed it would be extremely derogatory to the sense of India's national self-respect—if after the way in which Sir James Meston has colluded with the two 'Wandering Ministrels' to hand over India to the domination of the Colonies, he is to be publicly honoured by the people. We have held and we still hold that it was a grave mistake on the part of the Government of India to have selected him as one of their representatives, after all the demonstration of public feeling. If they made the mistake, the people should not certainly repeat it and thereby justify it. However sorry we may feel in saying this, our sense of public duty and also our sense of proportion compel us to protest in advance against any movement which will tend to lessen our self-respect." [In its issue of the 10th the paper writes:—"Only the other day, we scouted the idea of giving a public reception to these 'representatives' before they leave these shores. The idea was too ludicrous and in our opinion none but people utterly lost to all sense of decency and proportion would have ever countenanced it. It is, therefore, with an extreme degree of pain that we have learnt of the 'Afternoon Party' which the Chairman and the Committee of the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau is going to give this evening at 'Shanti Bhuvan'—the place of our esteemed citizen Mr. Narottam Morarjee Gokuldas—in honor of His Honor Sir James Meston, Sir S. P. Sinha and His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner. In view of what we have previously stated, it is difficult to conceive what special interest 'the Chairman and Committee' of the Chamber had in arranging for this party. We have made enquiries and learn that several of the members were opposed to any such thing being done in the name of the Chamber......... Many of the members knew nothing of what was taking place in the inner councils of the Chamber, until the most uninviting invitation cards, bearing in every line the imprint of the nation's shame, were hurled at their unfortunate and amazed heads......... Hardly a week has elapsed since the Council of the Presidency Association indignantly and with burning shame rejected the proposal to give a fitting reception to 'India's representatives.'......... We ask what special motives 'the Chairman and the Committee' had in flouting public opinion in this manner." In its issue of the 11th the paper says:—"The party ostensibly given in the name of the Chamber at the residence of Sheth Narottam does not seem to have met with any considerable success. His Excellency the Governor was there, Lady Willingdon was there and their retinue was there. Among the rest were to be seen a number of sycophants, whose favourite occupation it is to dance attendance on 'his honor this' and 'your worship that'......... The most interesting fact about it is that Mr. Narottam himself, at whose residence the party was being held, was present at the protest meeting at the Excelsior Theatre and not at the party. It would have been more befitting on his part if he had flatly refused to lend his residence for such a party being held there, as unworthy of the cause to which he in common with his countrymen stands committed." The Sandesh makes similar remarks and adds that when the Congress Committee of his own Province has publicly condemned Sir James Meston's selection there appears to be no reason for the people of Bombay to do honour to him. Let him, the paper adds, prove his sympathies for India by giving proper advice to the Secretary of State, and then a grand procession will be held in his honour in Bombay on his return.]

Complant that no Muhammadan was selected to represent India in the Imperial War Conference.

Islámic Mail (4), 4th Feb., Eng. edition.; Al-Haq (42), 3rd Feb., Eng. cols.

30. Referring to the selections made to represent India on the Imperial War Conference, the Islámic Mail remarks:—"The gentlemen who have been selected by the Government to advise the Secretary of State are very able and statesmanlike people; but why should there not have been a Muhammadan there? It cannot be said that in the whole length and breadth of India there is not one Muhammadan who could be selected by Government. Nawab Malik Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana, Colonel Sir Afsarul Mulk, Sir Ali Imam or Justice Abdur Rahim would have been very good selections......... Government should no doubt select the fittest for such important task as the one now before it. What we urge, however, is that when a capable and qualified Muhammadan may be available, preference should be given to him. .... The bitterness noticeable in the Moslem feeling is mainly due to the neglect shown to them during Lord Hardinge's Viceroyalty. When Lord Chelmsford came to India Muhammadan hopes revived and they began to think that their evil days had ended. But unfortunately they do not find themselves so far in any better position. The seat in the Madras Executive Council which was regarded as almost settled on a Muhammadan went to a Hindu, and so is this opportunity lost to the Muhammadans. Our friends of the Raja (of Mahmudabad) League can have no ground for complaints on this score for they are nationalist and do not care whether preferments go to a Hindu or a Muhammadan, but the Muhammadans feel it." [The Al-Haq also regrets that no Muhammadan should have been selected as a representative. It declares that a community numbering 70 millions should not have been so ignored. It dwells on the deep loyalty of the Muhammadans, the courage and spirit of self-sacrifice with which they have fought for the Empire, the large contribution they are making to the revenues of the country and the enthusiasm with which they have helped the war and Relief Funds. It points out that none of the people of India can claim to have a greater interest in the questions that will be discussed by the Conference than the Muhammadans and asks if a "real Council of the Empire" will be complete without a Muhammadan on it. It concludes as follows:—"We have expressed these views as we know what the opinion of the Muammadans of this province is in this connection and we trust it is not too late for our Benign Government to consider the question of the Muhammadan representation on the War Council and select a Muhammadan representative from India, which selection will prove beneficial to both the Government and the Indian Muhammadans."]

Suggestion that the increasing number of beggars in Bombay might be enlisted for war service.

Mufid-e-Rozgár (122), 11th Feb.

*31. The Mufid-e-Rozgár declares that the number of beggars in Bombay is steadily on the increase and that they are particularly noticeable on Thursdays. It affirms that they are generally strong men and capable of doing any sort of hard work. It urges Government to enlist them as soldiers or at least as camp followers, thus killing two birds with one stone.

Appreciation of His Excellency Lord Willingdon's great sympathy for the poor.

Islámic Mail (4), 4th Feb., Eng. edition, and (121), 5th Feb., Urdu edition.

32. "Lord Willingdon is a friend of the poor and we all know it. He is never so happy as when he is conveying comfort and consolation to the hearts of those poverty-stricken people who are not fortune's favourites. Whenever there is any distress, whenever there is any trouble, our noble-hearted Governor is there among the poorest of the poor carrying consolation and sympathy. His popularity with the mill-hands is too well-known to need any repetition here.......... At a meeting of the citizens of Bombay held the other day to concert measures for the protection of children, Lord Willingdon who presided expressed his keenest sympathy for the movement.......... His Excellency spoke from his personal knowledge that the mass of the working population of the city was living in a condition of squalor and wretchedness. He assured the meeting that Government would do all that it was able to do by passing remedial measures and urged joint efforts of Government and the public to give the children of the working classes satisfactory educational opportunities securing them healthy homes and surroundings." [In its Urdu edition also the paper pays a tribute to the sympathetic attitude of His Excellency Lord Willingdon towards the poor, and adds:—The conditions surrounding the poor can only be improved when His Excellency carries the Government with him. The officers of the Municipal Corporation and others have paid greater attention to the improvement of the environments of the rich than to those of the poor. In spite of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah's protests, the Improvement Trust has earmarked millions of rupees for expenditure on the Parel Road Scheme though there was absolutely no necessity for it. On the contrary, the provision of sanitary homes for the poor was more urgently required. It is to be hoped that His Excellency's regard for the poor will be reflected in the doings of the officers of Government and that the poor will not be left uncared for.]

Comments on the recent extension of the period of prohibition against the landing of artisans in British Columbia.

Mahrdtta (5), 11th Feb.

*33. Referring to the statement that the Government of Canada has extended the period of prohibition against the landing of artisans and skilled or unskilled labourers at ports of entry in British Columbia to the 31st March 1917, the Mahrdtta remarks:—"Proof positive of the favourable change in the angle of vision! Whilst we are trying to embrace the colonies as our 'sister' dominions—so said the Maharajas the other day—our 'sisters' are trying to prohibit us from their own homes! We pity ourselves but hope that they would change their attitude after the Imperial War Conference. The prohibition order, however, is not a good omen."

Comments on the passing of the Asiatic Immigration Bill by the United States Senate.

Dnydn Prakdsh (34), 7th Feb.

34. Referring to the passing of the Asiatic Immigration Bill by the United States Senate, the Dnydn Prakdsh attributes the measure to the agitation carried on by the labouring classes in America and urges that on no account should Indians treat with indifference that agitation. It maintains that the India Office which professes to safeguard the Indian interests ought to have at once entered its emphatic protest against the measure and declares that it was most disgraceful that it should have slept over the matter. It exhorts Indians to declare by every possible means that they would never put up with this fresh insult and to take the necessary steps for retaliation.

The reply of the Collector to the shoemakers of Hyderabad (Sind) who protested against the income-tax assessment that they should exercise their right of appeal is nothing short of a mockery.

Sind Advocate (8), 25th Jan.; Phœnix (7), 24th Jan.

35. "With regard to the income-tax assessment at Hyderabad, about which another great meeting of protest organised by cantonment people (largely Muhammadans) has been held, it is reported that some shoemakers who after closing their shops in protest went to the Collector at Tando Mohamed Khan and represented their grievances, were told that they had the right of appeal in each individual case and this should be exercised as usual. This reply is a mockery and nothing less! Here is a case of gross public injustice—a case of scandalous burdening of any number of undoubtedly poor people (shoemakers as a rule cannot possibly earn Rs. 83 a month, and many of them are taxed!) and our officers play the joke of referring them to the appellate authority which usually as we know regards rejection of appeals as a matter of course. The Mukhtiarkar has done the excessive assessment because he feels that he will thereby please his superiors. The appellate authority will also, as experience shows, be moved by similar considerations, if perhaps to a less degree. This is a matter in which for the good name of the administration the Government of Bombay and the Government of India must interfere. The outlook of the local officials is generally narrow in these matters. The commotion at Hyderabad, which refuses to be quieted by farcical reference to the right of appeal, calls for attention from above." [The Phœnix writes:—"If it be a fact, as we presume it is, that the labouring classes have been assessed against all precedent, the situation calls for a dispassionate and calm reflection and consideration at the hands of the Collector and the Commissioner with a view to give redress wherever due. We have no faith in the decision of ordinary appeals in which we know full well, none but those who can produce unimpeachable documentary evidence like true accounts can succeed. And it goes without saying that men of the type we have mentioned above, who are said to have been assessed cannot in the nature of things be expected to keep any account. Nor is it possible that, in except a few instances, could the yearly incomes have quadrupled. There have been several such public protests against income-tax assessment in Karáchi and other places in the past, and we think Government owe it to the people to protect them against the overzealous discharge of duty by their subordinates. One feasible remedy suggests itself to us and this is to direct the new special income-tax officer who has been recently deputed to Hyderabad to make independent enquiries, not taking a cue from Mr. Ojha's assessment."]

EDUCATION.

Strictures on the existing educational policy of the Government in India.

Young India (11), 7th Feb.

36. Mr. L. G. Khare, writing in Young India about the Conference of Directors of Public Instruction, remarks:—"Educated India thinks that 'the present policy if pursued' will lead not to better results but to disastrous ones. Because what has been the effect of the Indian Educational Service system of education in India? We may say that the present policy was stereo-typed in the early seventies of the last century, and an effort was made to systematise education in all provinces in one uniform manner. It has dulled the intelligence, it has limited the outlook of the average Indian boy. Gradually the connection between an Arts degree and a clerkship in any one of the Government offices came to be so obvious, that the tendency to load the memory and ruin the intelligence so as to pass the all-important examination, became universal and an ineradicable curse. Did not the men in the super-posts of the Indian Educational Service in those days see it?......... Perhaps they may have replied that they had no control over educational policy then, as the Universities of those days were run by Indian lawyers 'fellows who are hopeless and declare everything ultra vires'. Well, why not stop the mischief now?—now, when Lord Curzon came to help them and turned the Universities into unofficial Government departments? .... There is neither the capacity, nor the volition. If educational policy had been wisely directed from the early beginnings, if the Indian demand for real technical education, for an education which will make the average student in India look out on life with a wider and more courageous gaze, had been instituated, the present chaos, the present sense of hopelessness, so noticeable in Indian youth, would not have come into being.... ..... The Viceroy lamented, 'On the commercial side of education, I am surprised to find how little has been done in spite of India's large and growing commerce, and I am puzzled as to its cause.' The Viceroy may be puzzled, but we wonder whether any single educated Indian is. Was it not the idea amongst some at least of early European mentors of Indian youth that it was all very well for 'these fellows to learn Mill and Kant' but it would never do for them to 'learn something by which they can cut at our commerce'? So it is natural that the discussion at the Directors' Conference gravely ran in the traditional channels. We hope the Directors were fortified in their deliberations by the announcement that the Royal Commission on the Public Services had proposed the creation of 50 super-posts in the Education Department at a cost of Rs. 5,00,000 to the Indian ryot. This to them must be a cheerful prospect; we would rather like a discussion, as to the possibility of delegating all teaching in India to Indian agency, reserving special posts only for those foreigners who are to train Indians in research work. We would like less to be spent on inspection and direction, utilising the amount thus saved on the pay of primary school teachers. And is it quite so necessary that children should sit on expensive 'Dudley' desks and learn Sloyd by the costliest methods imaginable?......... When the Honourable Mr. Paranjpye roundly declared before the Royal Commission three years ago that we can manage all our education ourselves, some of us shared the look of staggered surprise on Lord Islington's face, but since then Indian opinion has practically unanimously come to agree that the education of a nation's children must be in the hands of the children of the soil. We want European experience, we want European experts, but we want men to come over who know, unbiased by the caste influence of a service, how to teach, who are able to understand the mentality of those whom they teach, and finally we want them to be responsible to us if they do not show good work."

Gujaráti (13), 4th Feb.

37. Commenting upon the speech delivered by His Excellency the Viceroy at the Conference of the Directors of Public Instruction recently held at Delhi the Gujaráti does not agree with the view of His Excellency that the subject of education should not be discussed from a political standpoint, declaring that such jealous exclusion of politics from education is due to the eye of suspicion with which the authorities view Indians generally. Quoting the Viceroy's words "We must remove the idea that we have any ulterior motives behind our educational policy" it asks: If that be the aim of Government why should apprehension be entertained against the subject of education being viewed from a political standpoint? It further asks how it is that not a single Indian has been appointed Director of Public Instruction. If "education is not a subject to be wrapped up in mystery", inquires the paper, is it not surprising that it should be discussed by a body which contains no representatives of the people whose education is the subject-matter of discussion? It then proceeds:—How will the public enthusiasm for education increase if its expansion is not to be brought about and if the educational policy embodied in the Government of India Resolution of 1913 is going to be continued? It is clear that popular representatives have not been included in the Conference for fear they may advocate such an expansion. India does not want any continuance of the educational policy of 1913, but she wants that sort of education which would enable every Indian student and every Indian youth to take part in the national advancement. [The paper here refers to the Viceroy's recommendation to the Directors to take such steps as might lead to an improvement in the prospects of teachers, the elevation of their status, etc., and also to the solicitude shown by him for the expansion of industrial, commercial and female education, and then proceeds:—] How will these foreigners, ignorant of the condition, habits and sentiments of the Indian people, be in a position to consider these matters satisfactorily? We do not expect these alien Directors to do good in any direction in the matter of education. It is necessary that the work of education should in its entirety be handed over to the people. In England education is in the hands of the people whereas in India it is in the hands of the officials. The cobwebs of political distrust should be swept away from the domain of education. It is necessary for the State to be ready to encourage independent enterprise in the matter of public instruction, and this cannot be done without tabooing from the Educational Department miserable translations of English books written in a slipshod manner by people of Mr. Marsden's type and encouraging people to write school books on independent lines.

RAILWAYS.

Importance of direct railway connection between Bombay and Karáchi.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 9th Feb.

38. Dwelling upon the desirability of constructing a railway line running through the desert of Cutch to connect Karáchi with Bombay, the Jám-e-Jamshed writes:—It is unfortunate that the construction of such an important railway line should be deferred out of regard for the revenue of a single Native State. Such a line will greatly reduce the present uncomfortable distance between Bombay and Karáchi. How long will the gulf between these two commercial centres remain unbridged? Will not early steps be taken to bring the Baluchistan frontier border closer to Bombay—a consummation so desirable in the present war crisis? The apathy that is being shown towards this matter since the termination of Lord Curzon's régime is really regrettable.

MUNICIPALITIES.

Comments on the Honourable Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla's resolution in the Bombay Municipal Corporation about the abolition of the Improvement Trust.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 5th and 8th Feb.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 7th Feb.

39. Referring to the speech made by the Honourable Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla at a recent meeting of the Bombay Municipal Corporation in support of his resolution on the subject of requesting Government to dissolve the Board of the Bombay City Improvement Trust and hand over its work to the Corporation, the Bombay Samáchár observes that in the face of the admitted failure of the Trust to carry out satisfactorily the work for which it was brought into being, viz., improving the slums of the city, and providing sanitary chawls for the poorer classes, it is natural that the public should be so keen in their desire to see that the Trust Board either ceases to exist or that its constitution is substantially altered. The paper dwells on the usual accusations brought against the Trust and observes that the public are convinced of the futility of maintaining such an expensive institution. It also supports Sir Ibrahim's scheme about the creation of a Municipal Improvement Committee, on the lines of the Standing Committee, to supplant the present Trust Board. [In its subsequent issue the paper expresses its satisfaction at the Corporation passing Sir Ibrahim's resolution, though in an amended form. It remarks that the plea of the Honourable Mr. Orr in support of the continuance of the Trust Board, viz., that there are reasons to apprehend that plague might reappear at any time in future with all its previous severity, strengthens the case of his opponents instead of justifying the existence of the Trust. It does not agree with the Chairman of the City Improvement Trust in laying the guilt of the present unsatisfactory condition of things at the door of the Bombay Municipality and in finding fault with the building bye-laws of the municipality. The paper remarks that the congestion of the localities in the neighbourhood of the areas improved by the Trust was not the result of faulty municipal bye-laws, but was the outcome of the Trust's shortsighted policy of demolishing insanitary houses on a wholesale scale without making any provision for the accommodation of those dishoused. The paper winds up with asking the Trust Board to submit to the public demand for an improvement in its policy and constitution or to be prepared to hand over its work to the Corporation. The Sánj Vartamán refers to the arbitrary policy alleged to be adopted by the Trust since the time of Lord Sydenham and, in view of that policy, advocates the total abolition of the Trust Board. It maintains that the Honourable Mr. Orr treats with contempt the demand of the Corporation for preference being given to the duty of improving insanitary slum areas because he commands the majority on the Trust Board. It is of opinion that the rate-paying public should demonstrate to Mr. Orr and his majority that they will not tolerate such humbug on their part any longer. The paper also regards as puerile the defence set up by the Trust against the charge of neglect in mitigating congestion by attributing it to defective municipal bye-laws, contending that if the improvement of the bye-laws had been thought sufficient to relieve congestion, the Trust would not have been brought into existence. The paper concludes with wishing that Sir Ibrahim had remained firm and not accepted the amendment to his original resolution.]

Rást Goftár (28), 11th Feb., Eng. cols

*40. Commenting upon the discussion in the Bombay Municipal Corporation over the suggested abolition of the Bombay Improvement Trust, the Rást Goftár remarks:—"We believe firmly that if the Corporation were placed in sole charge of the duties which are by law vested in the Trust, the Corporation would give a better answer to the public and yield a much better return for the money spent on improvement. By replacing the routine methods of the Trust with a scheme for bold and extensive treatment of the slums, it would show a much more satisfactory account than the Trust has been able to render during all these years of its existence. By dissociating the Corporation from the work to which the Trust attends, Government have displayed a lack of confidence in that body which is not justified; and this policy of distrust is nowise in keeping with Government's avowed intention to associate people in ever so increasing a measure as possible with the administration of their local affairs.......... The interests of the city demand that the improvement of slums should be urgently taken into hand to prevent a recrudescence of those conditions which existed when plague made its unwelcome advent in the city. The Trust has pinned its faith on a different policy, and a return to any other is past praying for, considering the reception which that body has given to the Corporation's repeated protests against the prolonged and studied neglect of slum-improvements. The time is, therefore, reached for its dissolution; and failing a resolution to that effect Government must give effective representation to the Corporation on the Trust's board and substantial power wherewith to influence and shape its future policy."

Alleged hardships of the people of Sávantvadi owing to the post of Chief Judge having remained vacant for the last four months.

Chikitsak (87), 31st Jan.

51. A Sávantvadi correspondent of the Chikitsak complains that the post of the Chief Judge of Sávantvadi having remained vacant during the last four months since the appointment of Mr. Rane, the Chief Judge, as Administrator, the people have been very much inconvenienced as there is nobody to hear suits of over fifty rupees and appeals also cannot be heard. The correspondent remarks that the present arrangement may effect some saving to the State, but that is no excuse for disregarding the great inconvenience and loss which the people are at present undergoing owing to no chief judge having yet been appointed.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Gujarâti (13), 11th Feb.; Hindusthân (17), 12th Feb.

1. Referring to the remark made by the Viceroy during the course of his speech at the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council reminding the members of the appeal made by Lord Hardinge to his Council to abstain from any action which might provoke controversy during the present crisis, the Gujarâti expresses surprise that the Viceroy should have felt the necessity for any such reminder. It points out that the amendment of the Civil Service Regulations, the Patna University Bill, the Report of the Indian Public Services Commission, etc., are measures which all emanated from Government. Are these and kindred questions, such as educational reform, development of industries, military service, the Arms Act, the public demand for constitutional reforms, etc., of so insignificant a character, inquires the paper, that they can be postponed for the present without the Indian public expressing their opinion on them? It observes that discussion on these subjects should cease only if action is to be taken on them regardless of the public voice. It also inquires if the object of the Viceroy, in quoting the resolution passed [illegible] the Council in September 1914, expressing a desire on the part of the Indian people to share in the financial burden imposed by the present war upon the United Kingdom, is to give the amount raised by the proposed Indian War Loan as a present to His Majesty's Government. Will the military expenditure, asks the paper, incurred in Mesopotamia and elsewhere be saddled on India or will England pay back the money so spent to India in due course at her convenience? It then goes on to refer to His Excellency's declaration of the intention of Government to enrol Indians for military service as a part of the proposed Defence of India Force, and proceeds thus:—The announcement is one calculated to please the Indians, but the latter do not want to serve merely as soldiers. They want high positions in the army. It is certain that if the distinction between the white and the black is maintained in the Force the Indians will not come out in large numbers. Officers commanding Indian units should be Indians. The objects aimed at will not be accomplished if there is a difference between them and others in the matter of salary etc., and the Indians in that case should not be blamed for the result. The Indian's sense of self-respect refuses to recognise any distinction among citizens of the British Empire. Indians will not refuse to come forward in defence of their country and will not lag behind in serving the Empire if they are invited to join the army in a spirit of equality and liberality. [The Hindusthân expresses its sense of great jubilation at the new right granted to the Indians of volunteering during the continuance of the war. It believes that the iron doors leading to India's golden future have now commenced to open. It declares that volunteering will regenerate Indian manhood and feels confident that if the principle of volunteering is developed, it will enable India to demonstrate her unflinching and unshakable devotion to the Empire. The paper hopes that the Viceroy's appeal to the Indians to join the new Force in large numbers will receive a hearty response. It also wishes that the Indians may be treated on a footing of equality with others composing the Force.]

Young India (11), 14th Feb.

2. Commenting upon the statement made by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford in the Imperial Legislative Council on the subject of indentured labour, Young India remarks:—"But is it possible for anyone who is not an Indian to feel what an Indian feels on this question,—the shame that haunts us by day and by night, the reproach that is always before us, that we should have allowed the dishonour of Indian men and women to be sold for all these years under a legalised system of semi-slavery and never have raised our voice in protest or even realised in the smallest degree the iniquity that was being perpetrated in our name and by the law of our own land?........

All that we can ask Lord Chelmsford and others in whose hands this matter lies to do is to try and put themselves in the same situation in thought and to ask themselves what would happen in England if such a system of the sale and treatment of English men and women existed. Would any economic or material interest be allowed to stand for one moment in the way of the ending of it? Indignation would sweep the Government that attempted to palter with such an issue off its feet. When we remember the wave of indignation and protest that swept over England against the bringing of Chinese indentured labourers to South Africa under similar conditions ten or twelve years ago, can we believe for a moment that the British electorate would not endorse the action of a Government that abolished Indian indentured labour in the Colonies by a stroke of the pen? Lord Chelmsford accused Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who desired to introduce a Bill into the Imperial Council for immediate abolition, of impatience. How can His Excellency justify such a charge? He tells us that Lord Hardinge when he promised abolition of the system warned the country that time would be required to work out the new conditions and until the Colonies should have had time to adjust themselves to the change. Has there not been time enough? Lord Hardinge's pledge was that the 'badge of helotry was soon to be removed for ever.' Did any one who heard or read his words conceive that a year later his successor would be asking us to be patient and to await the discussion of measures for abolition, which had not yet begun?......... Now we are asked to wait for a conference that is to begin its deliberations three months hence; and that in the knowledge that an attempt is being made to secure an extension of the system for another five years. This cannot be. We must see to it that Lord Chelmsford, Mr. Chamberlain and the British public do appreciate Indian sentiment.......... We have been over-patient.......... To satisfy India all that Lord Chelmsford has to do is to back up and work for the demands contained in the resolutions passed at the two meetings in Bombay. If the Home Government will not stand by him, it is open to him, as Mr. Gandhi suggested, to resign and the people of India will know then how to back him up......... India's earnest desire at the present moment is to stand behind beside Great Britain in the great struggle that is being waged for freedom and honour and to render all the aid, material and moral, that it is in her power to do. But she cannot be asked in the meanwhile to forget and sacrifice her own honour."

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 13th Feb.; Sandesh (103), 11th and 15th Feb.

3. The Dnyán Prakásh draws a contrast between His Excellency the Viceroy's statement with regard to the abolition of the indentured labour system and the firm attitude taken up by Lord Hardinge on the question, and declares that looking to the tenderness for the interests of the Colonists shown by His Excellency, it entertains grave doubts as to how far the assurances given by him for an early abolition of the system will be carried out. It appeals to the Viceroy to look at the question from the Indian point of view instead of from that of the colonial capitalists, and to put an end to the system at once as it has reduced Indians to a state of utter moral degradation. Referring to the Committee which is to meet in London by the middle of May to consider the subject, it declares that India would refuse to wait till the deliberations of the Committee, on which it advocates a full representation of non-official Indians, are concluded, and urges that pending the decision of the Committee, Government should at least immediately suspend the emigration of labourers to Fiji and other places. The paper then refers to the gratification felt by the public at His Excellency's announcement about the enrolment of Indians in the Defence of India Force and hopes that due consideration will be given to the suggestions made in the Press as regards appointing Indians to the higher posts in the force and the adequate payment of the men enrolled. [The Sandesh writes:—This concession for the enrolment of Indians, will, we are sure, make Indians forget the past unpopular acts of His Excellency. The people must now prepare themselves to enlist in the force, but at the same time we must warn Government that their attitude towards the Indians that so enrol themselves should be such as not to give the least ground for suspicion. Why are the Indians to be taken into service only up to the end of the war? Will they not be required afterwards? Why this distrust of Indians? Suppose peace is declared the very day after Indians enrol themselves as volunteers; are they to lay down their arms at once? Why should Indians be called upon to enter the army only when they have to sacrifice their lives? We, therefore, appeal to Government to convert the force proposed to be raised into a "territorial" force and to place it on a permanent footing. No sooner this is done than all the members on the Home Rule League Registers will promptly join the force. [The paper then refers to the agitation in the country against the indentured coolie system and says:—] It is strange that notwithstanding the holding of so many meetings, His Excellency the Viceroy should not yet take courage to abolish the system at once. Measures like the Press Act and the Defence of India Act came into existence at a stroke of the pen, as soon as anarchist crimes began to be committed in Bengal. Are the outrages committed in the Fiji Islands against Indian women less heinous than the anarchist outrages in Bengal? Such a policy can no longer be tolerated. The paper also publishes a number of verses which after describing the outrages which Indian female labourers in Fiji are reported to have been subjected to, make an appeal to Indians to move energetically in the matter with a view to induce His Majesty the King-Emperor to intervene personally and abolish the hateful indentured labour system.]

Mahrátta (5), 18th Feb.

*4. Referring to the Viceroy's announcement regarding enrolment of Indians in the Defence of India force, the Mahrátta remarks:—"Better late than never; and they have, after two years and a half, taken a step which the whole country wished them to take much earlier. We are grateful to the Viceroy for this bold measure and we hope it will leave a permanent impress upon the future policy of our Government.......... But bold though the policy is, the expression given to it is as faint-hearted as anything. Contrasted with the declaration of the French Governor the enunciation of the policy of our Viceroy pales into insignificance. It guarantees no equality of status with the Britishers, there is no mention in it of the commissions and other matters so urgently insisted upon by the people of India, and there is not the faintest expression about the permanancy of the policy so generously undertaken. The appeal of the Viceroy sadly lacks all these necessary elements, and unless he makes himself clear about these, the response, we are afraid, will not be so splendid as he expects. It is not that better prospects alone have any allurement for the Indians. They want that the colour bar, in the matter of promotions and privileges, so detested by every Indian, should be removed and equality of opportunity should be guaranteed to Indians and Europeans alike. [Here the paper quotes the proclamation issued by the Governor of Pondicherry in 1916 and His Excellency the Viceroy's announcement and goes on:—] None can fail to realise the vast difference between the two. If Lord Chelmsford meant to be serious in his declaration and if he wished that Indians should heartily respond to the call of the Motherland and the Empire he should have been as explicit as his French colleague. But unfortunately he was not. Hesitation begets hesitation, and it would be no fault of the Indians if they remain wavering for some time. Let the Government of India imitate the French Government in outlining the policy of equal treatment and we are sure the response of India will then be as grand as it is expected.......... Indians must remember that readiness and ability to defend their home and the Empire are always presupposed when they demand Home Rule; and if those Home Rulers who are qualified to do this duty miss this opportunity, no greater blunder will be committed by them. The doors are flung open for them to show their loyalty and defend their hearths and homes."

Sánj Vartamán (29), 16th Feb.

5. The Sánj Vartamán thanks Government for the announcement that Indians will be enlisted as volunteers in the Defence of India Force and expresses a hope that the Force will be officered by Indians. It wishes Government had long ago abandoned their attitude of distrust towards Indians by giving them the right of bearing arms as volunteers. It feels sure that a large number of Indians would have come forward to fight the Germans if they had the necessary military training. It asks Government not to limit the privilege till the duration of the war but to confer it permanently upon the Indians. The paper exhorts the Parsis to raise a Parsi Volunteer Corps in Bombay.

Gujaráti (13), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.

*6. Referring to His Excellency the Viceroy's complaint that there was a tendency to press discussion on controversial questions, the Gujaráti remarks :—"We are sorry His Excellency has not been as fair and impartial as we expect him in making such a complaint.......... What has His Excellency's own Government done? A more senseless and reactionary piece of educational legislation than the Patna University Bill has not been placed on the anvil of the Supreme Legislative Council in recent years.......... If the Government of India and the Provincial Administrations choose to be unfair to themselves and do not practise the high principles they preach to the Indian public, surely it is not the critics who are to blame. As regards indentured labour, His Excellency has failed to appreciate the nature of the issue that is before the public and the standpoint of the Indian people. .... His Excellency has put in a good word for the Colonies who, we are told, have shown the utmost readiness to co-operate in removing the features of the system which are regarded as objectionable....... The Viceroy may have confidence in the good faith of the Colonies, but we confess we have hardly any. Their hands have not been clean and they deserve no sympathy whatsoever. .... The issue is not contentious, so far as the people of India are concerned, but if it is made to assume such a complexion in defiance of the universal feeling in the country, His Excellency will hardly be justified in complaining of controversial discussions for which the Indian public is not at all responsible. [The paper then refers to His Excellency's statement that steps would be taken to expedite the consideration of the recommendations of the Public Service Commission's Report and says :—] The people will not be satisfied with the crumbs that have been provided for them with such unexampled generosity. His Excellency has been saying a good deal about festina lente, 'circumspection' and 'well-considered lines'. These stale phrases have no longer any charm or value in the eyes of the Indian public who have waited long enough. His Excellency is at liberty to think that the waiting period ought to be longer. All that we can say is that these oft-repeated exhortations run the risk of being looked upon as being of an interested character in view of what has happened during the last thirty or forty years. Experience is the best teacher and not mere viceregal exhortations. We are sorry to say so. But those who say so are not to blame for their convictions. [The paper next refers to the announcement regarding enrolling Indians in the Defence of India force, and remarks :—] We feel satisfied that temporary and half-hearted arrangements of the kind foreshadowed by His Excellency are not calculated to inspire the country with feelings of profound gratitude. Indians want the privilege of enlisting as Volunteers, and genuine facilities for obtaining military training and education and commissions in the army. We do not think the Viceroy's pronouncement goes to this length or holds out genuine hopes in that direction. Festina lente may still have a charm of its own at Delhi or Simla, but it has exhausted all its efficacy and potentialities during the last forty years."

Kesari (95), 13th Feb.

7. The Viceroy complained about ill informed public criticism against the selection of Indian representatives to assist the Secretary of State at the War Conference. But even after he has given explanations, there remain certain points about which the public are not satisfied. For instance, if the Colonies are to have additional representatives at the Conference over and above the Secretary for the Colonies, who would be able to vote, why should not India have been accorded similar treatment? Moreover, if officials alone were to be selected, why were not the names of officials like Sir Benjamin Robertson and Lord Carmichael placed before the Imperial Legislative Council for selection? The Colonies would certainly not have taken objection to such a procedure. As regards His Excellency's complaint about introducing controversial matters for discussion, we can only say that the outcry raised by Government on this matter is utterly groundless as they themselves and not the non-official members have been guilty of the transgression on numerous occasions. The only encouraging item in His Excellency's speech is the announcement that Indians will be allowed to enrol themselves as volunteers. A period of six months is to be allowed to see how far Indians respond to this new concession, and if during that period a sufficient number is not enrolled and if the war does not end by that time then compulsion will have to be resorted to just as has been done in England (sic). That such an occasion should not arise will depend upon the number of men who will offer themselves as volunteers. This new right should, therefore, be availed of by as many people as possible.

Indian Social Reformer (3), 18th Feb.

*8. "Rambler" writes in the Indian Social Reformer:—"We cannot help confessing that we have looked through His Excellency the Viceroy's speech in the hope of finding in it marks of real statesmanship, but in vain.......... We expected from His Excellency a genuine touch with the people's feeling; but this is wanting throughout. The case of indentured labour has been discussed threadbare. The case of post-war reforms is no better. To stigmatise the attitude of Indian members as one of 'impatience and discontent' and to insist upon their observance of 'unwritten understandings' when Government have at the time been busy in the secrecy of their offices dealing quietly with all manner of vital and controversial questions, is a patently unfair proceeding.......... The most charitable construction can only lead one to imagine that His Lordship has permitted himself to be misled both as to the direction as well as the sphere of his work."

Comments on Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's resolution regarding more frequent meetings of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Young India (11), 14th Feb; Sandesh (103), 14th Feb.

9. After quoting the views of various Honourable Members on the resolution introduced by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in the Imperial Legislative Council for more frequent meetings of the Council, Young India remarks:—"The question, however, is as to which of these honourable gentlemen is right—whether Mr. Dadabhoy the Barrister-cum-businessman or his commercial friend Mr. Milne. The former says that the professional lawyer will suffer by Mr. Malaviya's proposal. Mr. Milne says that the Council will pass into the hands of the lawyer-politician. Both cannot be right at the same time. To us it seems that the apprehensions of both are unfounded. Those who are really in earnest about their work on the Council, will welcome more frequent and more regular meetings, to whatever class they belong. And as for the passing of the Council into the hands of any class, that is impossible under the present rules, under which the official class must exclusively posses the field. And the resolution failed mainly because it would have disturbed the discretion and the convenience of this class." [The Sandesh also supports the Honourable Mr. Malaviya's resolution and remarks that it was shameful on the part of an Indian member like the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy to have opposed it.]

Comments on the defeat of the Honourable Mr. Sarma's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding local option.

Kesari (95), 13th Feb.

10. The Honourable Mr. Sarma's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council advocating local option was defeated with the help of the usual official majority, but Government were unable to put forward anything more substantial than the usual fallacious arguments. The local authorities, it was stated, were the best judges about the location of liquor-shops. But we maintain that the people of the locality where a shop is to be opened and not the officials are the better judges. What have the officials to lose if such shops are located near other people's houses? Will they allow them to be opened in their own neighbourhood? It was also argued that there are no means wherewith to sound public opinion in such matters. This, we think, is the height of falsehood. The fact is that Government neither try to sound public opinion themselves, nor do they recognise any efforts that may be made to ascertain it. How then can public opinion assert itself in the face of such a deliberately blind policy as that?

The question of indentured labour to Fiji.

Gujarâti (13), 11th Feb.; Bombay Samâchâr (55), 13th Feb.; Sânj Vartamân (29), 12th Feb.; Jâm-e-Jamshed (20), 10th Feb.; Navsâri Patrika (66), 11th Feb.

11. The audience cried 'shame' when they listened to the tale of the woeful misery of indentured labourers at the public meeting recently held in Bombay; but it is really disgraceful on the part of Indians themselves that they should have tolerated the system which has tended to the violation of the chastity of their mothers and sisters for the last half a century! Should not India now exert itself to bring this shameful practice to an end? The situation would not in any way be improved by increasing the percentage of indentured women as suggested by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, for it will merely result in the prostitution by force of fifty per cent. of women instead of thirty! Lord Hardinge gave his emphatic opinion on the question in the year 1915; but the Secretary of State seems to be indifferent to it as he is influenced by the rich colonials to set at naught the feelings of Indians in this matter. Pounds, shillings and pence seem to have such a predominating influence on the opinion of the Secretary of State as to over-weigh the degradation and disgrace that come to India by the continuance of the system. Will England, that has been fighting for the rights of smaller States and has truth and righteousness as her mottos, tolerate for a moment a system which brings disgrace to India? As suggested at the public meeting at Bombay, the system of indentured labour should be put at end to by the 31st May 1917. We hope the strong opinion that India has been expressing on this subject will have some influence on the Conference that will shortly meet in London to consider the question of indentured labour in the Colonies. [The Bombay Samâchâr endorses the views expressed by various European and Indian speakers at the meeting and expresses a hope that Government will be moved to put an end to the system of indentured labour. The Sânj Vartamân also asks Government to put an end to the system by the end of May 1917. The Jâm-e-Jamshed is in full sympathy with the opposition to indentured labour. It is of opinion that the position of indentured labourers would in no way improve by increasing the percentage of women and asks Government to immediately put a stop to women being indentured for export to the Colonies. The Navsâri Patrika expresses hope that Government will put an end to the system at an early date as it has given rise to an outburst of unanimous opposition from the public at large.]

Kesari (95), 13th Feb.

12. Though, in view of the public meetings that are being held all over the country, Government will not have the boldness to say that the condemnation of the proposed continuance of the indentured coolie system is not backed by public opinion, we are not very hopeful that Government will show much regard for the public opinion so expressed, for it appears from the Viceroy's speech that the determination of Government to continue the system is unalterable and there is no power in India that will unfailingly bring about a change in the decision of Government. Really we never felt so keenly the powerlessness of public opinion in India as on the present occasion. But what is it that is objectionable in our demand for the abolition of indentured labour that Government should be loath to grant it? By granting it their prestige will in no way suffer, nor will the British Empire come into trouble. This stolid indifference of Government to public opinion only brings out in strong relief the true character of the relations between the rulers and the ruled in India. Whenever Government want to follow a particular line of policy they resort to some excuse or other to flout public opinion. But even that is not possible in the present matter. The only class of people in the country whom Government can rally round their banner are the greedy and badmash agents supplying indentured labour. The root cause of all this helplessness of public opinion is that Government is not 'our' Government. It is only a mercenary agent of an alien master. It does not possess any authority of its own. It is merely an appendage of the Secretary of State who in his turn is completely at the mercy of the Cabinet which is always trying to please the Colonial Secretary. The Viceroy himself must have been feeling this mortifying position. All the same, Indians have to suffer the consequences of the faulty system of Indian administration. Had the Viceroy been 'ours' he would not have cared for the interests of the Colonials, for whom Indians have no sympathy and who do not deserve it. But why should the British Government at all care if the people of India have to grovel in slavery? Had the aggrieved party been Englishmen they would not have tolerated this wrong for a single moment. If in spite of all these facts Government think that there is nothing objectionable in this system of labour, why do they not afford facilities to the labouring class in England as well as the helpless Belgians to enjoy its sweet fruits? But it is the love of the British Government that comes in the way of these people being made to taste the sweet nectareous fruits growing in the paradise of Fiji.

Rást Goftar (28), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.

13. "A Conference is going to be held before long in London when the question of labour for the colonies will be threshed out in all its aspects. The Indian Government will put in its case there doubtless with a vigour all its own; but it is none the less essential that there should be non-official Indian representatives on the Conference to give expression to the popular sentiment of this country and to strengthen the hands of Government out here in its opposition to those vested interests that are likely to prevail strongly on the Council. Such representation of Indians is only too obviously required after the late announcement of Lord Chelmsford in favour of an alternative system on the lines of the kangani of Ceylon which is replete with such flaws and defects as to place it on a level with helotry pure and simple. The knell of the indentured system must therefore be tolled now and for ever. In Fiji, it has given rise to a state of terrible depravity. The figures revealed by the criminal statistics of the settlement tell their own grim tale.......... Shall enforced prostitution of women, which forms an inseparable condition of the system in vogue, receive the connivance of the Empire with its great and honourable traditions? We hope not. If the system has endured so long it is only because of the general public ignorance in respect of its indescribable atrociousness. Now that enough facts have been brought to light, we trust that no time will be lost in consigning the system to its grave." [The Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—"We would most respectfully refer the Viceroy to the meaning—the correct meaning—put by Mr. Polak upon His Excellency's assurance that he would see to the amendment of the sex ratio prevailing among the emigrants. It meant, said Mr. Polak, that more women were to be condemned to prostitution. The Government of India should know that no half-measures can work in this matter. It is no concern of India to help Colonial vested interests. If the obligation to suggest a better system be not fulfilled, let the evil be eradicated in one movement by one stroke of the pen for the simple reason that the honour and the good name of the Empire are at stake."]

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 16th Feb., Eng. cols.

14. "The Indian public has evidently determined to let Government know, that war or no war, they will agitate the matter till it is decided to abolish the system entirely and immediately. It is apparent that the people mean business. It is not merely that a popular cry is being taken up successively by different groups of people. It is a definite demand. A time limit has been fixed. The cry is 'stop indentured labour by the 31st of May'. And if the voice of a whole people has the power to demand effectively that a hideous evil shall be removed, it is difficult to see how any Government, much less the British which even at the present moment is fighting the war of liberty and righteousness, can resist that demand.......... The people are not convinced that the evils could not be abolished by a stroke of the pen.......... Apparently Government had not realised the strength of the sentiment that exists on the subject. We hope it will be realised now. It does not appear as if the public are going to rest until it is fully recognised and effect given to it. No half measures will serve the purpose or satisfy the public conscience......... It is hardly fair to expect people to cease their clamour against a system, so rightly detested, merely because the country gave a pledge to abstain from controversy during the war.......... To continue an abuse which could be put a stop to by a little courageous statesmanship, is to invite agitation and provoke controversy. The people of India are patient and loyal but they are human. The agitation is to be deplored, but there is no help for it."

Message (6), 15th Feb.

15. "It is understood that the Government of India are now in receipt of the replies of Local Governments in regard to indentured labour........ As the replies relate to the future system of emigration to Fiji and the West India Islands, and have been obviously obtained by the Government of India to enable them to make representations to the Secretary of State in connection with the inter-departmental conference to be held in May, will the Indian public be given an opportunity of knowing in advance the nature of these replies? We doubt if the sympathy of the Government of India will extend so far. Perhaps, if any honourable member is venturesome enough to raise a question at the next meeting of the Imperial Council, he might be told that Government do not consider it advisable to do so. Even were it merely to elicit that much information, we trust some honourable member will interpellate Government on the matter."

Comments on the passing of the Asiatic Immigration Bill by the United States Senate.
Mahrātta (5), 18th Feb.

16. Referring to the passing of the Asiatic Immigration Bill by the United States Senate, the Mahrātta remarks:—"President Wilson had for a time warded off the danger by vetoing the measure, but it was again passed by the Senate and has thus become a law. The U. S. A. has every right to restrict immigration from any country, but had the British Ambassador or our Government taken a threatening attitude of passing retaliatory measures, the States would have considered our case from a different standpoint altogether. Instead of doing this the British Ambassador has, as the correspondent of a Calcutta paper says, made the public believe that India is not at all interested in the question. Fine example of representing our interests!"

Comments on the order of the Punjab Government prohibiting Mr. Tilak from entering the Province.
Mahrātta (5), 18th Feb.

17. Referring to the order issued by the Punjab Government prohibiting Mr. Tilak from entering the Province, the Mahrātta remarks:—"Not only Mr. Tilak but even his friends were surprised at this wild order of the Punjab Government. For as a matter of fact Mr. Tilak had, till now, not even dreamt of visiting the Punjab, nor had he received any invitation from that province. What the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to call 'reasonable grounds' for his belief that Mr. Tilak would not only visit the Punjab but there act in a manner prejudical to the public safety is, therefore, either a hoax played upon him by his subordinates or a nightmare created by the diseased imagination of some Government authority. It is really ridiculous to see a mighty Government frightened by such nightmares, and using the strongest weapon in its armoury to crush an imaginary danger. Mr. Tilak lately visited the United Provinces and the Central Provinces and no danger to the Empire or any other evil effects of his visits to those provinces have resulted therefrom. It was on the morning of his 61st birthday celebration that Mr. Tilak received a notice from the Poona Magistrate asking him why he should not be prosecuted under section 108, Criminal Procedure Code. Now Mr. Tilak is taking an active part in supporting the Defence of India Force movement announced by the Viceroy in his last speech at Delhi, and exhorting the people of the Maharashtra to whole-heartedly respond to this call of Government; and as the fates would have it, the Punjab Government has served him with a notice under the Defence of India Act against entering that province on the frontier, where alone, if at all, the Defence of India Force will, in all likelihood, have to act! From this, one can easily judge how far our Local Governments have grown over sensitive to danger—so over sensitive as to abuse the power placed in their hands for the real defence of the country. Madness can hardly go further!"

Comments on the reply of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces to Mr. B. P. Wadia's request for information as to the portions of his speech which were regarded as objectionable.
Young India (11), 14th Feb.

18. Commenting upon the reply of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces to Mr. B. P. Wadia's request for information as to the portions of his speech which were regarded as objectionable, Young India remarks:—"The ways of the Indian bureaucracy have always been strange and are growing stranger: but for strangeness and unfairness this present action of the bureaucrats of the Central Provinces cannot be beaten. Sir Benjamin Robertson does not obviously consider that fair dealing is as much required of him as of any private individual, who tries to take away the character of another man because he does not like him or his ways. In the case of the private individual there is this consolation at least, that you can bring him to book by moving the courts. But in this case there is hardly any chance of doing so, under your Defence Acts, Seditious Meetings Acts and Press Acts. Any bureaucrat can play ducks and drakes with other people's reputations and yet go scot-free!"

England has drawn her sword for the protection of weak nations, but has failed to fulfil her own pledges to India.
Shetkari (38), 11th Feb.

19. Writing about the war, the Shetkari observes that while it is true that England has laid the whole world under a deep debt of unforgettable obligation by drawing her sword for the protection of weak nations, she has failed to act up to her own adage, 'Charity begins at home,' with regard to India and Ireland. It goes on:—Everybody of course wishes that Germany may be made to disgorge the territories she has gulped down. But that does not lie solely in England's hands as it will depend upon the final outcome of the war. The same, however, cannot be said with regard to India, which great statesmen have declared to be held in trust by England, till such time as its people begin to administer it themselves. The Proclamation of 1858 has also given pledges of equality of treatment for all, irrespective of race or creed. But are these pledges being carried out? How long is the day of equality of treatment to be postponed? Home rulers are only asking for the fulfilment of those pledges and not for any favours.

The new passport regulations should not come in the way of the Congress deputation.
Message (6), 15th Feb.

20. Referring to the statement of the Allahabad correspondent of the Times of India that the passport arrangements relating to India are to be more rigid, the Message remarks:—"Are we to understand from this that the Congress deputation will be debarred, among other persons, from leaving India by sea? We hope not. .... If the fears we have expressed have any foundation, it is the duty of United India to so agitate that the Congress deputation will also be included in the exceptions. Again, will Mr. Tilak be allowed to go to England to prosecute the case against Sir Valentine Chirol? If not, the latter will have to thank Government not only for its hospitality and active help but also for this regulation, which though issued in the interest of the Empire and not in the interests of any individual in particular, accidentally stood him in good stead."

Reflections on the separatist movement started in South India by the non-Brahmins against the Brahmins.
Young India (11), 14th Feb.

21. Commenting upon the separatist movement started by the non-Brahmins against the Brahmins in South India, in the course of a contributed article in Young India, "Ayngar" writes:—"What is it that the Brahmins have done all these years to deserve such condemnation? And even if they had been selfish, how does that affect the larger national question of Self-government? Have not there been Brahmins who have worked for all classes, for the whole nation? And if more non-Bramins are not in the services, is it the fault of the Brahmans? Who is responsible for the appointments? Is it the Brahmin or Government? Is it not also the declared policy of Government to 'prefer' non-Brahmins in all departments? If, as the Times of India pointed out some time ago, even this impartial British Government, with its strict neutrality and unconcealed sympathy for the non-Brahmins, cannot appoint a larger number of them, is it the Brahmin's fault?......... And as regards their ill-considered opposition to Home Rule, may we ask them (the non-Brahmins) a question, to whose interest would self-government be when it is achieved? In modern democracies, as in the old, it is numbers that count. And when they are forty millions, who stand to gain by the result? Is not the Brahmin committing political suicide by advocating Home Rule? Yet he would do it........ The Congress so far as Madras is concerned at least is said to be Brahmin-ridden. Is this an honour to the great political workers, who do their work at the risk of much obloquy and suspicions at the hands of Government, or does it speak only of an ignoble spirit? I shall not dwell much on this point beyond directing their attention to the fact that it is the Brahmin that has been always in the forefront of social reform and all other progressive and nationalistic movements that our country has been witnessing in our own times. He has always shown a spirit of compromise, ready to adjust himself to changing moods and times, and ready to co-operate with all. No doubt the condition of the non-Brahmins is not what it should be, considering their number and importance. But the remedy is not hatred of the Brahmin, but improvement of their own condition. Spread of education, opening of more schools, more of help to poor students—this is the only real remedy.......... We would appeal therefore to those that have not been thrown off their balance already irrevocably, not to work for success by means of hatred, not to outdo in selfishness the selfish Brahmins, not to sour public life and private intercourse by lack of social charity, not to be aggressive and abusive."

Alleged unfairness of the Muhammadan demand for separate representation.

Sind Advocate (8), 1st Feb.

22. "We think most Muhammadans themselves will agree that we made the utmost possible concession (for higher national solidarity) in the matter of separate Muhammadan representation on municipalities, when we wrote that a few seats might be allotted, than through special electorates but it is absurd to claim more than that; certainly it is preposterous to claim that whatever the population and whatever the voting strength, they should have as large a share (and even larger) as the Hindus who surpass them in population as well as voting qualifications. We only wonder how a statesman like Lord Willingdon, our present Governor, could raise hopes which even a Sydenham Clarke who was a past master in diplomacy and in the practice of Divide et impera refused most strenuously to encourage. We propose to put before our Mahomedan compatriots some considerations which will show them the unfairness (from the country's as well as communal points of view, whatever it be from the standpoints of Commissioners and Governors hailing from across the seas) of their demands. The principle most in vogue as the basis of representation is taxation. The Muhammadans will not hear of that, but they want to substitute the population basis even in Government service! Well, population basis may be allowed as regards representation on Councils and Local Boards though owing to the backwardness of the Muhammadan community, seats on Councils go literally a-begging for want of suitable and worthy Muhammadans. But even with the population principle they are not satisfied. That principle is all right with them so long as and where they are in the majority as in the population of Sind; but when they are in a minority as in the country at large, or in most municipal areas, they add another principle that of special historic and dynamic importance. The Hindus are simply shut off from taking advantage either of their numerical strength or their larger interests or of their greater actual importance in many respects.......... In this the Muhammadan is taking advantage first of the inclinations and policy of certain Government officials, and of the anxiety of educated Hindus to have a United India. Is this fair and right, we ask?......... Let the Muhammadans consider the beauty of united elections in which Hindus may vote for Muhammadans and Muhammadans for Hindus......... If in some places there is sectarianism on the part even of Hindus it is wearing away under the influence of the growing national sentiment. It shows in any case not only want of fairness but of grace to even dream of asking that in municipal areas where religious questions do not arise and where the Muhammadan population and still more Muhammadan communal interests are smaller, and to ask that in these areas the Muhammadans shall have by election alone as much as if not more than the Hindus."

Comments on the party given by the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau to India's representatives at the Imperial War Conference.

Message (6), 13th Feb.

23. Commenting on the party given by the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau to India's representatives at the Imperial War Conference, the Message writes:—"The Honourable Mr. Lallubhai Samaldas, the worthy Chairman of the Committee, read an address, in which he gave expression to certain stale platitudes regarding the nature and character of the occasion 'which your Excellency so felicitously decided as being historic and one of unique interest.' It is not surprising that Mr. Lallubhai has selected no less a personage than His Excellency Lord Willingdon for his 'friend, philosopher and guide,' in approaching the subject of India's representation at the War Conference. It has come to be regarded among some of our countrymen that it is their proud privilege to echo the opinions of high officials on public questions. Such a course, we may state incidentally, is always attended with happy results—happy not for the country but for those who necessarily loyally tread in the footsteps of high European officials. It is an open secret for some time in the city that the Honourable Mr. Lallubhai Samaldas is in the run for the vacancy to be shortly created by the retirement of the Honourable Mr. M. B. Chaubal, and we sincerely hope his deserving claims will be finally rewarded with his elevation to the Governor's Executive Council. As the Executive Councils are at present constituted, there cannot be a better or more suitable selection than that of our amiable citizen merchant. He has in him the greatest merit of being too philosophically disposed to offer any resistance and of being least inconvenient to his colleagues and to the Government. He is also very obliging and that is only an added qualification for his selection.......... In the report of the function, the names of some prominent members who were not present, have been given, perhaps with a view to give one the impression that the function was the outcome of the whole-hearted support given by the Chamber. It does not appear that Mr. Lallubhai told the guests that he had received some letters protesting againt the party and declining to attend it. May be, he looked upon these letters as the skeleton at the feast and quietly dismissed them from his thoughts for the time being."

Young India (11), 14th Feb.

24. "That the function was an inspired affair, there can be no manner of doubt. It is an irony of fate, though by no means strange in this land of wonders, that a section of the people should attempt to overbear the universal feeling in matters of vital importance, because to do so falls in with their personal interest.......... We are not very much concerned that the Committee should have entertained the Maharaja Sahib and Sir S. P. Sinha. But that they should have included Sir James Meston so prominently was highly censurable. Sir James Meston, both the Chairman and the Committee were aware we dare say, has been openly condemned for his part and lot in the Round Table affair and for his association with Mr. Curtis in an attempt to secure India's submission to the Colonies. The more reprehensible becomes the conduct of those on whom the responsibility primarily rests for having attempted, though unsuccessfully, a diversion from the object of the public meeting that was held the same evening at the Excelsior Theatre to protest against the ill-treatment of Indians by the Colonials."

Comments on the article by a Japanese in the Modern Review on the necessity of military preparedness of India.
Message (6), 13th Feb.

25. A correspondent of the Message, writing to the paper, gives quotations from the article by a Japanese in the Modern Review (vide paragraph 22 of Weekly Report No. 6 of 1917) and remarks :—"This should commend itself to the sanity of our rulers. But one cannot say how far the rulers will countenance our genuine demands and whether they would give us the opportunity of self-preparedness for self-defence. Our rulers have idiosyncracies peculiar to themselves. We have nothing to say but submit to their fiat at times, however meaningless and detrimental to national self-respect it may be. The Japanese friend of India in his concluding remarks makes one fervent appeal to look to the immediate needs of Great Britain herself and to take the people of India into equal confidence for the safety of the British Empire as a whole. The writer then suggests the repeal of the Arms Act, the creation of a Navy and laying open the commissioned ranks for Indians. To quote the writer's words, 'Imperial interests demand that the Indian leaders and the British Indian Government should wake up to the necessity of a thorough-going preparedness for the future, so that the people of India may not have to repent and say, "Ah! it is too late.'" If ever it be too late to carry out this programme by taking the Indians into equal confidence, as it has been done in Canada, Australia and South Africa, then the fate of the Indian people may be as disastrous as of the changing of the yoke, and the fate of the glorious British Empire may be its disintegration. May Heaven forbid it and may we hope that the people and rulers of India will pay heed to this timely warning and do their best to inaugurate an adequate programme of preparedness for the safety of India and the British Empire.' I do not know if any heed will be paid to this warning until a real shock of the nature described in the last few lines of the above quotation is experienced."

The widest possible publicity should be given to the Indian War Loan.
Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 14th Feb.

26. The Jám-e-Jamshed welcomes the proposal for the floating of a war loan in India and expresses hope that the Indian public will give a hearty response by subscribing to it largely and thus giving an additional proof of their loyalty. It asks Government to give the widest possible publicity to the loan and to divide it into two parts; one part bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. and the other at the rate of four per cent., but the latter should have the attraction of a few prizes of high value to make it more popular.

Complaint that Government give out information on important matters in such a way as to damp the enthusiasm of the people.
Gujaráti (13), 11th Feb.

27. Expressing its dissatisfaction at the alleged policy of Government of giving information to the public piecemeal, the Gujaráti remarks:—Why is not information published in such a manner as to fill the people with enthusiasm? When the colonies were invited to take part in the Imperial War Conference, no mention was made of India, and this caused a stir. Then came the story of India being invited with two Indian representatives to act as advisers. Afterwards an official, a Prince and a citizen came to be selected. People then understood that these three persons would act merely as personal advisers to the Secretary of State for India. His Excellency the Viceroy's statement in the Imperial Legislative Council, however, shows that these Indian advisers will not only advise the State Secretary in private but will also openly give out their views on Indian affairs in the War Conference. After the Indians declared that the Secretary of State not being India's representative the people of India will not recognise what he said as their own opinion, it is now stated that the Indian advisers will be allowed to speak in the Conference. Since matters have taken this turn, where would have been the harm if Indians had been allowed to select an exponent of their own views as their representative? Was there any harm in declaring that Sir Satya Prasanna Sinha had not been selected by Government as an official? It is not yet too late to do so.

Government should intervene to save the public from the rapacity of landlords and tradesmen who unduly raise rents and prices.

Sind Observer (10), 7th Feb.

28. The Sind Observer dwells on the house accommodation difficulties in Karáchi, which, it fears, are likely to be accentuated if Government take over buildings for War Hospitals and other war purposes. It remarks:—"While admitting that the needs of the sick and wounded troops and the personnel detailed to attend to them have undoubtedly a prior claim to all and any building in this or any other city in the Empire, we would ask the military authorities to approach the subject with due regard for the needs of the civil population. There are for instance several large and suitable houses at Clifton where people never reside out of necessity. There are also some commodious club-houses, the Napier barracks, and large offices which would suit admirably as hospitals or quarters for medical staff. Another aspect of the house accommodation question is the tendency of landlords to put up rents without any justification. Government possess the power to restrict the prices of foodstuffs, but decline to curb the greed of dealers who seize the opportunity of reaping a golden harvest from the public at a time of stress due to the war, and it is perhaps too much to expect Government to take the landlords in hand on the lines suggested by the Bombay Presidency Trades Association at their last annual meeting. We feel very strongly that if any money is to be obtained from the people it should go to Government, and not into the already well-filled pockets of men who have not, because of the war, spent more on the articles they retail. Houses were built at a time when land, material and labour was cheap, and not at war-rates: why should the owners be permitted to increase the rents during the war? Goods were imported either prior to the war or prior to the present heavy freight charges: why should the public be made to pay enhanced prices for such articles? If the public want the goods and are prepared to pay the prices which merchants demand, the difference in the price should go to Government. This is in accordance with the principles of equity, and with the needs of the Empire in this great war.......... It is for Government to step in and save the public from the avarice of capitalists, and to control the balance between demand and supply. Germany took the matter in hand long ago: why do the authorities in this country hesitate?"

Comments on the taking over by Government of the stocks of rice in Burmah.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 12th Feb.

29. The Bombay Samáchár expresses hope that orders issued by Government announcing their intention of holding the stocks of rice in Burmah at their own disposal will operate as favourably in the interests of the public as did the similar orders issued in respect of wheat. It assures the public that Government order the stocks of particular commodities to be placed at their own disposal to safeguard the public from the high prices that would result from the speculations of selfish merchants and gives the instances of the satisfactory results achieved in the matter of coal and wheat. It asks Government to take special precautions to safeguard public interest in the matter of rice as this grain forms the staple food of a large majority of Indians.

Sind Observer (10), 27th Jan.

30. The Sind Observer publishes a letter, over the signature of 'So Ruc' on the proposed transformation of the sheds in the old Import Yard at Karáchi into a new War Hospital. The correspondent objects to the proposal on the ground that the site is dusty, noisy and devoid of proper ventilation. The writer regards the installation of electric fans to mitigate the heat caused by the absence of sea-breezes, owing to the sheds facing north and south, as being out of the question as the necessary electric power will not be available. He, therefore, suggests that the new Import Yard, the Rustomjee Buildings, the Commissariat Yard, the Parsee Institute, the Zoroastrian Club, the Parsi School, the Wajsier Barracks, Nazareth's Hospital, the building adjoining the Hospital known as Preedy Castle may be utilised for the purpose. If more accommodation is needed, the N. J. High School and Saint Patrick's and Grammar Schools might be taken up. He does not claim that his suggestions cannot be improved upon, but he makes them because the buildings named above can be had easily and without any cost.

If Germany is crushed in this war will that guarantee the future peace of the world?

Gujarâti, (13), 11th Feb.

31. It has now become an undisputed fact that neither the Russians, the French nor the Italians would have been able to grapple with the Germans without the co-operation of Great Britain and if Britain had not entered the lists against Germany, the latter would have become all-powerful in Europe and would have endangered the safety of the British flag. The present tussle is a trial of strength between Britain and Germany, because France, Italy and Russia have already done their best. Russia may do a little more by means of her man power, but it is Britain that has to do everything now. When the whole of Europe was turning itself into a big camp of elaborately armed nations it was only Britain, among all the other European nations, that had fixed her attention exclusively upon trade. She committed a grave blunder in not fully equipping herself with arms. Instead of strengthening the different members, the countries and nationalities composing the Empire, the sole objective of the British people was to enrich England, the centre of the Empire. Britain only thought of the safety of the heart of the Empire but did not develop the strength of the other limbs, and that is the source of her difficulties to-day. Two courses are now open to her. One is to bring the present war to a close in a manner consistent with her prestige and then to make strenuous efforts to develop the whole of the Empire as fully as possible. If such efforts are made, the resources of the Empire are so vast that there will be no necessity for demanding from Germany or any other Power guarantees for the peace of the world. That guarantee of peace which lies in one's own hand and in one's own strength is more precious than any that could be taken from Germany or anybody else. It is, therefore, better to save the present waste of blood and treasure and utilise it in increasing the Empire's strength. The other course that is open to England is to make the fullest effort to crush Germany when she is fixed in a hole as she is at present. But by doing this to hope for a guarantee of permanent peace in future is chimerical. If Germany is crushed, will no other aspirant arise in her place? Will it not be necessary to fight with him also? Many people are in favour of crushing Germany at present as, according to them, such an opportunity will not arise again. They say that the future will take care of itself, and that if we do not crush her now we shall have to devote our attention solely to the preparations necessary for a future war and hence we shall not be able to do anything else. It is, however, an important question whether this object will be realised. Both Powers are put on their trial in this year.

An estimate of Germany's present desperate plight.

Râst Goftâr (28), 11th Feb.

32. Reviewing the present situation of Germany in the war and anticipating her collapse in the near future, the Râst Goftâr writes :—Germany wants to bring her enemies to sore straits by letting loose her fleet of one thousand new submarines. She intends to make Holland share the fate of Belgium. She has collected vast troops on the Swiss frontier to try once more to shake England and France; but it will be for the last time. The Allies are prepared for all this. This murderous Hun has not succeeded in Roumania. He has not been able to save his brother-in-law, the King of Greece, from disgrace by sending him the necessary help. He has not been able to gain ascendancy over France by achieving a victory at Verdun and on the Somme. He has ruined himself in his craze for making an inroad upon England by way of Zeebrugge. He has become a fit object for the curses of his scapegoats, Bulgaria and Turkey, whom he has ruined. He has not been able to secure Egypt for Turkey and Salonika for Bulgaria. He is being beaten on the Western front and he cannot stand Russia's attack in the East. He has no friends except Austria, Turkey and Bulgaria. He has lost the friendship even of America, and is likely very soon to prove a curse to Holland and Switzerland. He has warned them and neutrals like Sweden, Spain and Denmark to beware of his fangs—the submarines—and he wants to place England and France in his own present miserable plight and thus wreak his revenge upon them by stopping goods from going to them from these neutral powers. His doom is however sealed.

The United States are not likely to join the war.
Gujarâti (13), 11th Feb.

33. Speculating upon the possibility of America joining the war, the Gujarâti remarks that the interest of America lies in remaining neutral because it is her neutrality that has rendered possible the present continuous flow of money to her from both the contending parties, and it is this superabundance of money which will give her unprecedented advantages in trade when the war comes to a close. It also observes that if America were to join the war her fleet will not be capable of doing anything more than the British fleet. The paper then proceeds:—Moreover, America does not possess any large army in readiness which can produce any effect upon Germany. Besides, she would take from five to seven months to get ready a big army, to say nothing of the time she would take to transport it to Europe. Her army now consists of one and a half lakh of men of which she can hardly spare more than half for service in Europe at the present juncture. Moreover, the fact that one-fourth of her population consists of Germans should not be lost sight of. Taking everything into consideration, America will not enter the war but will stop short at severing diplomatic relations with Germany.

Comments on the Public Service Commission Report.
Indian Social Reformer (3), 18th Feb.

34. "The Islington Commission divide the Services for which recruitment is at present made in whole or in part in England, into three classes. In the first class they place the Indian Civil Service and the Police Department, 'in both of which the nature of British responsibility for the good governance of India requires the employment in the higher ranks of a preponderating proportion of British officers.' In other words, so long as British rule exists in this country, the Civil Service and the higher ranks of the Police Department must be filled to a preponderating extent by Englishmen. This is a new and revolutionary doctrine which, if it is endorsed by Government, cannot but have the effect of giving a powerful impetus to revolutionary political movements. To tell the Indian subjects of the King-Emperor that they must be content permanently to occupy an insignificant proportion of the higher appointments in the Civil Service and in the Police is not merely to trample on the Queen's Proclamation and Acts of Parliament, but it is also to instigate the more violent spirits among our political reformers to persevere in their campaign of discrediting the constitutional party in Indian politics. We are surprised that the Honourable Mr. Chaubal, in his minute with much of which we are in agreement, expresses his approval of the Commission's classification of the Services.......... The Commissioners who sign the report have, in fact, taken it upon themselves to reverse the policy of British rule in this country.......... The Indian people will be giving away the birthright of unborn generations of India's children, if they do not promptly, emphatically and unanimously protest against this doctrine so entirely subversive of the basic principles of British rule as we have understood them all these years. [Referring to the Commission's recommendations about recruitment for the Civil Service the paper says:—] The Commissioners profess to keep the English door open to Indians, but they have adopted a device which very effectually shuts it on them. This is the lowering of the age limit to 19. No Indian can hope to appear for the London examination, unless he is sent to England at the age of ten or eleven. We have said repeatedly in these columns that the consensus of experience shows that Indian boys sent at that age to England are almost invariably ruined in character.......... If any Indian parent sends his boy to England with the view of competing at the London examination after the change in the age limit, he will do so at the risk of having his son come back, whether he succeeds in the examination or not, a confirmed rake and a drunkard. This is the price which Indians will most certainly have to pay in order to enjoy the benefit of the Commission's open door. Then, as regards the Indian examination, we protest against the nomination of candidates as recommended by the Commission. Every candidate should be admitted, provided he has taken the Honours B. A. or the M. A. degree, and there should be no need for him to hang at any body's doors for a nomination. We agree with Mr. Chaubal's able and emphatic plea that the 25 per cent. should be calculated on the total number of appointments, and not on the higher ones only. If these objectionable features are eliminated, the Commission's rocommendation will prove a valuable stimulus to the development of University education, besides doing justice to the claims of Indians to enter the Civil Service without undertaking a long sea voyage and sojourn in a foreign country which they may not afford."

Young India (11), 14th Feb.

35. In the course of a lengthy contribution in Young India, Mr. L. G. Khare writes :—"The educated Indian wants a fair field and no favour in securing an entry in the higher services of his country. The majority report of the Islington Commission would rather favour selection than competition. Competition, so that the best men can be secured, is the Indian cry, selection is the motto of the British official in India so that the servile only may enter. So we are not to have any simultaneous examinations. Instead of that, we may have King's cadets, carefully selected. The age limit for the examination in London is to be reduced to 19 as the maximum, the the result being that not one Indian youth out of a million can have a chance of appearing at the examination in London.......... Our idea is that the Cadets will generally be the third sons of minor chiefts, persons, who may have received the kind of culture which the bridge-table, the billiard-room, and the polo-ground appear to impart. No doubt they may have also learnt to imbibe, along with whisky, some of those qualities about which the British race is so proud, namely a senseless idiotic devotion to its Aristocracy, and a sense of never knowing when it is beaten. Even now we notice that there is a lesser standard of culture noticeable among the Engligh civilians who come to rule in India, the reason being partly that the men with the best brains refuse to come out; when we shall be adding to them our King's Cadets, we shall not be far wrong in predicting an intellectual debacle in the services."

Young India (11), 14th Feb.

36. In the course of an article on the Public Service Commission's Report, Young India quotes the following sentence from Mr. Chaubal's minute of dissent :—"At present every Indian officer feels that he is not serving himself or his country, but is an individual hired to labour for some body else." The paper then continues :—"This is the progress, so much boasted of in the opening pages of the majority report, which educated Indians have made in being entrusted in a substantial degree with the carrying on of the government of the country! The conclusion is obvious, that no such consummation can be ever reached until India has worked out her own destiny for herself, until she has achieved Home Rule. We do not think that the better mind of Britain has spoken to us in these recommendations. We are inclined to believe it is the mind of those committed to an 'irrational Imperialism,' of those full of morbid egotism for the material achievements of the British race, of those who have allowed their sentiment for domination to revolt against the British instinct for liberty, of those who have forgotten the once famous British capacity of adopting oneself to one's milieu. On no other supposition can we attempt to understand this exhibition of contempt for the educated classes of India. But we do hope that in the re-adjustment, which will take place after the war, it will be the better mind of Britain that will speak for India, not the mind of super-journalists and prejudiced bureaucrats."

The Viramgam Customs scandal proves that statesmanship has become bankrupt in India.

Young India (11), 14th Feb.

37. Mr. C. Tejpal writes to Young India :—" It seems that statesmanship in India has become nearly bankrupt ! Otherwise how can one account for the continuance of the most disgraceful Viramgam Customs duties and annoyances, which have been denounced, times out of number, as a blot on the Indian administration, by journalists of all description, Indian politicians, British officers, trading communities, and by all those who have had the misfortune to pass through the Viramgam ordeal even once? It is a standing shame that because the two Governments cannot come to a satisfactory adjustment, thousands of passengers, including those of the non-Maritime States and British India should be constantly put to an inconceivable amount of inconvenience and annoyance, at the hands of the Khaki regiment of Viramgam.......... We are overwhelmed, in season and out of season, with all sorts of loyalist sermons with regard to our duties to the Empire; but let those preachers first take their lessons in Imperial citizenship at Viramgam, and then they will have the right angle of vision and a true insight into practical Imperial politics! Let their personal liberty be restricted for hours at Viramgam as smugglers, and even when released, let them be made to feel as acquitted coolies!......... They say the rule in India is bureaucratic. Nonsense! There is no bureaucracy worth the name in this country. Bureaucracy presupposes efficiency. Bureaucracy may not be as liberal as democracy, but if bureaucracy is not efficient, then it is nothing or worse than nothing. Is the Viramgam Customs' muddle a sample of bureaucratic efficiency in India? If it is, then our faith in the Indian Civil Service must dwindle down almost to zero. But it seems it is nobody's business to remove the Viramgam scandal and other scandals, though it is everybody's business to preach Civic and Imperial duties. Some people are over-enthusiastic about the War loans. But where is Káthiáwár to find money for the loans, if her commerce is throttled and fettered at 'Imperial' Viramgam? Why not remove the dampers on loyalty when loyalty is so sacred? Káthiáwár and her princes have made enormous sacrifices for the Empire, the Times of India of 17th instant quotes His Highness the Rao Saheb of Cutch as an example to be followed by other princes, and yet the irony is that neither the princes nor their subjects are treated as respectable and free citizens of the Empire at 'Imperial' Viramgam! Is it still too much or too early to ask that this unjust and long standing nuisance should be put a stop to by entirely sweeping away this oppressive Customs line? But, 'during the war you should only sacrifice and not cry for Justice'!"

Alleged harrassment by the police of people joining the Home Rule League.

Kesari (95), 13th Feb.; Message (6), 15th Feb.

38. Just as the Home Rule League's activity is increasing, its enemies too appear to be more and more determined to put it down. Both Lord Hardinge and His Excellency Lord Chelmsford have admitted the justice of the demand for swarájya, but as the high-handed bureaucrats disapprove of it they have been trying to nip the movement in the bud by underhand means. They think that with the help of the Police in the mofussil they will be able, by means of threats, to dissuade the people from joining the League. Though they are unable to harrass people in big cities like Bombay and Nágpur, they are in a position to exercise their authority against poor people in distant villages, and we have been informed of such things having taken place in East Khándesh and at Chiplun. [Referring to the above, the Message remarks :—" Such opposition is by no means unexpected. Owls can no more bear the light than some officials political enlightment."]

A complaint against the Poona Police.

Kesari (95), 13th Feb.

39. During the recent plague epidemic at Poona a theft took place near the house of the head master of a local school, which he assisted the police to trace. But strangely enough the police took it into their heads to harass him in return for the assistance rendered and while his household furniture was being removed in carts from the health camp to his house in the town they searched it near the Lakdipool in broad day light and attached some cash found. On inquiry the head master was found not to have done anything wrong and his money was returned to him. But who is to be held reponsible for the trouble and the ignominy that he had to suffer? It is said that the people do not help the police in the investigation of crime. But how will a person be encouraged to assist if he receives treatment like the above?

An incident in the Madras Legislative Council.
Message (6), 11th Feb.

40. "At a meeting of the Madras Legislative Council on Tuesday last, the Honourable Mr. A. S. Krishna Row moved a resolution, recommending the appointment of a commission to make an enquiry as to the economic condition of the ryots in the Presidency.......... After a great deal of discussion it was found that the resolution would be favoured by more honourable members than was desirable to certain persons. .... The defeat of government over a resolution was a catastrophe which, according to some members, deserved to be avoided at all risks and cost—apparently even at the cost of the reputation for fairness which the Government had. So one honourable gentleman, Mr. Richmond by name, rose in his seat in the Council and suggested that instead of proceeding with the discussion, the Council should take up another subject for consideration. ..... Practically it meant that honourable members of the Council were not to be allowed to have a poll on the Resolution before it. In other words it was denying to them the right of having their opinion recorded. This procedure of muzzling popular opinion was 'novel', as His Excellency admitted.......... The result of the poll on the Honourable Mr. Richmond's proposal was 20 voted for it and 20 against it. His Excellency Lord Pentland voted for the 'novel' proposal and so the original resolution was shelved off and a new one was taken up for discussion.......... In face of a probable defeat, the Germans discovered the asphyxiating gas and latterly submarinism. India apparently is not going to lag behind in such discoveries, though in a different sphere. We have nothing but admiration for the genius of the Honourable Mr. Richmond, supposing that he was not 'inspired' by some one else in discovering the legal asphyxiating gas or, shall we say, the torpedo which would kill resolutions supported by an inconvenient majority.......... And as to Lord Pentland's impartiality in siding with a proposal to muzzle the mouths and bind the hands of the honourable supporters of the Resolution—for they were not allowed to continue to speak, nor to record their vote—as to his impartiality, we say, it was simply sublime and did justice to that irreproachable reputation which His Excellency had acquired by the B. P. Wadia affair!"

Comments on the refusal to admit the victim of a motor car accident in the Gokuldas Tejpal Hospital, Bombay.
Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 13th Feb., Eng. cols.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 12th Feb.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 14th Feb.

41. Commenting upon the remarks recently made by Dr. Nunan, the Coroner, on the inadequacy of ambulance facilities and the paucity of hospital accommodation in Bombay, the Praja Mitra and Pársi writes:—"It is not relevant in this connection to say that the man would not have survived even if he had medical aid. What is relevant is the fact that a public hospital should refuse to attend to such a serious case for want of accommodation. We are not blaming the authorities of the hospital; but we think that the public ought to rouse itself from its apathetic attitude in this respect and agitate for more hospitals and also for a system by which injured men can be at once attended to on the spot by police constables who should be specially trained in First Aid methods and speedily removed to a hospital on special ambulance cars. It is not desirable that bleeding or injured persons should be placed in hackney carriages which are notoriously slow in their movements in addition to being very uncomfortable....... There may be some difficulty in providing more hospitals, but we cannot see any difficulty in organising a smart ambulance service for the speedy removal of injured persons." [The Jám-e-Jamshed considers the inadequacy of ambulance facilities as a disgrace to Bombay and suggests the provision of an emergency ward in every hospital. The Akhbár-e-Islám asks Government to demand an explanation from the physician in charge of the Gokuldas Tejpal Hospital for refusing to admit the patient.]

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.; Rást Goftár (28), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.

*42. "We are astonished that neither the jury nor the Coroner thought fit to call the Doctor who 'saw the man from a distance' and question him on his conduct. Perhaps that worthy was guided more by the dictates of Hospital Rules than of humanity. If an explanation were even now demanded of him the public would be the wiser with the knowledge of Hospital Rules and professional etiquette which have denied a dying man such help as was, under the circumstances, possible and within reach.... .... In addition to drawing the attention of the authorities to the want of emergency wards, the jury very properly held that the want of street ambulances was 'a disgrace to such a city like Bombay,' and to this we would add the want of proper police control and supervision not so much over the chauffeur—though we would by no means suggest a relaxation of these in his case—as over the hack victoria driver.......... It is not uncommon to find him taking an easy round with his prancing palfrey along, across or around a busy junction under the very nose of the police sepoy.......... As it is the duty of the police to see that those who make use of the King's highway do not imperil the lives of their fellow-men we should expect to see the victoria driver more often held up than he is." [The Rást Goftár remarks:—"In the particular case reported, the 'emergency' patient could very well have been promptly ministered to in the most accessible hospital verandah, failing all other accommodation. And this should have been done in spite of the fact that emergency wards do not obtain among our hospitals. But we are informed that the party complained against manifested disgust at the mere sight of the case. Alas! for New India, if conduct such as this were suffered to pass unrebuked."]

Complaint that both instalments of land assessment are being recovered in February in the Islámpur Taluka (Sátára).

Prakásh (102), 14th Feb.

43. An Islámpur (Sátára) correspondent of the Prakásh writes:—Though it has been a long established practice to pay the land assessment in two instalments, viz., in February and in April, it is stated that this year, a proclamation has been made by beat of drum in all the villages in this Taluka calling upon the agriculturists, who have already been reduced to straits owing to the recent excessive rains, to pay in both the instalments before the 10th February, under the penalty of having to pay one-fourth assessment in addition as fine in case of default. The people have been paying their assessment even by two instalments with much difficulty in the past. They would, therefore, like to know if the above orders have been really issued by the higher officers. At least a two months' notice ought to have been given in such cases. I request the Collector to state if the assessment can be paid in two instalments.

Comments on the proposed joint conference of Hindus and Muhammadans of Sind to settle the question of separate representation.

Al-Haq (42), 10th Feb., Eng. cols.

44. "The attitude of a few of our friends, happily very small in number, towards the demand of the Sind Mussalmans for a separate representation on the local bodies is un-understandable particularly after the acceptance of the principle at Lucknow so recently as December last. It is a sign of happy times, however, that better counsels have prevailed in the men of thought of our Hindu friends and they have come to regard this question as the most vital one, the solution of which must immediately be found. In spite of the Mussalmans having approached His Excellency the Governor for a share that from their point of view is both reasonable and legitimate, they would be not only willing but ready to co-operate with the Hindus in any measures that may be taken to arrive at an amicable settlement acceptable to both the sides. Mussalmans have been accused, in season and out of season, of 'running' to Government, but our critics would admit that they have done so as a last resort when their cry has been in the wilderness. Even in the present case, the credit of using the powers of persuasion will go to a Muhammadan for having taken the lead to arrange the domestic affairs if possible by private arbitration. Messrs. Bhurgri, Harchandrai and Ghulam Hosein are shortly to invite the leading men of both the communities to meet in a conference in order to discuss the question and to see what its solution can be. We are confident a conference like the one proposed would be welcomed by all. So far as the Mussalmans are concerned, they would join it with an open heart and let us hope the other side would be equally open to conviction. Lucknow has, however, bitterly taught us that there is always a section in such gatherings bent upon bania dealings and it is the duty of every one who has the good of the province at heart to be cautious of this species of humanity, if the proposed conference is intended to bear fruit. While congratulating Mr. Bhurgri for having originated the proposed conference, we would remind him of his position by reason of his enjoying the confidence of both the communities in a measure which is not in the lot of every one. Let us hope he would strive to bring about an adjustment that would not leave any impression among the Mussalmans that their spokesman wanted peace at any price. His recent attitude has been somewhat misunderstood in some quarters; but that has been so, mainly because of the ignorance of the full facts. Let it be admitted to his credit that he has nerve to say what he feels and the course he has adopted in this case is one calculated to do immense good. We wish the promoters of the Conference all success."

EDUCATION.

Complaint about the permission given to Messrs. Macmilliam and Company to raise the prices of Sindhi School text-books.

Sind Advocate (8), 1st Feb.

45. Commenting upon the permission given to the Messrs. Macmillian and Company to raise the prices of the vernacular school text books, the Sind Advocate remarks:—"The present enhancement is on the whole quite unjustifiable, and it is an additional and needless burden on the purse of the parent who is already hard hit, as a rule, by the war-affected economical situation. Some at least of the books were printed before the paper became so very dear, and they had been printed in many thousands—since the company has the monoply of Sindhi text books—so that to take extra price for them it is not fair at all. Then when the paper went down in price (before the war) would Messrs. Macmillian and Company have heard of a proposal to reduce the prices? In any case the burden should not have fallen on the individuals purchasing the books but on Government which we suppose has been taking a royalty from the publishers. Less royalty would have requited the publishers quite well enough."

MUNICIPALITIES.

Strictures on the Honourable Mr. Orr's attitude with regard to the Samson case.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th Feb., Eng. cols.

46. "The drop curtain has now fallen over the Samson Drama in which the Chairman of the Improvement Trust played his part until the final moment. The Magistrate who tried the defamation case was not right in his verdict for the 'Dalvallas'. The Board were not right in suspending and prosecuting Mr. Samson and the Magistrate was not right in giving him the benefit of the doubt. The Board were not right in calling upon Mr. Samson to resign and then refusing him his salary for the period of suspension. In short from the beginning to the end of this nauseating case which has shaken public confidence in the inner administration of the Trust, the worthy Chairman is in entire disagreement with the majority of his colleagues, with the trying magistrates, and finally with the Trust's counsel. We hope soon to hear that the Board has been asked to accept the Chairman's resignation which, we believe, is the only consistent step Mr. Orr could possibly take."

Reflections on the question of compulsory primary education in Bombay.

Mufid-e-Rozgár (122), 14th Feb.

47. Referring to the discussion in the Bombay Municipal Corporation anent compulsory primary education in Bombay, the Mufid-e-Rozgár approves of the holding of meetings in support of the movement and publishes an account of two such meetings. It asserts that almost all Indians are now in favour of making primary education both free and compulsory. It pays a tribute to the democratic spirit now making its appearance among the Hindus many of whom desire to raise the depressed classes to a plane of equality with themselves, and it maintains, that the Mussalmans, professing as they do the most democratic of all religions, are always ready to assist in the amelioration of the lot of their less fortunate brethren.

48. The Mufid-e-Rozgár draws the attention of the Health Department of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to the insanitary condition of the public hamam khanas kept by Indian barbers in the City. It affirms that these places are abominably dirty and that their proprietors, in spite of the good income they earn, not only do not take the trouble of cleaning them but that they aggravate the matter by habitually offering for use the most filthy towels and utensils. It fears lest these should prove to be foci of infection for some new epidemic.

Complaint about the filthy conditon of public baths in Bombay.
Mufid-e-Rozgár . (122), 14th Feb.

49. A Junnar (Poona) correspondent writing to the Kesari requests the Commissioner, C. D., to postpone by six or at least by three months the triennial elections of the local Municipality which have been fixed by the Collector of Poona to take place on 5th March next, inasmuch as plague being at present prevalent in that town, it will be a matter of extreme difficulty for many of the voters who have gone out to register their votes. [The paper supports the request of the correspondent and recommends that the elections may be postponed till plague disappears from the town.]

Suggestion that the triennial Municipal elections at Junnar (Poona) may be postponed owing to the prevalence of plague there at present.

NATIVE STATES.

50. The Bombay Samáchár expresses great surprise at the orders issued by His Highness the Maharaja Gaikwad of Baroda for the closing of three hundred primary schools and for reducing the annual expenditure on primary education in his State by two lakhs of rupees. The paper is of opinion that the Maharaja should have inquired into the causes of the failure of primary schools imparting instruction compulsorily before ordering them to be closed. It expresses hope that the Maharaja will take steps to ensure the success of the system of compulsory primary education in his State as the eyes of the whole of India are directed towards the experiment with a view to getting the system introduced in British India.

Comments on the closure of three hundred primary schools in the Baroda State.
Bombay Samáchár (55), 14th Feb.

51. "From the administration report of the Khairpur State for the year 1915-16 we gather that the gross revenue of the State, excluding jagirs, increased from Rs. 17,83,490 to Rs. 19,35,598. The expenditure amounted to Rs. 20,51,764 as against Rs. 20,38,251. No details are given for finding out the causes leading to the piling up of expenditure. It is bad for the State that the expenditure should continue to exceed the income. We are not told whether the State is in a solvent condition or in debts. At any rate, the yearly expenditure needs to be greatly curtailed. May we entertain a hope that the next report will present better results. We have written on this matter, for we keenly feel that the only Native State in the province of Sind should financially be on a sound and stable footing."

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the orders of the Punjáb Government prohibiting Messrs. Tilak and Pal from entering the province.

Young India (11), 21st Feb.

1. "It must be a cruel irony of fate which is dogging the steps of British rule in this country that while the people are sincerely anxious to prove their worth by rendering useful service in the cause of the Empire, the bureaucracy must go on provoking popular indignation and resentment by its arbitrary and high-handed acts. The order of the Punjáb Government against Mr. Tilak and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal is as unwarranted as it is irritating. It is impossible to think of any reasonable grounds for a gratuitous insult of this kind which is now flung in the face of the people. The order, if well-founded, completely belies the authoritative declarations that have been made in this country about the unchangeable loyalty of the Indian people and the sanity of the Indian mind. We have learnt on thoroughly reliable authority that Mr. Tilak never intended to visit the Punjáb, nor had he received any invitation from the people of that province. Mr. Pal has openly stated in the press to the same effect. This being so, we wonder why one provincial Government after another should persist in the indiscriminate exercise of arbitrary powers vested in it by law. Such action is thoroughly repugnant to the spirit of the great British nation and is inconsistent with British tradition. Even in the United Kingdom, which is more directly affected by this war, public opinion does not countenance high-handed methods. The Manchester Guardian in the mail week has taken strong exception to the withholding of publicity in dealing with political offences, alleged or real.......... A suspicion has gained ground in the public mind that the bureaucracy is trying by means of these orders and other arbitrary acts to put down constitutional political propaganda in which Mrs. Besant and Mr. Tilak are engaged. The ill-advised prosecution which the local Government launched against Mr. Tilak has been, rightly or wrongly, considered as an attempt to suppress the Home Rule movement.......... This suspicion seems to be further accentuated by the belief that some officials in this country are sedulously trying to create in the minds of the British public an impression that Indians are not loyal and require to be kept in restraint by the exercise of arbitrary powers. The wrong that they do to the Empire thereby is incalculable.......... How far this suspicion is well-founded it is difficult to say. But the fact is plain enough that the bureaucracy is determined to put off, as far as it can, the inevitable day of Home Rule for India. But that day is drawing nearer and nearer, and when the war will have ended, there can be no manner of doubt that a substantial measure of self-government will have to be conceded, whether the bureaucracy wish it or not. If reactionary officialdom aims at putting down the Home Rule propaganda by these undesirable means and unbecoming methods it is obviously attempting the impossible.......... Each new attempt at repression will only give it added strength and hasten the day of its fruition. However that may be, we are constrained to protest—and protest strongly—at the free and as we think unjustifiable use which bureaucratic officials are making of the long string of repressive legislation. At a time like the present when everyone is actuated by a sincere desire to assist the Empire, and when the statesmen are preoccupied by thoughts of war, the bureaucracy is rendering the greatest disservice to the cause for which we all stand and to which we are all so whole-heartedly attached. It seems to forget the larger issues that are at stake and how these methods cannot help their solution. .... At the time when the Punjáb Government was needlessly busying itself with the drafting of an unnecessary order, Mr. Tilak was busy by his inspiring personality and weighty words in rousing the people to the full significance of the occasion. We are therefore tempted to ask, with our contemporary of the Chronicle, whether the loyalty of the Indians to the Empire is 'so poor a thing that it can only be supported by Sir Michael O' Dwyer's method of placing a gag on public oratory?'......... The high-handed methods of the bureaucracy may yet succeed for a while in trampling under foot the cherished rights of the people. But they cannot certainly succeed in diverting them from their legitimate purpose or in making them swerve from the right path. Indians have not yet lost their faith in the great British Democracy.......... However successful the methods of these officials may seemingly be, Nemesis will surely overtake them when the war is brought to a successful end, and the British public will be called upon to mete out adequate justice to the ungenerous methods of the bureaucracy in this country. Pending such time, however, we earnestly call upon our countrymen not to feel discouraged by the Draconian methods, which are becoming painfully more common, and to respond whole-heartedly to the great call in the service of the Motherland and the Empire. Temptation will be strong to resent the galling behaviour of reactionary officials. But we entreat our people to remember that the cause which we have so near to our heart will not be advanced by retaliation."

Mahrátta* (5), 25th Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 24th Feb.

*2. "While the Government of India are trying to strengthen the cause of the British arms by enlisting the sympathy of the Indian public, the Government of the Punjáb are acting in just the reverse direction and are striking blows after blows at the root of public sympathy. The Government of India want to enlist men for the Defence of India Force, but the Government of the Punjáb have tried to estrange them from it by prohibiting two of their popular leaders to cross the boundaries of their sacred province. The question then arises whether Government want the Defence of India Force movement of the public, or their Defence of India Act movement? If they want the former, they cannot have it with a halter of the latter around the neck of the favourite leaders of the public. The Punjab Government might be under the impression that the prohibition orders would serve their cause, but in this they are grievously mistaken. To prohibit the leaders is to prohibit the sympathy of their followers, to distrust them is to distrust the people. We cannot for a moment imagine that Sir Michael O'Dwyer is ignorant of the grand reception which Mr. Tilak was accorded when he travelled to and from Lucknow....... In the Maháráshtra his influence is simply boundless. The young generation follows him wherever he leads them, and such a great asset he has become now that a wise Government would have tried to win him over to their cause instead of offending him and his followers. But the Punjab Government have cast all such wise considerations to the winds, and have quite unnecessarily wounded the feeling of a majority of young India and have thus, we think, weakened the cause they desired to serve. Messrs. Tilak and Pal had not the least idea of entering the Punjáb. But supposing they had, what would they have done? They would have done there what they did elsewhere, and what the other local Governments did not find prejudicial to public safety. So in the Punjab also they would have addressed the public to remain faithful to the British Raj, they would have told them to rally round the British Flag and they would have advised them to win self-government by strictly constitutional means, by petitioning the Parliament and influencing the British public—this is all that they would have done. Now which item of these is prejudicial to public safety? If any of them is, then, not Mr. Tilak alone, but we all, extremists and moderates, Muhammadans and Hindus, plead guilty [The paper makes similar remarks about the exclusion of Mr. Tilak from Delhi. The Dnyán Prakásh also adversely criticises the order of the Chief Commissioner of Delhi.]

Message (6), 20th, 21st and 24th Feb.

3. "Perhaps the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb was too prudent to overlook the possibility of Lokmanya Tilak's visiting his territories, and promulgated the order of prohibition as a precautionary measure. Or, it may be that he did not want to allow his powers under the Defence of India Act to rust when his greater and lesser contemporaries were exercising it and keeping the weapons in their defensive or offensive armoury in good repair......... People will still remember that Lokmanya Tilak visited the territories of the now famous Sir James Meston during the Lucknow Session of the Congress and when that reactionary Anglo-Indian bureaucrat visited the Congress he was seated on one and the same platform as the latter. And yet, neither was the Gomti set on fire nor was the roof of the U. P. Government brought down on the head of Sir James Meston......... When the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb sings to the tune of "Rule, Bureaucratism Rule," we have a shrewd suspicion that it is the influence of bureaucratism which they fear will be prejudiced......... Well may some member of the Imperial Council take up this matter at the next sitting of the Council and elicit from the Law Member a strict definition of 'public safety.' The Honourable Mr. Lowndes has freshly come from the freedom-bearing atmosphere of England, and we hope that his vision has not become coloured by his short stay in the bureaucracy-ridden atmosphere of Simla and Delhi......... The ban placed on Mr. Tilak is as insulting as it has been needless. Are we to infer that this time when he is striving to obtain forty-thousand volunteers for the Indian Volunteer units, whose formation H. E. the Viceroy announced the other day, the Punjáb Government has made him a gift of this order under the Defence of India Act?" [In the next issue the paper refers to the order of exclusian against Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal and remarks :—"Assuming that Messrs. Tilak and Bipin Chandra Pal were such dangerous demagogues as were likely to inflame the minds of the people, will the Lieutenant-Governor have the world to believe that the people of the Punjáb are so hare-brained that they cannot be trusted to listen to a speech or two of theirs and yet possess their mental equilibrium? If so, what becomes of his past and present declarations of the Punjáb's magnificent and deep-seated loyalty, which he has been trotting out time and again? We cannot believe that Sir Michael can be guilty of any infamous conduct like that—professing one thing in public and believing quite the contrary in his heart of hearts. It is perfectly intelligible that the Home Rule propaganda in this country is disagreeable to bureaucrats of his and Sir Benjamin Robertson's type. But, if high officials can associate themselves openly with the Round Table propaganda and the sinister political movement which is assiduously promoted in this country under its auspices and yet be not censured or in any manner called to account, may we not expect that we, who have a permanent stake in the country, can carry on a perfectly legal and constitutional propaganda for our own political emancipation?......... It was only in November last that two eminently independent judges of the Bombay High Court held that the agitation for Home Rule did not constitute any infringement of the law and so long as those who agitated for it kept themselves within the limits of the law, no case lay against them. After this, we had expected that the officials, whatever their bureaucratic tendencies, would avoid a conflict with that agitation. But these expectations have been found to be premature." [In a subsequent issue the paper writes :—"In the absence of any information to the contrary, one is tempted to ask, 'Is the Punjáb—the land that has well maintained its stream of recruits to fill the thinned ranks of the Indian army—in such a terrible state of unrest that as soon as Lokamanya Tilak or Mr. Bepin Pal enters the Province, the "public safety" would be endangered?' If it is really so, Sir Michael O'Dwyer must be sitting on a living volcano, which might be in eruption any time, any day, any moment, and we cannot but sympathise with the valiant Chief of the Punjáb in his misfortune......... Have Government considered for a moment what effect orders of this character will have on the outside world?......... Has anyone of these 'Governments' realised the unfavourable impression which these orders will create on the neighbours of the Indian Government as regards the internal condition of India? Is such impression helpful in ensuring 'the public safety' of this country? Is it orders like these and those who promulgate them that are dangerous to 'public safety,'—not in the narrowest sense of the term—or is it the Tribunes of the people, who are actuated by the highest ideals of citizenship? These are questions which demand an answer. And whether they are answered or not, we feel it our foremost duty to point out to the Government of India that while sitting on the safety-valve will effectually drive under the surface the deep discontent of the people, it will not surely help to reassure the outside world or the unfriendly neighbour, if any, about the condition of India......... If the various local Governments consider, however, the abuse of the power put into their hands by a too trusting legislature as a remedy against the Home Rule propaganda, they cannot commit a greater political blunder than that. The movement is now too strong to be crushed under the weight of repression or coercion. It has come to stay and will stay with us, as our contemporary of Young India has rightly emphasised, in spite of these Governments and their open and covert hostility to it."]

Kesari, (95), 20th Feb.; Sandesh (103), 19th Feb.; Indu Prakásh (36) 19th Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh, (34), 18th and 22nd Feb.

4. Our Government are peculiarly subject to occasional fits of nervousness. In one of these fits they prohibited Mrs. Besant from visiting the Bombay Presidency and the Central Provinces under the Defence of India Act. It was then a foregone conclusion that the next to suffer under this Act would be Mr. Tilak. No one ever suspected, however, that of all the Local Governments, the Government of the Punjáb would deem it necessary to apply the provisions of the Act to Mr. Tilak. He has recently visited several places in the United Provinces, Bengal and the Central Provinces in connection with his Home Rule propaganda, and yet his movements were never restricted by the authorities, as he did not go beyond the limits of constitutional agitation. The order of the Punjáb Government was served on Mr. Tilak on the very day on which in a largely attended meeting he exhorted his audience to lay down their lives in defence of the Empire! Mr. Tilak is charged with the intention of visiting the Punjáb and acting in a manner prejudicial to public safety. But as he had no intention whatever of visiting the Punjáb, how could he act in a manner prejudicial to public safety in a province which he never meant to visit? This is indeed a riddle which defies solution! [The Sandesh remarks that the order of the Punjáb Government is sure to cause widespread discontent. It is, to say the least, most unwise to needlessly offend public opinion at a time when every endeavour should be made to secure the co-operation of the people. The order only shows the bias of the Punjáb Government against Mr. Tilak. The Indu Prakásh says that the order has fallen upon the people like a bolt from the blue. It is undesirable to curtail the liberties of a man like Mr. Tilak until it is proved that his activities are unconstitutional. The Dnyán Prakásh says that the main purpose of the Defence of India Act is to meet the situation created by the war. To restrict the movements of men like Mr. Tilak and Babu Bepinchandra Pal under the Act is to divert it from its original purpose.]

Hindusthán (17), 21st Feb.

5. It is strange that Provincial Governments should deem it wise to take severe steps at a time when the people are making a movement for securing swarájya. Really speaking, this is the time for respecting public opinion and inspiring the public with hope and confidence. A policy of repression is likely to do more harm than good, inasmuch as it will stimulate agitation and increase disaffection and discontent. We wish the Government of the Punjáb had devised some other means of dealing with Messrs. Tilak and Pal. They could have hauled them up before the law courts if their conduct had been found objectionable in the Punjáb without giving rise to public opposition. We do not think that the Government of the Punjáb had any reason to suspect that Messrs. Tilak and Pal were thinking of stirring up a rebellion in the Punjáb. His Excellency the Viceroy would do well to put some check on the unrestricted powers the Provincial Governments possess of exacerbating public feeling with impunity. On the one hand people are asked to make sacrifices for the Government and to help them in the prosecution of the war and on the other they are indirectly told that in spite of their manifestations of loyalty to Government they are regarded with distrust or suspicion. We do not think that the loyalty of the Punjáb is so very unstable as to stand in need of artificial proofs. What have the people of the Punjáb done that they should be denied the pleasure of hearing Messrs. Tilak and Pal? Does not the order imply that Government have less trust in the people of the Punjáb than in the rest of the population of India? There would be nothing strange if the people of the Punjáb took offence at the order. Such measures should not be adopted when Government stand in need of help from the people. Government should take such steps as would convince the people that they are fully trusted and relied upon.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 21st Feb., Eng. cols.

6. "The impression created by such repressive and prohibitive orders, again and again flourished in the eye of the public at a time when the Empire is passing through such a grave crisis, and the Government of India have to appeal to the loyal and active co-operation of Indians as well as all the other parts of the Empire, is certainly not pleasant. Nor are the terms in which these orders are couched, vague and indefinite as they are, free from objection on the score of being offensive. If those who are responsible for issuing the order find themselves unable, or consider it inadvisable, to publish the specific reasons which have prompted the action, why ascribe to the person a vague general intention of acting in a manner prejudical to public safety? If particulars cannot be furnished then general imputations too may be dispensed with. Again, we do not see why it was necessary to give in the order the designation of Mr. Tilak, as 'Chitpavin Brahmin of Poona.' Mr. Tilak is sufficiently well-known as Mr. Tilak, and it is sufficiently well-known, too, that he is personally considered obnoxious by certain Governments or certain officials. We hope it was not intended to convey that he is more obnoxious as being a Chitpavin Brahmin of Poona. It is bad enough to condemn individuals on suspicion. There are people, Sir Valentine Chirol for instance, who do not appear to like Chitpavin Brahmins, especially of Poona. We do not know if Sir Michael O'Dwyer's Government intended to convey a similar dislike of Mr. Tilak and his tribe. To us, however, this obtrusive reference to Mr. Tilak's nationality seems rather calculated to stultify the action taken. Mr. Tilak as a Chitpavin Brahmin of Poona is a force only among his own people. He speaks very effectively in Marathi. But he could not address a Punjabi audience in Marathi, and we suppose he could not have worked his audience to any very violent state of agitation, even if he were minded to be violent in his speech. As usual, the whole affair appears to us to be the result of needlessly exaggerating both the inflammability of the Indian public, and the influence of the national leaders."

What is the difference between the Moderate and the Extremist?

Young India (11), 21st Feb.

7. In the course of an article headed "Shades of political opinion," contributed to Young India, Mr. L. G. Khare discusses the question, "In what way does the Moderate differ from the Extremist?", and remarks:—"We suppose the difference lies not so much in political belief, as in the manner of expressing it. It lies in the varying degrees of ability with which the Indian gets disillusioned as regard the difference between British promise and bureaucratic performance. The Extremist, when burning with indignation at the compulsory introduction of the 'morals of the poultry-yard' in the hapless Indians at Fiji, promptly calls an open-air meeting when thousands attend. The Council of Moderates in Cottonopolis when shamed into holding a similar meeting do so, but with what prudence, what a considerate regard for the finer feelings of their masters! They placard it not as a protest meeting primarily against indentured labour but a congratulatory meeting to welcome the belated wisdom of invoking Indians as volunteers. And then we read in the daily press that Mr. Tilak who is not to go to any place, where he never wants to go, was allowed to speak as the audience demanded it. Allowed to speak! The Council of Moderates, we suppose, permitted it. However, that is enough to show Young India the difference in attitude. Let it observe also how rapid and remarkable is the transition from violent moderatism to gentle extremism, from gentle extremism to Home Rule sanity."

The Government of India's Despatch on Indian Political Reform ought to have been published before being sent to the Secretary of State.

Indian Social Reformer (3), 25th Feb.

*8. Referring to the statement made in the Imperial Legislative Council that Government were unable to give any further information about their Despatch on Indian Political Reform than that it had been sent to the Secretary of State, the Indian Social Reformer remarks:—"The Government of India are in a difficult position no doubt, but the position of the Indian public is still worse. If we are to wait till the Secretary of State sends down final orders on their recommendations, it is evident that we shall have very little chance of having the reforms modified in the direction of our wants and rights. It is well-known that the shape ultimately assumed by the Moraly-Minto reform scheme was, in some essential respects, as much a surprise to the Government of India as to the Indian public. We think that it will be a useful reform to make it obligatory on the Government of India to place all its despatches to the Secretary of State before the Legislative Council, unless the Viceroy, for special reasons, decides that any of them should be regarded as 'secret' and withheld from the Council. The greatest need of the time is more publicity in the conduct of the administration."

Young India (11), 21st Feb.

9. "V. R." writing to Young India remarks :—" With regard to the abolition or modification of the Arms Act, there are no two opinions in the country. There is unanimity of feeling that the Act should be done away with and failing it, it may immediately be so amended as to do away with the individious distinctions which it has imposed on the score of birth, nationality or colour. It is over thirty-six years ago that the late William Ewart Gladstone, who successfully piloted through the House of Commons the Irish Home Rule Bill, condemned the imposition of the Act, both on moral and political grounds. What he said then applies with equal or even greater. force today.......... In spite of the persistent agitation in India itself against the operations of the Act which has converted a nation of heroes into a timid flock of quill-driving sheep, the Act has been worked and maintained, if anything, with greater rigour than was the case in 1885. If the decision of Government to raise volunteer units from among Indians indicates a generous spirit and relaxation of the suspicious and mistrusting policy referred to above, we trust that that spirit will be carried further and the good-will of Government more effectively demonstrated in the relaxing of the rigours of the Act, either by ending or mending it at the earliest possible moment."

England's duty to prepare India to be self-supporting in future.

Gujaráti (13), 18th Feb.; Hindusthán (17), 17th Feb.

10. The war with Germany is not yet over and even after the war England will have to fight a commercial war. At such a time a Japanese writer in the Modern Review has asked Indians to be cautious and alive to their own interests. He is of opinion that the interests of Japan are opposed to those of England and so the Anglo-Japanese Alliance may not be renewed and Japan might one day fight against England. When this war broke out we gave it out as our opinion that the nation with the longest purse and the most abundant supply of men and munitions would win in the long run. That opinion holds good even to-day. England has now fully awakened to her responsibilities. The real issues lie between Germany and England. England has been filled with enthusiasm and as she knows that she has to fight for her very existense she will not sheathe the sword until victory is achieved and in order to achieve this end she has marshalled all her resources and is prepared to make tremendous sacrifices. Loyal India was anxious to help England and its attitude has not undergone any change. It is, however, to be regretted that England has not yet been cured of her suspicion towards India in spite of its loyalty having been proved. Now, however, India has to remain wide awake and to help England. All eyes now turn to India. India has gradually become the centre of Imperial activities for the prosecution of the war. India lacks neither men nor munitions. But the object cannot be achieved without full trust and confidence being placed in the people. The enthusiasm and awakening of the people are largely dependent upon the unity of interests between the rulers and the ruled. India is not to be treated like a child. At the outbreak of the war we dilated upon the ambitions of Russia. England should still continue firm in its old policy of keeping Russia as far away as possible from India. But now that England and Russia are fighting shoulder to shoulder she has acquiesced in the handing over of Constantinople and the Dardanelles to Russia. The Allies will be victorious in the end, but no one seems to say a word to the effect that the agreement arrived at between Russia and England is adverse to the real interests of the Empire. India should, therefore, remain on its guard. In politics friends do not remain constant. [The paper gives a summary of the article appearing in the Modern Review (vide paragraph 22 of Weekly Report No. 6 of 1917) and concludes thus:—] The duty of England does not now as before comprise in navigation and commerce. She should, therefore, keep India so prepared as to enable it to defend itself by land or sea under such circumstances. England should raise a large Indian Army and also organise a strong Indian Navy. [The Hindusthán also gives a summary of the article referred to and says:—The suggestions of the Japanese friend mean that England should take the Indians into confidence and place them on a footing of equality with the citizens of the self-governing Colonies. This can be accomplished only by giving the administration of India into the hands of the Indians. The educated Indians prefer to be under the ægis of the British rather than go under the sway of Japan or Russia and they would, therefore, try to maintain the British supremacy in India. We want to see India come into closer bonds with Britain and, therefore, request England to take steps to make us self-supporting. Under the present circumstances the need of India becoming self-supporting is very strongly felt and India cannot stand on its own legs unless it is taught to defend itself. We are, therefore, extremely anxious to see the suggestions of the 'Japanese Friend' given effect to. Thus only can the future of India be assured.]

Comments on the action proposed to be taken by the Central Provinces Government to prevent students from attending political meetings.

Message (6), 18th Feb.;
Sandesh (103), 18th Feb.

11. Referring to the action proposed to be taken by the Central Provinces Government to prevent students from attending political meetings, the Message says:—"Not long ago, Sir Benjamin enunciated a new loyalty to himself and to his colleagues of the Indian Civil Service, which should actuate the people. Perhaps, he realised it too late that it was impossible to obtain from old men of staid views the kind of loyalty he wants. He seems to have, therefore, directed his attention to the student community on the assumption that if the tree is to be bent, it must be done when it is still a tender plant. In Eastern Bengal, his great predecessor attempted it and we all know with what results. Sir Benjamin is evidently blind to its lessons and is going to try the experiment afresh on the backward soil of the Central Provinces.......... He has desired it to be laid down that in future no school boy should be allowed to attend any public meetings during the term time without previously obtaining the permission of his head master, and that school masters should exercise ward and watch over the boys. So far so good. But what about the teachers who fail to discharge the 'glorious task' which he seeks to allot to them? Will he send them right about? Does Sir Benjamin suppose that the great majority of teachers who have sold their services for a living have sold their souls too for a mess of pottage, to forget their honourable calling and take to the ignoble and ignominous role of 'spying?' There are, it is true, men so bereft of all sense of self-respect that they will stoop to any meanness. But after all their number is not many and they cannot do the whole work. Is the Chief Commissioner going then to let loose on the student community the benevolent watchdogs of the C. I. D.? We are glad that the non-official members were opposed to any measures being adopted, more particularly the school masters being converted into spies. Whether their opposition will ever be heeded, we doubt, especially in the present mood of the Central Provinces Government. We cannot but view the action of Sir Benjamin as panic-stricken. If he persists in continuing as he has begun, we are afraid he will before long reproduce on the sedate soil of the Central Provinces the condition of Eastern Bengal, a thing which should be deprecated on all accounts." [The Sandesh remarks:—At the meeting of officials and non-officials recently held at Nagpur to consider the question, it was stated on behalf of the Local Government that what they wanted was to improve the morality and character of students. Indian parents would indeed welcome the object so avowed, but they do not like that attempts should be made to rob students of their liberty under the pretext of improving their morality. We certainly do not want to take lessons in morality from the Westerners. They may teach us science and history and similar other subjects, but they have nothing new to teach our students in the matter of morality. That discipline in schools is necessary is admitted by all, but that attempts should be made to turn away students from their duties under the pretext of maintenance of discipline deserves condemnation. Why should Government insist that students should not pay attention to current topics? Only the educational authorities and Sir Benjamin apparently know how such restrictions can help in improving the character of students. It is now a universally recognized principle that students should take part in all social service movements, and Mr. Tilak also has recently called upon them to assist in exposing the doings of the recruiters of indentured labour. Under these circumstances, we cannot but characterise the above attempt of the authorities in the Central Provinces as highly improper.]

Comments on the non-Brahmin movement in South India.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 25th Feb., Eng. cols.

*12. Commenting upon the non-Brahmin movement started in the South India, the Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"There is something to be said for the strong attitude taken up by non-Brahmin leaders. When for centuries they have been ruthlessly kept down by the calculated selfishness of Brahmins, how can they be expected to look on with equanimity at the prospect of a Brahmin supremacy in the Government of India, reinforced with all the wealth of Western learning? Admitting our sympathy for the movement, we cannot, however, absolutely admire either the language or the spirit of 'the Non-Brahmin.' The non-Brahmins are certainly entitled to feel the injustice of their situation. Forty millions out of forty-one and a half million of Hindus in the Madras Presidency are non-Brahmins, and yet in politics and public life generally they are swamped by Brahmins, who always vote for and stand for Brahmins. The non-Brahmins are equally entitled to try and better their position. They are justified even in exposing the dangers of Brahmin supremacy. But they commit a fatal blunder in opposing the Congress politics. The helplessness of India even within the boundaries of the British Empire, the infamy of Fiji disclosures, the tyranny of South Africans, the commercial poverty and dependence of India, and the future well-being of India, all point out the necessity of making the Government of India more and more Indian. This is the aim that every Indian ought to have in view, and a non-Brahmin does not cease to be an Indian, simply because he has cause to complaim—and a perfectly just one let us candidly add—against the systematic selfishness of Brahmins. Instead of frittering away their energies in an unhealthy campaign against Congress politics, the non-Brahmins should concentrate all their energies on the all-round advancement of their communities. For they must remember that the rest of India are united in their political aspirations, and if they demand self-government a minority of forty millions cannot be allowed to thwart their political aspirations. In fact, the voice of educated India is bound to prevail sooner or latter, and the non-Brahmins ought to be prepared for that day when their representatives will sit in the same legislative chambers with Brahmins. If at that time they wish their interests to be protected they will have to produce bold and fearless leaders, who can hold their own against the subtleties of Brahmin intellect. This should be their great constructive policy. Anything else will harm India, and what harms India will harm non-Brahmins. The Non-Brahmin movement in South India is bound to play a very important part in the immediate political development of India......... Hence it behoves all thoughtful leaders of Indians to show their sincerity as Indians by sympathising with the aspirations of the non-Brahmins and lending them a helping hand to rise to their full height. This especially applies to all Brahmin leaders. Their sincerity, their historical importance, their claim to the title of Indian patriots have all been vigorously challenged. They must make up their minds as to whether they will be good Indians, or good Brahmins. They can't be both and their choice will declare their worth."

Officials in India should cease to receive with open arms at the peoples' expense those whom the people regard as their enemies.

Sind Advocate (8), 8th Feb.

13. Referring to Sir James Meston's explanation in the United Provinces Legislative Council with regard to his connection with the Round Table, the Sind Advocate writes:—"We will not say any thing about the printing of the letter in the Government Press. It was stated in answer that the work had been paid for. So far so good. But the supplementary question arises whether the payment was made before the exposure or after. And moreover why should such matter have been allowed to be printed in a Government Press at all? And why should Curtis and Company continue to be Government guests, when visiting certain places on their mission? Lately Mr. Curtis was in Government House, Bombay; as soon as he left, Sir Valentine Chirol came in. New India makes a very apt and pithy observation on this exit and entry: the king is dead, Long live the king! Seriously this sort of thing must cease. If high Government officials receive with open arms at the people's expense, men whom the people regard as their enemies, then farewell to mutual confidence and good will between the rulers and the ruled."

Protest against official members of Legislative Councils mechanically voting on the side of Government.

Kesari (95), 20th Feb.; Mahrátta* (5), 25th Feb.; Hindusthán* (28), 28th Feb.

14. Our readers will perhaps remember that His Excellency Lord Willigdon recently decided that members of the Legislative Council can temporarily leave Council meetings for private business or even for pleasure. In commenting on this we had suggested that Government should make it a rule to count the votes of official members as already recorded on their side, and thus save the members the trouble of attending meetings of the Council and effect some saving in travelling allowances to Government. A recent incident in the Imperial Legislative Council justifies the truth of our remarks. During the debate on the Honourable Mr. Sarma's Resolution on Local Option a number of official members were absent from their seats. Mr. Sarma suddenly closed the debate and called for a division. On this the absent members were hurriedly called in and Mr. Sarma's motion was defeated. The Honourable Mr. Basu vainly asked whether members who had not heard the debate had any right to vote. If votes are to be taken in this manner we would suggest that dummies of official members with a mechanical device for raising their hands at the will of the President, should be installed in the Council Chamber and the members themselves saved the trouble of attending in person. [The Mahrátta makes similar remarks. The Hindusthán gives a translation of the article in the Kesari.]

How Indians should treat the Government's call for enlistment.

Kesari (95), 20th Feb.

15. The Viceroy need entertain no misgivings that his call for enlistment will not be responded to by the Indian public. It is only the Indians who have a misgiving as to whether Government would inaugurate a generous and judicious policy or whether even at the present critical time they would still continue to be possessed by the spirit of partiality and would observe invidious distinctions between their black and white subjects. Whatever the attitude of Government, our line of action has been definitely settled and our leaders have advised the people to enter military service unconditionally. What is the real significance of this throwing open of military service to Indians by Government? We shall indulge in a little plain-speaking in interpreting the significance of this step. It simply means that to-day Government cannot do without our aid. To properly understand the significance of the measure we must first of all shake off our intellectual dullness brought on by over-loyalty and free ourselves from the delusion resulting from our excessive love for the Empire. If Government were really actuated by disinterested motives why did they withhold the boon of military service from us for the last hundred years, and why did they disarm us? What have we done that has rendered us worthy of their trust now? If the possession of arms was the cause of the Mutiny of 1857 what guarantee has been taken from the nation that armed and trained men under the new measure will not raise the standard of revolt in the future? In 1857 there was no demand for swarájya as at present. Thus it may perhaps be argued by some that there is a strong motive for rising in rebellion now while there was none formerly. Moreover, there was then no menace of a foreign enemy, but now, as proved in courts of law, German spies have actually found their way into India in spite of all rigid precautions and fomented disaffection and supplied money and arms to young Indian anarchists. What is then the significance of Government's call to Indians for military service now? We repeat that Government have begun to think that it would be difficult for them to pull on without military assistance from Indians. This concession, therefore, is not an act of generosity but of hard necessity. Government have tried their utmost to meet the pressing demand for more men by every other means. They even tried to ascertain how far they could depend upon their ally, Japan, for military assistance. But all these endeavours to secure the services of foreign mercenaries fell short of the requirements. In the face of such circumstances what else could Government do but to turn to Indians for help? Government could not, as in the old days of mythology, put life into clay figures and raise a white army. Had the thing been practicable our benign Government would have for ever saved us from the bother of bearing arms. We have, however, no desire to rake up old matters. We would only ask Government whether they really intend to do justice to us or only to make soldiers of us till they gain their object. Our response to the call for military service will depend on Government's reply to the above question. We are willing to shoulder the rifle provided we can do it with self-respect; otherwise it will prove only a burden to us. In this connection one is reminded of the dhobie's donkey in an unrecorded Æsop's fable which refused to run away when a thief entered its master's house saying that it was the same to it whether it served its own master or the thief as both would use it as a beast of burden and nothing more. If Indians fail to come forward voluntarily to-day Government may resort to compulsion to-morrow. In any case we shall have to be soldiers. But the question is whether we are to be "fighting soldiers" or "weeping soldiers." The answer to this question wholly depends on the policy Government would be pleased to adopt. If the higher military posts are to be always conferred upon Europeans, then what self-respecting Indian would care to serve under them? If Government really want to secure Indian volunteers the mere passing of the proposed measure will not suffice. Along with that measure the grant of all the demands made at the various meetings must be publicly announced, nay, they must at once be put into force. Government have been emasculating us during the past hundred years, but if they now really wish to revive our fighting spirit they can do so within the space of even six months. If even a commercial nation like the English could produce millions of soldiers in a short time, the same can be done in India by means of training. It would be futile to distinguish between fighting and non-fighting races in India if a real national force is to be created. We hope that this distinction will soon disappear and all Indians will prove their fitness to fight in the defence of their motherland.

16. His Excellency Lord Chelmsford loudly declared in the Council that European British subjects in India would have to enlist themselves compulsorily while Indians would get an opportunity of joining the army on a voluntary basis! The Indian army so formed is to be called the Defence of India Force. The Press is welcoming the measure as if a great obligation had been conferred upon India! And as if that were not sufficient, some people demand that only Indians should be appointed as officers in the Indian units!! While others ask us to be contented with what we have got and to thank Government for it. The Indian National Congress has been asking Government to give military training to Indians for the last thirty years but to no purpose and now when compulsion has come into force in England the Government of India has introduced the Defence of India Force Bill after two years and a half of the war! Who should be thanked for this? Who has been kind to us? Is the goddess of war to be thanked or the Germans who roused her from her slumbers? If a period of two years and a half was required to induce Government to place so much confidence in Indians, how long must the war last to enable the Indians to secure all they want?

Shetkari (38), 18th Feb.

17. Out of the total population of about 400 millions of the whole British Empire that of India alone exceeds 300 millions. England never tapped, nay purposely ignored, this vast reserve of strength. The English are perfectly aware that an Indian army trained by Europeans is an efficient fighting machine. The early history of the English in India shows that Indians in the service of foreigners do not hesitate to fight even against their own countrymen. If Indians had been trained to the use of arms before this an immense number of fighting men would have been available for service at a critical time like the present. But a Government which has enacted extremely stringent forest laws even in the most trifling matters could not be expected to err on the side of liberality and to allow us to bear arms in self-defence. Magnanimity is the quality of the Orientals alone, and however much the Western nations may plume themselves upon their liberality they cannot equal the former in that respect. History does not record a single instance of Indians having committed the sin of interfering with the internal administration of the kingdoms conquered by them. The materialistic Western nations, however, do not as a rule deal generously with conquered peoples. They consider it their primary duty to emasculate the subject races and India knows this to her cost. Our rulers have now come to realise that whatever the initial advantages of this policy it does not pay in the end. It was wrong in principle to pass such a measure as the existing Arms Act. It was all the more unnecessary in the case of the peace-loving population of India. The war, however, has opened the eyes of our Government who now see that they must revise their old military policy to meet the changed conditions. The proposed Indian Defence Force Act will remedy to some extent our existing disabilities. But in order to make it a complete success it is necessary to treat Europeans and Indians equally in the matter of pay, status, etc. Otherwise an undesirable impression will be created on the minds of the people that our rulers are unwilling to meet their just demands even at this critical time.

Exhortation to Indians to help Government by subscribing to the War Loan and by enlisting in the Defence of India Force.

Islámic Mail (121), 26th Feb., Urdu edition.

*18. The Islámic Mail begins an article on the subject of loyalty by bestowing high praise on that virtue, and holds up the example of the faithful dog to admiration. It then proceeds to attribute all moral and material progress that India has made in the last century to Englishmen, and emphasises the fact that perfect peace has reigned in the country owing to the strong arm of British Rule. It refers generally to the existence of grievances and defects which it considers to be inseparable from all human institutions, and lays stress on the duty of the subjects to sacrifice everything when the safety of the Crown is in danger. It considers that the war which Great Britain and her Allies are at present waging is a life-and-death-struggle and dwells on the services hitherto rendered by the Indians in support of the Allies' cause. It informs the public of the determination of Great Britain to make a supreme effort in the current year for vanquishing German militarism once for all, and it declares that that can best be accomplished by the Indians offering themselves for military service and by subscribing to the Indian War Loan. The paper believes that the Indians will join the Indian Defence Force with alacrity, and it is convinced that the Muhammadans, who have been promised entry into Paradise if they wield the sword, will enlist in much larger numbers than other communities. It is, however, of opinion that what is more urgently required is not personal military service, for Great Britain has already raised a force of five millions, but that the Indians should buy the 'Government Promissory Notes' which are likely to bear more than 5¼ per cent. interest per annum. Judging from the fact that this Presidency contains a large number of rich mill-owners, merchants, and ruling princes, it believes that Bombay will head the other provinces by subscribing the largest amount towards the Loan. In conclusion the paper contends that the claim of being the brightest jewel in the British Crown and the aspirations after larger political rights demand corresponding sacrifices on the part of the Indians.

Comments on the farewell entertainmet given by the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau to India's representatives at the Imperial War Conference.

Praja Mitra and Pârsi (24), 19th Feb., Eng. cols.

19. "The extremists have not yet left off their favourite method of indulging in destructive criticism which sometimes aims at making Government impossible. The narrow-minded and ruthless criticism of the Indian Chamber for entertaining Sir James Meston, the Maharajah of Bikaner and Sir S. P. Sinha appears to show that they are violent opponents of any rapproachment between the public bodies and public leaders and Government. The public bodies which take a wider and broader view of their functions than of merely claiming attendance to mandates issued from Poona and Madras are to be pillioried and public leaders who guide such bodies are to be tabooed as 'sycophants'. Not only this, but the unworthy motive is attributed to those responsible for the afternoon party to belittle the importance of the Indentured Labour meeting by having a counter attraction elsewhere! Surely criticism has passed beyond a stage when it can be considered legitimate and justifiable. The Indentured Labour question is a sacred question to which every one has given his adherence. There must be not a single member of the Indian Chamber who has not contributed his mite to the agitation propaganda for placing the relations of India and the Colonies on a satisfactory basis. Even at the afternoon party which is so much criticised, the Honourable Mr. Lallubhai emphasised that India would resent being placed under the domination of the Colonies. And yet machiavelian tactics are attributed to these gentlemen who are charged with playing in the hands of Government officials!"

Reflections on the qualifications of the members composing the Imperial War Conference.

Gujarâti (13), 18th Feb.

20. While writing about the Indian representatives at the Imperial War Conference, the Gujarâti remarks:—They say that the first question this Conference will discuss is what steps should be taken to bring the war to a speedy end. But what we would like to know is how many of the people comprising the Conference have made a study of war as a science? The Secretary of State, Mr. Chamberlain, knows nothing, Sir James Meston knows how to handle figures and Sir S. P. Sinha is conversant with law. His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner, no doubt, knows something about war. He might open his purse-strings and raise an army in his State. But has Sir Satya Prassana any following? If Government were to seek the help of persons like Surendranath Bannerjee, Lala Lajpatrai, Mrs. Besant and Tilak, lakhs of people would come forward to enlist themselves in the army and millions in money would be placed at the disposal of Government. Is it not necessary now to take such people into confidence? [The paper elsewhere finds fault with the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau for giving a farewell entertainment to Sir James, Sir Satyandra and His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner on the score that India has no direct representation on the War Conference. The paper alleges that the reception was got up to flatter the official classes.]

Comments on the success of the new British War Loan.

Bombay Samâchâr (55), 23rd Feb.

21. Adverting to the success of the new War Loan in England, the Bombay Samâchâr remarks:—The British nation is so filled with enthusiasm to strengthen the fighting power of Government that the whole of the vast amount subscribed to the loan has been advanced by the masses without any pressure being brought to bear upon them. If detailed information about the success of this loan finds entry into Germany it is difficult to imagine what devises the enemy will have to resort to to pacify the clamour and agitation that will be caused among the German people. However much Germany may be misleading its subjects with imaginary details regarding the approaching economic exhaustion of the Allies, there is no doubt this proof of the inexhaustible wealth of the British nation will be an eye-opener to it. This enthusiasm for the War Loan prevails not only in England or the Colonies, but in India also. The richer and the middle classes are equally anxious to place at the disposal of Government as much money as they can get together. In comparison with England and the Colonies India possesses so little wealth that her contribution to the loan will perhaps be considered small, but in proportion to her wealth she will be considered to have cut a good figure. It is the duty of every loyal citizen to invest any spare money he may have in the forthcoming war loan and thereby to strive to bring the end of the war nearer.

Government should safeguard the interests of those in private employ who are called out for military service.

Sind Observer (10), 10th Feb.

22. Writing about the Registration Ordinance, the Sind Observer remarks:—"We have been asked what is to happen after registration.......... If the State needs the services of all or any of the persons registered, be sure that they will be called out without hesitation. Government servants are certain of their billets, writes a correspondent, how about the others? We presume that Government will deal liberally with their employees, and we have no doubt that patriotic and wealthy merchants will act similarly towards those of their staff who are summoned to serve the country. We have, however, no doubt that certain employers will for one reason or another attempt to shirk their responsibility towards those whom the country calls out. It is the business of Government and of public opinion to promptly and effectually deal with such an attitude. As we said long ago, compulsory service will fall heavily on the poorly paid non-Government servant class of European British subjects, and it is but right that such persons should look to Government for protection. The State needs the men and the State should see that no one shirks his duty be he employee or employer, poor or rich. The commonweal demands the co-operation of all classes, labour as well as capital, and the State must see fair play. We invite Chambers of Commerce to consider this point. The matter of exemptions in England has been a grave scandal and we trust that the Committee handling such questions in India will not follow that bad example."

The evils of gambling on the totalisator at the race-course and appeal to Government to stop it and to His Excellency Lord Willingdon to discountenance racing by refusing to attend race meetings at least for the period of the war.

Young India (11), 21st Feb.

23. Referring to the correspondence appearing in the Times of India in which the British residents of Bombay are taken to task for the life of ease and pleasure they are enjoying at a time when the Empire is engaged in a life-and-death struggle, Mr. Kanji Dwarkadas, writing in Young India, remarks:—"Many of the readers of Young India will remember that, a propos of the determination of Lord Chelsmford and Lord Carmichael not to attend races during the war, it was suggested that His Excellency Lord Willingdon should follow in the wake of Their Excellencies and give a new tone to 'society' in this city. But the suggestion has obviously fallen on deaf ears. And week after week, the races are going apace with all their concommitant evils of waste of money and energy. This could only be put an end to if the head of the Government takes the lead and announces his intention never more to attend a race meeting at least for the period of the war. The suggestion may not be palatable; but all the same, we feel that some such thing will have to be done. Then why not do it at once? That is the question and we hope we shall have His Excellency Lord Willingdon's answer in a practical form......." [The writer then dwells on the immorality of gambling on the totalisator, the vast sums of money that annually change hands, the huge profits the Turf Club is making over it and the financial ruin it entails on a large number of people, and earnestly pleads for the prohibition by law of the use of the totalisator on the race-course. He then proceeds:—"And yet either because those who are competent to take action are cowed down by the fear of interested imposition or are too indifferent to the well-being of the community, the tragedy of life is being ruthlessly enacted before our very eyes year after year. Any well directed effort is sure to serve two purposes at one and the same time, namely, to put an end to this enormous waste that is going on in the name of 'sport' and relieve so much useful money, part of which at least will find useful employment in war service. If the local Government is not prepared to move in the matter, may we at least expect our influential public men to take up the question? Notwithstanding the great opposition which it would provoke in interested quarters, those who wlll make an unfaltering move in the direction will be entitled to the heartfelt gratitude of the community."]

Comments on the debate on the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy's amendment to the Defence of India Act in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Message (6), 24th Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 24th Feb.

24. "In the debate on the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy's ammendment to the Defence of India Act, the Honourable Sir Reginald Craddock on behalf of Government practically said that inasmuch as high officials were entrusted with the administration of the Act, there was no need of any advisory committee to prevent any conscious or unconscious miscarriage of justice. He was right. The sun might to-morrow get black, but the heaven-born bureaucrat cannot even unconsciously commit any mistake. The District Magistrate of Poona who thought Mr. Tilak's speeches to be seditious and such as justified a security being demanded from him and who relied on Justice Strachey's judgment though it was adversely animadverted on by the Full Bench, did not commit a mistake. Did not the High Court commend his judicial temper and knowledge?......... That leads us to another argument. Sir Reginald Craddock said that a part of the information against the interned persons which the officers possessed was secret and that they could not, with propriety, consent to part with it to any Advisory Committee, composed of that hateful class, labelled lawyers or of any other class in India. In the light of this declaration, we must assume that some 'secret' information against Mrs. Besant, Mr. Tilak and Mr. Pal is in the possession of officials and that it is this 'secret' information which justifies the bars placed on the leaders' movements. Before God we can honestly say that the officials may have got some 'secret' information against the individuals named but no dictionary available in our office says that 'secret' means 'true'." [The Dnyán Prakásh writes:— The attitude of defiance taken up by Government in connection with the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy's amendment to the Defence of India Act is sure to increase public discontent. People wish that, instead of unnecessarily offending, Government should conciliate public opinion at a time when all the resources of the empire are being mobilised for the successful prosecution of the war, but instead of doing so the Defence of India Act is being enforced with unnecessary severity and hundreds of persons are being interned without trial. Mr. Dadabhoy did not demand the repeal of the Act, but only wished that it should be enforced not simply at the discretion of executive officers but with the help of advisory committees containing men with judicial training. Why should Government be afraid of taking the help of persons with judicial training? Let Government give up their present attitude of mistrust and the public will then support them in their measures.]

Comments on the statement made by Government in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding solitary confinement of political prisoners.

Mahrátta (5), 25th Feb.; Kesari (95), 27th Feb.

25. "The Honourable Mr. Basu has done a very good service to the rotting political prisoners in Bengal by asking the Supreme Government about their continuous solitary confinement. The answer given by Sir Reginald Craddock shows that he, while denying that they were placed in solitary confinement, euphemistically admitted it by saying they they 'were for the most part continuously detained in cells,' and 'were not allowed to mix with other prisoners.' Pray wherein then differs the solitary confinement but in name only? He says they are allowed books, letters and occasional interviews. But these palliatives are allowed to other prisioners also. They are not confined in solitary cells continuously for more than fourteen days at a time, with intervals between the periods of solitary confinement of not less duration than this, and when the solitary imprisonment exceeds three months, it does not exceed seven days in any one month. But the political or state prisoners are, as Sir Reginald Craddock says, for the most part, continuously detained in cells for any length of time! .... The poor unfortunate political prisoners are required to rot in cells for over six months and we believe that this continuous isolation, no matter whether it is called 'solitary' or separate confinement, is directly against the spirit, if not the letter, of the law and is a violation of the principles of good health, and yet we are told by Sir Reginald Craddock that Government do not propose to make any changes in the present arrangement no matter even if insanity steals upon the poor prisoners!" [The Kesari makes similar remarks.]

Government and the right to ask supplementary questions in the Imperial Legislative Council.
Mahratta (5), 25th Feb.

26. Referring to the reply given by Government in the Imperial Legislative Council that they do not consider it desirable to allow the right of asking supplementary questions to be exercised by any member other than the one who asks the original question, the Mahratta remarks:—"When even such a petty right is not conceded by Government, we can very well imagine what fate awaits our scheme on which so much labour and energy were expended by our leaders. The extension of this right would not have involved much trouble to Government, nor would it have needlessly embarrassed the member in charge of the department, as according to rule XIII of Section IV of the Council Regulations, 'the member in charge may decline to answer a supplementary question without notice.'......... But by negativing the request of the Honourable Mr. Chanda they have shown that they are not willing to give even a petty concession demanded by the Congress and the Muslim League. When such petty concessions are refused we can picture to our mind's eye what must be the nature of the reforms adumbrated by Lord Chelmsford in his opening speech in the Council. Disappointment has thus already begun and we know not where it will end."

Government is putting off the question of abolishing indentured labour.
Kesari (95), 20th Feb.

27. In spite of the unanimous demand of the whole country the Government of India are putting off the question of abolishing the system of indentured labour, while the Colonies themselves are deliberating as to how to get the present system continued under a new name. We do not, therefore, expect a solution of this problem in the near future. In 1834 England abolished slavery without any regard for the convenience of the Colonies. Why are they hesitating then to eradicate this evil now? The people of England themselves hate this system, as will be seen from their attitude towards the proposal of importing black labour from South Africa. Their main contention is that the nation which countenances slavery cannot itself remain free. It is really strange that people who are averse to slavery in their own country do not hesitate to treat their own fellow-subjects worse than slaves when they migrate to the Colonies. Is it not inconsistent that Englishmen should object to slavery in their own country whereas their kinsmen in Fiji should strive for its continuance?

Comments on a recent Government Press Note on Excise Advisory Committees.
Message (6), 22nd Feb.

28. "Many readers probably know that Government have overwhelmed the people in many districts of this presidency with their generosity in giving them the right to tender their advice in the matter of deciding the number or locality of liquor shops in the district. We refer to the Excise Advisory Committees in which Government servants form the majority. The non-officials in the committees should feel honoured in being allowed to tender advice which the other members may or may not take. Again, they are expected to flatter themselves that they have not been allowed even to inspect shops! .... It was a matter for complaint with the districts of East Khándesh, Ratnágiri, Kanára and Kaira that they were not given the privilege of having these Advisory Committees with the vast powers noted above......... Government, says a Press Note, have decided to appoint committees for all the talukas of the East Khándesh District. The rest must for the present go without them. The reasons justifying the state of things is noteworthy. In some areas like Cánara or some talukas of Broach, West Khándesh and Kolába, the advice of the representatives of the people is not necessary because the consumption is small. If the people want to have a share in determining the number and locality of liquor shops in their taluka or district, they should wait until the consumption of liquor increases! Their advice is not necessary as regards the prevention of the spread of liquor consumption—it should apparently come in when the evil is aggravated! But no. When the evil is aggravated, as in the case of the district of Kaira, the representatives of the people should not be consulted (we are told in the press note) on the ground that facilities for obtaining licit liquor in Kaira are very inadequate and any reduction in the number of shops is only likely to give an impetus to the illicit distillation which is so rife in the district. Ye Russian, French and British statesmen who have curtailed the facilities for drinking, fall at the feet of the excise authorities here and learn that it was your duty to provide 'adequate facilities' to drinkers. 'Adequate facilities' for education to the children of the soil may perhaps not be provided for pecuniary reasons, but 'adequate facilities' for drinking—well, pecuniary reasons cannot stand in their way and they must be provided for......... It seems to be thought that if people are going to get drunk let them get drunk with liquor supplied by Government. The hall-mark of 'legitimacy' justifies everything even vice.... Seriously, is it not after all better that some little illicit traffic be allowed, if it tend to reduction of liquor consumption on the whole, rather than insist on everything being licit, even though the vice may perhaps tend to be thus aggravated? Temptations towards illicit traffic were not absent in France or Russia or in England when these countries decided to largely curtail the drink vice. But they bravely faced the risks, on the ground that on the whole their restrictions will tend to diminish consumption of liquor, though they may give rise to a little more illicit traffic. Why not apply this line of reasoning here?"

Comments on the Bombay Presidency Abkari Administration Report for the year 1915-16.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 23rd Feb.

29. Commenting on the Abkari Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1915-16 the Bombay Samáchár notes with regret the fact that the new system of selling liquor shops by auction has been responsible for a large increase in the Abkari revenue of the Presidency. It remarks that wherever the purchaser of a shop at an auction sale has to pay a larger price than before, there must, in consequence thereof either be an increase in the quantity of liquor sold or the purchaser must mix liquor of an inferior quality with that of a higher one in order to secure for himself a margin of profit. If the latter is the case and there is a larger demand for liquor of this inferior kind, it would not be wrong to apprehend danger to public health. The paper, therefore, appeals to the authorities to consider the matter and bring about the necessary changes in the present system. In order to lessen the consumption of liquor and thereby make the people more industrious and moral, the paper wishes that Government should receive with greater sympathy suggestions emanating from the people for bringing about the desired result. It prays that wherever it is not possible to close a shop in deference to the popular wish, a general rule should be laid down not to allow any new shop to be opened in the locality in question without consulting public opinion. It also wishes that in consultation with Temperance Societies efforts may be made to open shops for the sale of harmless drinks. Such a step, it adds, will wean the people from vice and lead them on to the path of industry and moral health, with the result that the individuals themselves and the country at large would be benefitted thereby.

Comments on a recent incident in the Bombay Small Causes Court.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 23rd and 22nd Feb., Eng. cols.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 20th Feb.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (21), 25th Feb.

30. The Praja Mitra and Pársi dwells at great length on the incident in the Bombay Small Causes Court, wherein the Chief Judge, Mr. Chitre, in the course of the proceedings in a certain case, is alleged to have addressed to Mr. Billimoria, a brother Judge on the Full Bench, the remark, "It is not our business to advocate the cause of one party." The paper points out that Mr. Billimoria's behaviour on the occasion in question was quite in keeping with that of Judges of the Bombay High Court on similar occasions. The paper then continues:—"It is thus obvious that what Mr. Billimoria did was perfectly legitimate, and not inconsistent with judicial practice and tradition. But even assuming he was advocating the cause of one party—and some judges have at times produced that impression even here in Bombay—it was entirely unpermissible to the other Judge, be he the Chief of Chiefs, to administer a rebuke to his colleague. All judges are alike, and hold equal position while on the Bench. .... The Chief Judge has merely certain special powers vested in him for regulating the business of his court. Mr. Chitre thus entirely misconceived his position and functions in thus presuming to lecture to his colleague........... What Mr. Billimoria said to the Bar after the Chief Judge's gratuitous and offensive remark, also appears to us to be unexceptionable: "I have asked him (the Chief Judge) to say something which would remove that impression." Here there is no demand even for a withdrawal of the offending words. We are glad Mr. Billimoria kept his temper, whoever else did not. He is entitled to an apology, if the facts are as published; and we trust Mr. Chitre, seeing that he was hastily led into a false position, will seize an early opportunity of doing so." [In its vernacular columns in the previous issue the paper attributes the incident to want of experience on the part of Mr. Chitre and remarks that the public have always considered it a dangerous practice to pitchfork a fresh advocate on the post of Chief Judge and that such incidents will not tend in any way to lessen their anxiety in the matter. It adds that the incident is in no way desirable from the point of view of the prestige of the Court and trusts that Government as well as the High Court will take immediate steps to pacify the public mind. The Sánj Vartamán regrets the incident and observes that the remarks passed by the Chief Judge are insulting to a judge of Mr. Billimoria's experience and worth. It is extremely regrettable, it adds, that from the experience Mr. Chitre has already had as Chief Judge he has not yet learnt to behave with courtesy and propriety with his brother judges. In the opinion of the paper the only honourable course open to Mr. Chitre under the circumstances is to withdraw at the first opportunity the unjust remarks passed by him against his brother judge and thus do him justice. The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"It was but natural that Mr. Billimoria, to whose standing as a lawyer and reputation as a judge it will take Mr. Chitre long and hard to approach, should have resented this uncalled for stricture and refused to sit side by side in the administration of justice with a colleague who posing as a senior by an irony of fate takes upon himself to doubt publicly his colleague's impartiality and refuses to offer even an explanation of the same. We hope the High Court will look into this grave abuse of responsibility by the Acting Chief Judge."]

The Vernacular Final Examination should not be made compulsory for the Kulkarnis.

Rajahansa (79), 17th Feb.

31. One R. B. Kulkarni writing to the Rajahansa says that the Government order requiring kulkarnis to pass the Vernacular Final Examination in addition to the Kulkarni Test is purposely directed against the kulkarnis as a class and the vatandar kulkarnis in particular. He complains that the subjects prescribed for the Vernacular Final Examination do not at all help a kulkarni in his work, the Kulkarni Examination being quite sufficient for the purpose. Are kulkarnis who have secured prizes and certificates for their work, he asks, to be held unfit because they have not passed the Vernacular Examination? He suggests that meetings should be held to protest against the order, and requests the Honourable Mr. Belvi to interpellate Government in this connection at the next Session of the Legislative Council.

Necessity of opening the port of Purnagad (Ratnágiri) for steamers.

Kesari (95), 20th Feb.

32. In December last the Honourable Mr. Paranjpye asked a question in the Legislative Council on the desirability of opening the port of Purnagad (Ratnágiri) for steamers. Government informed him that they had no information on the subject and would call for a report. We have now received a copy of a memorial submitted to Government by one Mr. Phadke in favour of the proposal. In our opinion he has adduced convincing arguments in support of his prayer. He points out that the harbour would serve an area containing a population of 44,000 inhabitants. The Bombay Steam Navigation Company is also guaranteed a minimum of 50 passengers a day. We fail to see, therefore, its objection to open this harbour. As the contract for carrying the Konkan mails is given to the Company, Government can surely bring a certain amount of pressure to bear on it and make it comply with the reasonable demands of the people. We earnestly invite the attention of Government to this matter and pray that they will consider the whole question sympathetically.

Appeal to the Bombay Government to put a stop to the excessive favour alleged to be shown by the present Commissioner in Sind to Muhammadans in the matter of Government service.

Sind Advocate (8), 8th Feb.

33. "That Officials have for some years past been favouring Muhammadans at the expense of Hindus in the matter of Government employment is well known and we have all got accustomed to put up with a certain amount of injustice and inequity. But Mr. Lawrence, the present Commissioner, is going far beyond the limits thought necessary by previous patrons of the Muslim Community. He is making the situation harder than before. The matter should be brought before the Bombay Legislative Council with facts and figures compiled from the most recent history of appointments to the Mukhtiarkar's grades. We are sure the Bombay Government will put a stop to this. It would be nice if Mr. Bhurgri takes up the matter on the ground, apart from other things, that this sort of thing creates bad blood between the two communities. Failing Mr. Bhurgri, we must look to Mr. Harchandrai for the needful being done."

Comments on the Defence of India Force Bill.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 22nd Feb., Eng. cols.

34. "The services of India to the Empire have been acknowledged on all sides excepting by a few insignificant few. The question is not, however, what we have done but as to whether we are doing all the utmost that we can for the Empire. Plainly we are not. The whole-man power of the country is still, excepting the standing army, lying unutilized.......... Our import and export lists have also not been so closely scanned and scrutinised as they have been by the Board of Trade, for instance in England. Are there not still many imports for which there should be no room in the country when the Empire should be engaged in one and one business only—the business of prosecuting the war? The import of motor cars has only been recently prohibited but there are several luxuries and fineries which we can well do without and would be perhaps much better off without them. The Government of India has, it is pleasant to note, begun to move.......... [The paper here refers to the Defence of India Bill Force and continues :—] In order that this supreme privilege may not be fruitless and that the manhood of India may well respond to the appeal of the Empire in this its hour of the greatest need, the terms for this Force must be liberal enough and be on a level with the terms which are offered to European volunteers. There is one special reason for such a liberal outlook which is apt to be overlooked. It is that conditions in India and England differ in one important respect which is that women in England can go to work and thus earn their living, while Indian women are unable to do so, and so, in case of the death of the earning members of families, will be left to starve. Graduates and people in good positions of life will, most of them at least, be eager to swell the ranks of the Indian Defence Force but they must be assured a decent maintenance for those they leave behind during the separation period and after their death if it happens. We bring this to the notice of the authorities with a view to make the success of the recruiting of the Indian Defence Force as complete as possible. Government and their advisers must remember that this is the most epochal moment in the life of the Empire and that no half measures will do. They must act and act quickly and liberally. Let not the concessions be half-hearted and grudging."

Mahrátta (5), 25th Feb.

35. Referring to the Defence of India Force Bill the Mahrátta remarks that it is "not the out-come of the liberality of the views of Government, but of the critical circumstances produced by the war" and goes on:—"Everything is left to rules and regulations to be framed either by the Governor-General in Council or by the Commander-in-Chief. The people are to have no voice in this, and one of the significant sentence of the Viceroy shows that the Indian demand of equality has no chance of being satisfied. The Viceroy said: 'As the British element under this Act is to be dealt with on the same lines as those of the British regulars, so the Indian element will come under the same military conditions which apply to the Indian regular forces saving the fact that in both cases that service is to be within India.' This shows that the differential treatment is to be continued and equality rests only in admission in the force. We do not know whether such a cold measure can impress the educated youths whom the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief wish to rally. The latter has said, however, that 'if the educated men showed themselves fit for the position they were aspiring for, the fulfilment of their aspirations would be most favourably considered when the time came.' We do not know how much we may depend upon this promise. Leaving apart the case of the educated men, can the Commander-in-Chief point out some Indians, who have won V. C.'s, Orders of Merit and other distinctions and have been promoted to the commissioned ranks? We have no means of knowing when the time is to come for that, if not now. And if the time has not come yet we are not sure whether it will come in the near future. This past record is not very encouraging and, therefore, the promise, unless it is fulfilled immediately or unless some provision for it is made in the statute itself, can hardly inspire any confidence in the minds of the educated men. If we scan the speech of Sir Charles Munro we see that much of the burden is to fall on Indian shoulders, as they are to be employed only in active companies.... But though the Bill does not correspond to our expectations, are we to fall back from the plain path of duty? The opportunity has been granted to us by Government for undergoing a military training and fight for our Home and their Empire. If we lose it, we shall be the worse for it. We will be judged by our leaders as a generation unfit for Home Rule and we shall be forsaken by our most popular leaders like Mr. Tilak and others. Are we to take this risk? Bengal has chalked out its path by raising double companies; Madras, says the rumour, has enrolled 500 volunteers; the Punjáb is raising double companies of University students, and in view of all this, we hope, Bombay will not lag behind."

Message (6), 23rd Feb.

36. "From the bare outline which Sir Charles Monro was able to give in his speech it appears to us that the advance which is now proposed will not be so great as has been anticipated. It will be remembered that Lord Chelmsford's announcement that Indians would be permitted to enrol in their own units aroused the greatest satisfaction because it indicated to the public mind a great departure from the policy of distrust which characterized the Indian military administration in the past. But the departure falls far short of expectations, and unless in the Select Committee stage the provisions of the Bill are largely modified, it will simply be another case of hopes being broken to the heart that were held out to the ear. In the circumstances it will be difficult to speak with any degree of certainty as to the response. That response can only be adequate, when people feel in their heart of hearts that the conditions which will be imposed do not imply any manner of distrust or irritating distinctions between class and class. There will no doubt be some difficulty in officering the Indian Units by Indians to begin with. But does it appear from the reported speech of His Excellency the Commander-in-chief that intelligent and educated Indians will be allowed to qualify themselves for those positions? The existing Military Colleges are to continue to be shut in their faces and no new colleges are to be opened for their training. Sir Charles Monro said in the course of his reply to the debate that if they (the Indians) showed themselves fit for, the 'position they were aspiring for the fulfilment of their aspirations would be favourably considered when the time came.' But when is that time to come and how are Indians to show their fitness for the position they are aspiring for, unless and until they are given the opportunity for training?......... Sir Charles Monro said that there is no intention of discriminating between the Indian and European members of the service. We should have heartily welcomed this declaration, but unfortunately the whole tendency of the Bill seems to be to perpetuate and aggravate the distinction between Europeans and Indians, except so far as it concerns the detailing out of the units for active service.......... The European units will receive pay and allowances and other privileges similar to those of the regular British army serving in this country and the Indian units will be entitled to those privileges which the Indian regular units are allowed under the Indian Army Regulations. We wish we would have given our whole-hearted approval to the measure. It seems an irony of fate that even a tardy measure of this nature should be accompanied by a grudging practice."

Indian Social Reformer (3), 25th Feb.

37. "British units are to include men between the age of 16 and 50, divided into cadets, active and reserve companies; whereas the Indian units are to consist of active companies composed of men between the ages of 18 and 41 only. In view of this fact, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's remark that there is no intention of discriminating between the two classes, is rather unintelligible. Indian boys grow more rapidly than British boys, and, if anything, there is the greater reason for catching the former at an early age. We think that the non-provision of cadet corps in the case of Indians will be widely felt to be a vital defect of the scheme, and it is likely to be felt as a needless accentuation of race distinction in the composition of the Force. We trust that this point will receive attention in the Select Committee. We perfectly understand that the first and sole consideration in the organisation of the new Force is military efficiency, but we do not see that it is necessary on that account to adopt a device which is calculated to deprive the Indian Community of other incidental advantages that may be expected to accrue from a diffusion of military training. The institution of cadet corps will enable schools to start their own Companies and will thus be a valuable means of promoting a spirit of comradeship among young men in the most impressionable period of their lives."

Sandesh (103), 23rd Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 23rd Feb.

38. The Indian Defence Force Bill has been introduced and referred to a Select Committee. Those amongst us who have had to satisfy their military instincts up to this time simply by donning a khaki 'hunting coat' will certainly feel gratified at the measure and it is expected that a sufficient number of men will get themselves enrolled under the new law. We agree with the Honourable Mr. Haque that no one would have objected if the principle of compulsion had been applied to Indians also, inasmuch as they are as anxious for the safety of the British Empire as the English. We, however, feel that the speech made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief at the introduction of the Bill does not meet the aspirations of Indians, for though he has stated that no distinction would be made between Indians and Europeans, he has given no assurance that Indians would be given higher military posts. We admit that there are no persons among us at present who can be granted commissions, but that is the result of our being prohibited the use of arms. But we are confident that our people will show themselves fit for the grant of commissions after they enter the army, and Government ought to have given us the necessary assurances in view of that fact. But nothing of the kind was done and we were only told point blank that Government wanted our educated men to enlist, the question of their aspirations being considered "when the time comes." Government apparently do not know this is the best time for making the announcement. The people are, however, as anxious as Government to see the war ended at once, and therefore we feel confident that they will take full advantage of the concession now granted and prove their fitness for miltary service. The door to the higher posts will then doubtless be thrown open to them. Mr. Tilak has already made the appeal and we hope it will be enthusiastically responded to by all Home Rulers. [The Dnyán Prakásh writes:— His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's speech satisfactorily removes many of the doubts that had been raised as to the very constitution of this new Force. It is now evident from His Excellency's speech that this Force is to be built upon the basis of the existing Volunteer Force, which is to be improved and expanded into the Defence of India Force, to serve as an auxiliary to the Regular Army. Indians are to be included in this Force, and thus this measure grants the prayer which the country has been making for so many years through the National Congress. It will help to revive military ardour among those classes from which it has recently disappeared and will enable them to fight in defence of their country. The Commander-in-Chief did, it is true, remark that no difference will be made in the treatment of the European and Indian branches of this Force, but whether they are to be treated on a footing of perfect equality will be known after the rules under the Act are promulgated. We feel confident that if such equality is assured, numerous young Indians will come forward to enrol themselves and the necessary number of Indian battalions will be easily raised.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 24th Feb.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 22nd Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 22nd Feb.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 23rd Feb.; Hindusthán (17), 23rd Feb.

39. The Bombay Samáchár welcomes the Defence of India Force Bill as an epoch-making measure in the history of India and expresses its full confidence that when it comes into force thousands of Indians will gladly come forward to enlist themselves as Volunteers. It, however, suggests that in order to popularise volunteering among Indians Government should give careful consideration to the suggestions made by the Indian members of the Imperial Legislative Council and give the Indians equal treatment by opening Commissions to them and enrolling them in the Officers' Training Corps. It expresses hope that the Select Committee will not fail so to amend the Bill as to make it fully acceptable to the Indian people. [The Sánj Vartamán also welcomes the Bill and asks Government to give full opportunities to Indians to qualify themselves for Commissions in the proposed Defence of India Force. The Jám-e-Jamshed writes in a similar strain and expresses hope that when the Bill is passed into law it will embody all the suggestions advanced by the Indian members of the Council. The Shri Venkateshwar welcomes the measure and exhorts the Indians to enlist themselves in the Force with a view to serving the country and the King-Emperor. The Hindusthán considers the reply given by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to the effect that Indians would be given Commissions on their proving themselves competent for them as rather vague and indefinite. It asks Government to give full opportunities to Indians for training and qualifying themselves for Commissions. It expresses the hope that Indians will readily come forward to enlist themselves in the Force to defend their motherland.]

*40. "To the Viceroy, who in bold contrast to his predecessors' policy of distrust has given India the boon which it prayed for so long, is rightly due the country's lasting gratitude and good-will. Whether the boon given will be a permanent conferment or a temporary concession will rest entirely with Indians themselves. We do not believe that the concession will be bodily withdrawn after the war, if the response to the call is truly enthusiastic.......... We are in the fullest sympathy with the [Bombay] meeting's claims in respect of equal terms as regards pay and status. India's response to the call should in any case know no faltering. Once that the Territorial Force is established we shall feel that it has come to stay; and as to the other demands, their realisation will follow as a matter of course, if only the country tenders overwhelming proofs of the utility to the Empire of India's neglected but tremendous man-power." [Elsewhere the paper writes:—"The best form of service which the sons of the soil can dedicate to their mother-land is personal service for her defence. The call is here and prompt and we hope that India's youths will respond to it in the truest spirit of manly patriotism." The Gujaráti writes:—"Whatever the shortcomings of the measure we hope there will be a liberal response to the appeal made by the authorities to meet the exigencies of the present situation.......... The terms and conditions of military service are still unknown. In military matters the Indian people are so profoundly ignorant that it will be some time before the rules and [illegible] framed under the Indian Defence Force Act become widely known and their full significance widely appreciated. The disappearance of military [illegible], the decay of the martial spirit of the people, the general neglect on the part of people to cultivate national physique and the lack of definite knowledge as regards the future prospects of those who enrol themselves for military service—all these will prove no mean drawbacks and impediments. We gratefully welcome the departure that has been taken from the suicidal policy that has hitherto been followed, though we cannot as yet make up our mind to speak about it in a spirit of exhultation for the reasons we have already given. The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"'The greatest step since the British came into India' has at last been taken. The Commander-in-Chief has introduced the Indian Defence Bill in the Imperial Council.......... To regret the delay in introducing this measure and to repeat that Government committed a blunder in not utilizing the psychological moment is to cry over spilt milk. What remains to be done—and it is the duty of every citizen worthy of the name to do it—is to rise to the occasion and to show that the new spirit which is said to be abroad is not mere lip enthusiasm but constitutes the determination to act and prove true to the great trust that has now been reposed in the country.......... Sir Charles Monro told the Council that 'if they (Indians) showed themselves fit for the position they were aspiring for, the fulfilment of their aspirations would be most favourably considered when the time comes.' It is necessary to sound a note of warning in this connection. We hope that when the time comes, the story of India's aspirations in civil appointments will not be repeated and that the fulfilment will not be left to the mercy of Committees of Inquiry, Commissions and their reports."]

Comments on the closure of 300 primary schools in Baroda.

Baroda Vartamán (53), 19th Feb.;* Hind Vijaya (60), 21st Feb.; Gujaráti Punch (15), 18th Feb.; Indian Loyalist (19), 22nd Feb.

41. The Baroda Vartamán is surprised and pained to hear that His Highness the Gaekwár has ordered the closing of 300 primary schools because a good deal of mismanagement was said to be prevailing in the administration of these schools and because, in the opinion of Mr. Clarke, the new Director of Public Instruction, teachers drawing miserable salaries were unfit to be entrusted with the task of educating the young. If that is a fact, the paper appeals to His Highness not to take such an extreme step, specially because his past policy has shown the way to other ruling Chiefs and induced them to make primary education free and compulsory in their respective States. It prays that any mismanagement existing in the department may be investigated and put an end to. As regards the pay and prospects of primary teachers, the paper points out that efforts have already been made to improve their lot and declares that in case more money is required for this purpose the people will not grudge to pay it. In conclusion the paper makes a fervent appeal to His Highness not to allow any retrograde step to be taken in the matter of education in his State. [The Hind Vijaya also writes in a similar strain. The Gujaráti Punch enlarges upon the benefits that have accrued and will accrue to the country as a whole from the wise and generous step taken by His Highness in making primary education free and compulsory and trusts that Mr. Manubhai will not allow any unjust step to be taken by His Highness. The Indian Loyalist remarks that it is too early to expect any good results from the system of free and compulsory education and thinks that if it is patiently and enthusiastically continued there is a very bright future in store for it. It hopes that His Highness will reconsider his action and devise measures to remedy the present unsatisfactory working of the system.]

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

The Defence of India Force Act and the duty of Indians.

Mahrátta (5), 4th Mar.

*1. “When the Viceroy first gave out the idea of the new force it was believed in all quarters that a deep examination of the new circumstances had really changed the angle of vision of the authorities and induced them to open for Indians in a right generous spirit the door so far closed to them. The appearance of the Bill threw some new light on the mental pre-occupations of the authorities and now the Select Committee's report and the discussion on the same in the Imperial Council give us valid grounds for believing that the Indian Government is not yet prepared to be just towards us—Indians of pure descent. They want our money, they want our lives. But they do not want us to aspire to positions of trust and honour in the army. They want us to come in our thousand and hundreds of thousands to defend their Empire, but they refuse to do that for us which will be an indication of their belief that we Indians look upon their Empire as potentially ours. We are in the Empire and there are only two ways in which we can think of the Empire. We may either look upon the latter as a group of the possession of an alien people in which we need never hope to be treated as equals of these aliens. Or we may look upon this territorial group as one in which we may in a reasonable period become the equals of our sometime ‘conquerors’. The intelligent and enlightened portion of the Indian community thinks of the Empire in the latter spirit and hence it urges the youth of India to be optimistic. Hope! Do not give up hope!—That is the burthen of our leaders' public orations and private advice on every topic, political or other. But the burthen of Government measures is continuously hostile to that of our leaders' speeches and talks. The net result of it all is the failure of the Indian leaders to keep the light of Hope still burning in the youthful minds. The result is deplored by all parties, but the only way to avert it is avoided by the authorities. The India Defence Force Act is the latest instance of a measure which by its halting and mistrustful policy will repel more Indians than it will attract by the small concession it embodies. Such are the facts. The Defence Force Act has intensified racial distinctions. It has opened the door of the army to us Indians but in a very grudging manner. It promises us nothing but the life of a common soldier—no higher training, no commissions. What is our duty under the circumstances? Our duty is plain. Grudging as the Government is, we must be ungrudging in our response to the call we have received. India is ours. The British Empire is ours, We are citizens of India and the Empire. Though our status in the country of our forefathers and in the Empire of our compulsory adoption in such as every self-respecting human being must heartily hate, we hope, with the help of Time and endeavour, to rise to the level we naturally aspire to. Let us thank Time for having compelled (or induced?) our Government to open the doors of the army to all Indians without distinction for the period of the War. Let us shoulder the musket and learn the drudgery of the common soldier as long as the war lasts. This education will avail us immensely in our future agitation for Rights. The youth of India—and we call upon the College and High school students to join the ranks in their hundreds—the enlightened youth of India who will have gone through the experiences of the military life, will have a confidence created in themselves which will be of immense use to them in their career. Our aim is the emancipation of our country from the unbearable yoke of irresponsible bureaucracy. For the work which this aim requires from us, the soldier's qualities are a necessary factor in us. Now has an opportunity been placed before us by Time, when we can develop the soldier in us to some extent. It behoves us for the sake of the Motherland to take full advantage of this opportunity. Let us remember that those who are in power never can—such is common human nature—part with their power without necessity. Do we not know that the history of the English people is a continuous sermon inculcating the necessity of tough and rough struggle, unceasing service and sacrifice on the part of those who would share power with their masters? Let us not draw false lessons from the unique example of the Mikado of Japan. We ought to be prepared for the worst, and at the same time to labour in the Mahratta-spirit (the spirit of undaunted patriotism) for the best that we can think of for the Motherland." [Elsewhere the paper writes:—"The Honourable members of the Imperial Council were unfit to understand the military point of view—they were children: That is the dictum of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. It is this most sacred and abstruse military standpoint which compelled the Select Committee to bring within the scope of the compulsory provisions of the Bill, those fortunate persons who are specified therein! If this discrimination appears to Indians as a mark of distrust—well they are an unpractical lot. The military authorities know what is good for India! The Honourable members of the Imperial Council who plead for a policy of trust know not Secrets of making a government popular! Or perhaps the military authorities care little for the popularity of the English rule in India. We do not know. Frankly, we are in the dark as to the motives which rule our rulers. We can make conjectures but we can never be positive in our assertions. Under these circumstances, we can only hope that Providence is guiding our rulers aright. We have been compelled to write this note, because we were painfully surprised at the way in which our representatives in the Imperial Council were treated by the Commander-in-Chief.]

Young India (11), 28th Feb.

2. "V. R" writes in Young India:—"The reception which has been accorded to the proposal of the Government of India to raise a Defence of India Force has not yet been marked by any exuberant outburst of enthusiasm; but we are sure that it would meet with an adequate response. While on the one hand some of the principal organs of the Anglo-Indian press have openly hinted that the measure may interfere with the pursuit of commerce, the Indians have not, on the other, enough information yet, on which to base any enthusiastic action regarding it. So far as Indians are concerned, the proposed measure seeks to perpetuate the racial distinction to a certain extent. This apart, the speeches of both the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief leave many matters connected with the recruitment and composition of the Indian units in total obscurity, and so does the Bill. The commissioned ranks are obviously shut out at any rate for the time being to the Indians; but if they show themselves fit, the fulfilment of their aspiration in this direction would be most favourably considered, when the time comes. This point is even more authoritatively, though indirectly acknowledged in the reply which Mr. Chamberlain gave to a question in the House of Commons the other day. The Right Hon'ble gentleman stated that 'he had been informed by the Viceroy that Indians would be eligible to commissions as soon as they proved their fitness for them.' Why the Viceroy should not have told this to his Council is more than we can understand; but it is thoroughly in keeping with the inscrutable traditions of the terrestrial providence which the bureaucracy is plying in this land. As to when or how this fitness is to be attained not a word has been said yet. Perhaps that too will be determined in the regulation.......... The Bill itself was 'drafted after consultation with the Chamber of Commerces and other representative bodies.' We should like to know whether any Indian public bodies were consulted in drafting the Bill and whether it is the intention of the Government to give the Army Headquarters the assistance of Indians in drafting the regulations. We take our stand on the assurance of the Commander-in-Chief that 'there is no intention of discriminating between the two classes'. Perhaps, the omission to take note of Indian opinion was due to inadvertence, which we trust will be made good by including in the Advisory Committee some competent Indians, so that in drafting the regulations adequate regard may be paid to the interests of Indians. We have no doubt our European fellow subjects on the Committee will stand foster-father to the Indians as they have all these years done. But we think that that is not enough. We mean no reflection on them when we say that it will not suffice if they represent Indian interests. The time when the country felt satisfied if Europeans represented her interests is gone past recall, and consistency with the expressed intentions and policy of the Government demands that suitable Indians may be selected to assist the Army Headquarters in drafting regulations which affected at least the Indian units. The Bill, as it now stands, is not very explicit and we doubt if it will emerge any the better from the Select Committee. That Committee consists of a strong majority of Europeans; to which should be added the fact that the three non-official Indians on it are not the best or the most distinguished or the most independent among the Indian members. They are, however, distinguished for their amiability of disposition and two of them at least are so obliging by nature that we shall not be surprised if they endorse what the European majority says or does.......... Before concluding, however, it is our painful duty to say a word of protest against the policy of scant confidence followed even towards Member of Council. Even in a matter of vital interest of this nature, we have been reduced to dependence on London, for what crumbs of information the Secretary of State is, in the plenitude of his wisdom, pleased to throw out to the starving dogs of Indian public opinion. This does not at any rate look like taking the Honourable Members into the confidence of the Government, as claimed by the Viceroy at the very outset of his speech. We wonder whether this is one of those matters, in which, as Sir Reginald Craddock said in some other connection, officials alone are interested and outsiders cannot be trusted."

Message (6), 25th and 27th Feb.

3. "In replying to the debate on the Indian Defence Force Bill, His Excellency the Commander-in-chief was pleased to remark that if 'they (Indian recruits) showed themselves fit for the position they were aspiring for, the fulfilment of their aspirations would be most favourably considered, when the time came.' It seems then that in the opinion of such an authority as the Commander-in-Chief, the fitness of Indians to be in the commissioned ranks is yet to be proved. Did His Excellency mean to suggest that a nation which produced a Shiwaji, a Ranjit Sing, a Mahadji Scinde and other generals cannot now produce men who can be lieutenants or even corporals? No, he could not have meant to say that.—he surely knows Wadgaon. His Excellency, we think, would admit the fitness of Indians from a military point of view, but he is not sure as to their fitness from other points of view. To be plain, he probably thinks it impolitic to give Commissions in the army to Indians.......... If we say that the war has tested our loyalty and proved our fitness from the point of view of policy, we shall be told that the war has not proved any such thing. It has proved the loyalty of Indian soldiers and of unarmed citizens. It has proved nothing about the loyalty of Indian commissioned officers, for the simple reason that there were no such officers! We understand the force as well as the sting of the argument, but we want to place our own difficulty before Government. If Government is not going to arm us and open commissioned ranks to us, unless the loyalty of armed citizens and trained Indian officers is proved, the realisation of our aspirations will be postponed to Doomsday, again for the simple reason that unarmed people cannot prove that they will be loyal when armed. The reasoning in fact runs in a circle—no arms without loyalty of armed men proved and no proof of such loyalty possible, without possession of arms, by citizens. The circle can be thus got over, however. Give arms to some of the citizens, admit to officership some Indians in the beginning and when this experiment has proved a success, proceed to extend the privileges. But Government apparently are not willing to make even a beginning in this direction. And hence our tears." [In its subsequent issue the paper writes:—"Perhaps, the authorities do not want that Indians should volunteer in any large numbers and that is how we can construe the invidious distinctions which will be continued between the European British subjects and non-European British subjects of His Majesty. That these distinctions are to be maintained in the new Force will be clear to any one who calmly and carefully peruses the two notable speeches of the last week, notwithstanding the statement of the Commander-in-Chief to the contrary.......... It is pleasing to learn on the authority of a round-about source, we mean that of Mr. Chamberlain—that the Viceroy is anxious to make Indians eligible to commissions. Why the Viceroy should not have told us in the first instance is beyond all imagination. Even this third-hand announcement is some solatium for the otherwise disappointing character of the 'concession'. In spite of the many desideratums which environ the composition of the Indian units, we earnestly hope our countrymen will whole-heartedly respond to this call to arms and take full advantage of the small door of opportunity which has been thrown open to them for still further proving that they are as capable of bearing a trust as any other people of the Empire. The distinctions and differences which will be observed will be galling no doubt, and very often it will need an inexhaustible well of patience to put up with the idiosyncracies and overbearing conduct of unsympathetic and hot-tempered officers. But it is inevitable in the present dispensation of things and we fully trust our countrymen will bear with all these, in the higher and nobler interests of the nation."]

4. "According to the amended definition, anybody, from a European British subject down to a full-blooded Negro, provided the latter has establised a claim to being a European British subject, by 'lodging form "A" with the Registration authority' within the prescribed period, i.e., by 3rd March 1917, would be a 'European British Subject' within the meaning of this statute. Whatever the exigencies of the situation, those who have been responsible for the drafting and amending the legislation in this respect have been guilty of an egregious blunder by accentuating the racial distinction that has already existed by the addition to it of a new factor, the factor of religious distinction.......... To say nothing of his two Indian colleagues, we ask what Mr. Bhupendranath Basu was doing when this new bar of religion in addition to the already existing bar of race was forged. We perfectly understand the attitude of the other two gentlemen. But that a trained lawyer like Mr. Basu should have signed the report without a word of dissent is extremely disappointing.......... Further, we are tempted to ask what becomes of the previous declaration of Sir Charles Monro that if the Indians showed themselves fit for commissioned ranks, the fulfilment of their aspiration would be favourably considered. What becomes, too, of the Viceroy's communication to the Secretary of State that Indians would be eligible to commissioned ranks? We were told only yesterday by one who had been in France for 12 months on active service, that the French had allowed their coloured troops to be officered by their own men and that every opportunity was allowed to them even amid the distractions of war, to qualify themselves for commissions. If that be so in the case of far less enlightened people, can it be said of us that we have neither the intelligence nor the capacity to officer at least our own units? In concluding the discussion, the Commander-in-Chief said that the 'eminently temperate suggestions which had been put forward' would be 'treasured up' and be 'fully and sympathetically considered in the future when the situation was quieter and more settled.' The remarks of His Excellency were thoroughly superfluous. We know that the suggestions would be treasured up in the same way as they had been during the past thirty years and fully and sympathetically considered in the future, when the force has been disbanded. In making these superfluous remarks, we do not think His Excellency was quite serious nor need we take him seriously. However, we are glad that the non-official members unreservedly placed themselves in the hands of the Government and facilitated the smooth passage of the Bill. Unsatisfactory as the result is, so far as we Indians are concerned, let us unhesitatingly accept even this as for the best and do all that we can to make the measure an unqualified success. It is hard indeed to accept even Eurasians and Indian-Christians, most of whom will at other times be unfit to hold a candle to the Indians, as officers. But we have perforce to bow to the inevitable and if we are not to miss what little opportunity has been offered us, let us show our readiness to sacrifice by submitting to this anomaly with a willing resignation." [Elsewhere the paper writes :—"We must confess to a degree of surprise to learn that on such an important occasion as the passing of the Indian Defence Force Bill, His Excellency the Viceroy should have been absent from the Council and relegate the task of presiding over it to a second rate lawyer politician.......... We know His Excellency is preoccupied with more pressing affairs of State. Yet unless he thought that the Bill was a mere trumpery affair, we believe he would have snatched a precious hour or two to attend the Council during the passage of the Bill, if not throughout the day's sitting.......... Does it indicate His Excellency's coldness towards the matter or was he unwilling to face the storm of words? We hope an explanation would be forthcoming in order to dispel the impression which he has created in the public mind."]

*5. "Of course anything plausible is justifiable in the case of a war measure, and it is no wonder that the solution suggested by Mr. Abbot was accepted as an easy way out of the difficulty. The fact, however, stands that racial distinctions, against which the country has always strongly protested, have been further intensified on account of the enlarged scope thus given to the definition. The position is this. First, measures are taken or institutions established on the unjustifiable basis of racial distinction or racial preferences and favouritism and that too at the expense of the general taxpayer, and that differential principle is sought to be further extended in the name of military necessity in derogation to the rights and privileges of the other communities! That is a double injury inflicted upon them, and although the country may acquiesce in the measure as a matter of mere urgency, it is impossible not to feel most keenly the anomaly thus created.......... It requires an extraordinary amount of patience and tolerance not to characterise this state of things in its true colours and His Excellency the Commander-in-chief would have done well not to read a homily to the Honourable Mr. Sarma when his predecessors and their responsible colleagues had lamentably failed to do their duty since Sir Henry Lawrence sounded his note of warning seventy years ago.......... In the absence of fuller information it is not possible to realise how the non-official members and Sir Charles Munro, who were shortly opposed to one another at one time in their standpoints, subsequently softened down and more or less made up their differences. The former had at the outset a serious grievance on the ground of principle and the Commander-in-Chief spoke as if he was an all-wise military and political expert, but strangely enough he moderated his domineering tone of superiority at the conclusion of the debate. He dwelt on the anxieties which the military authorities had to face and added that 'all the remarks which had been made in the Council would be treasured up and the eminently temperate suggestions which had been put forward would be fully and sympathetically considered in the future when the situation was quieter and settled'. This eminently conciliatory and sensible assurance seems to have brought about a change in the attitude of the councillors.......... If provision was made for the training of European youths at the expense of the Indian tax-payer, there was no earthly reason why Indian youths should not have, according to all principles of military fairness and political consistency, the same opportunities as being the sons of the soil. This claim is irresistible and unassailable. No amount of quibbling can ever satisfy the people on these points. But the motion was of course lost by 37 voting against and 23 voting for it. No other result could have been expected from an officialised Council.......... The debate on the Defence of India Force Bill was a very important one and we wish His Excellency Lord Chelmsford had made it convenient to preside on the occasion and listen to the proceedings in person. He would have then appreciated more fully than he seems to have done the intensity of the mingled feelings of regret and astonishment which past blunders have aroused in the country."

6. Though Indians have been given the opportunity of serving the Empire at the eleventh hour they should put forth all their strength to enable the Allies to gain victory. The Indian Defence Force Bill makes a very small concession to the aspirations of the Indian people. However, we must be thankful for small mercies. A public meeting was convened in Bombay on Sunday last and great enthusiasm was displayed thereat as if the Indians had been given the right of bearing arms for all times. In fact the Act will remain in force for six months after the war! Government are in no way under an obligation to accept the military services of Indians after the termination of the war. European British subjects will be requisitioned to take the place of the garrison at the frontiers and to form themselves into the second line force. Indians aspire to serve in the artillery and in the machine gun sections and to work on the aeroplanes and in submarines with a view to defeating the enemy. But these are mere dreams! Indians will only be formed into a third line infantry corps. The Commander-in-Chief has said that certain provinces and communities have not furnished a single recuit to the army. We would like to know which these commnities and provinces are. Is any attempt being made to revive the martial spirit of such communities? The present situation is due to recruiting having been confined to certain classes only and to the operation of the Arms Act. We would like to have a Committee appointed to enquire into the fitness of Indians for military service. The Indian Defence Force Act should be so amended as to give full scope to the Indians to display their abilities. Let all the inequalities between Europeans and Indians in the matter of commissions, pay and prospects be removed and then see the result. We are afraid the war will come to an end before the valour of the Indian Defence Force is put to the test. It will take at least seven months for the giving of the necessary training to the people after the rules under the Act have been framed. We would, however, urge the Indian people not to allow this opportunity to slip of proving their merits. [Elsewhere the paper publishes a letter from Mr. Ranjitram Bawabhai suggesting the formation of a "College Unit" from the students studying in the various colleges of Gujarát and Káthiáwár.]

7. "As Eurasians, Indian Christians and, in some cases, Parsis, have been admitted to Volunteer Corps, the new definition, as the Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastry rightly contended, implied an invidious discrimination against other Indians. The Commander-in-Chief could not, of course, see the point of the objection, and His Excellency's manner provoked from Mr. Sastry the complaint that he seemed to take them to be children. It may be desirable in future to entrust the conduct of such measures in Council to civilian members of Government who are more accustomed to deal with objections raised by their colleagues in debate, than to the Commander-in-Chief who naturally expects his orders to be obeyed and not to be discussed.......... The Act, it does not seem to be generally known, provides that His Excellency the Viceroy is to notify the areas and classes from which recruits are to be taken. It is desirable that the notification should be promptly made in order to avoid disappointment to those areas and classes which are not to have the benefit of the Act."

8. The war has brought many important changes in the world. So far England could rely on her navy to protect her from invasion and to keep the seas open to commerce. It also freed her from the necessity of maintaining a large standing army. The German submarines, however, have in the present war made the task of the navy more difficult owing to their large number and increased radius of action, and they are seriously interfering with the commerce of the Empire. Similarly on land on account of the destructive power of modern weapons of war England has come to realise that a country with a small army has very little chance against an adversary like Germany. Circumstances have thus compelled her to revise her old military policy towards this country. England held this country with a very small army simply by disarming the population. Even the small Indian army maintained by Government is largely recruited from men from beyond the frontier and is almost entirely officered by Europeans. The war, however, has convinced our Government that they must abandon their old policy of distrust and entrust to some extent the defence of the country to the Indians themselves, especially at a time when the regular army is drawn to other theatres of war. Some amongst us declare that so long as Government discriminates between Europeans and Indians we should not be very enthusiastic over the Indian Defence Force Act. We do not subscribe to this. Although Government do not definitely pledge themselves at present to satisfy all our just demands they will be compelled by force of circumstances to treat them sympathetically in course of time. We ought to be satisfied with the present opening. Higher appointments in the army will be given to us in due course. This is a call to our educated classes and we trust that they will respond heartily to it. This unique opportunity will not occur again. The Indian Defence Force is avowedly for the defence of the country. It is no use asking for self-government if we are not prepared to defend that government by force of arms. We should come forward with an unlimited number of fighting men. God has given this opportunity to Young India and He will satisfy our other aspirations also. [The Sandesh says:—Indians have got an opportunity of discharging the sacred duty of defending their motherland. They should remember Mr. Tilak's warning that he would give up the Home Rule movement if they fail to adequately respond to the call for Volunteers. The required number of recruits can very easily be made up if every town contributes its quota. Particularly those of us who advocate the cause of Home Rule should now come forward to popularise this movement. We must not withhold our assistance from Government even while they harass us by restricting the movements of our leaders like Messrs. Tilak and Pal. Indian youths should bear in mind that the Almighty God will not fail to satisfy our just ambitions if we discharge this patriotic duty. The Bakul says:—Government ignored our demand for Volunteering for thirty years. The right is conceded to us now when the Empire is in difficulties. We should not, however, lose this golden opportunity of convincing our Government that we are able to defend ourselves. The Kalpataru remarks:—Have Government conferred this right on us as the birth-right of every British citizen? If they aim simply at getting over their present difficulties, there is no reason why we should be very enthusiastic over this offer. We trust Government will make this point clear. The Arya Vaibhav says that Government is at liberty to train any number of Indians and take them anywhere they are required, but people must first know that they will be treated on a footing of equality with the Colonials.]

9. "The right to bear arms for which the educated Indians have been agitating these 30 years is to-day a fait accompli. Not only this, but those Indians who qualify themselves in the Army will be eligible for Commissions therein. When Mr. Tilak (the Mahratta Nationalist) and New India (the Bible of the Home Rule Leaguers) make frantic appeals to the educated Indians for enrolment in the Defence of India Force, it means that the tide has come in the flood of Indian progress which, if taken advantage of at this psychological moment, will but lead to great results. We sincerely compliment Mr. Tilak upon his plain speaking to the 'Home Rulers' regarding ruling to be done by them and the defence of their homes by the British or the Japanese. Now has come the hour for trial for those who are most vociferous in the demand of full-blown Home Rule. We have little doubt that the places where nationalists of the stamp and stamina of Mr. B. G. Tilak rule the roost among the Home Rulers there would be an adequate response to this clarion call for the defence of the country. As to our own province where public life is insincere and fitful, it is a question whether the educated classes will make a decent response. But the matter is complicated by the fact that the pay and prospects of those who will enrol themselves in the force will not be better than those of illiterate privates in the Regular Army. If the pay of the educated classes who enrol themselves in the Defence of India Force is placed on a par with that of the Anglo-Indians, cause for complaint on that score will cease to exist. This consideration apart, it should be the duty of the true sons of the soil to make a supreme effort for inducing educated men to join, in adequate numbers, in the Defence of India Force. A momentous hour has come for supreme self-sacrifice. We have in our midst the Citizens'

Phœnix (7), 28th Feb.

[illegible] whereof should set a personal example in order [illegible] brethren to join in the Defence of India Force. We [illegible] what personal sacrifices the members of the local Home Rule [illegible] whose fashion is to talk big and the loudest, are prepared to make in this connection. It is all very well to pass strongly-worded resolutions on this grievance and on that. But the real fitness lies in the doing in the hour of the country's call."

10. It is necessary that all should avail themselves of the fine opportunity offered by Government to the people for military training. Government is going to arrange that the training of those who join this new Force will not much interfere with their daily avocations, and, therefore, it is the duty of men of all professions and of students who have completed their courses to enrol themselves in it. We must bear it in mind that by joining this force we would be serving not only the Empire but our country also, for it is primarily intended for its defence, by setting free the regular forces to proceed to the front. If we hesitate to join and leave the defence of the country to the European portion of the Force, it will be the most disgraceful for all of us, for we will then be justly charged with shirking the responsibility of defending those rights for which we all have been clamouring. We fully trust that Young Indians will not allow such a stigma to fall upon them. Government have pledged their word to give commissions to Indians and we all hope that no invidious distinctions will be made between Indians and Europeans in the rules that are about to be promulgated. The angle of vision of Government has evidently undergone a change, and we join with Mrs. Besant in her appeal to Indians to be prepared to join without raising any doubts as to the conditions of service. We do not think that the European portion of the Force will be disbanded after the war, and we do not know why the Indian section should be differently treated. We, however, wish that Government should give a distinct assurance to that effect. [The paper in its subsequent issue remarks:—The non-official Indian members accorded, it is true, their consent to the measure in spite of its glaring defects as they did not want to place any hindrances in the path of Government at the present critical time. But we cannot help entering our strong protest against the narrow-mindedness exhibited by Government on the present occasion. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief not only gave no assurance for the grant of fresh concessions to the people in the future but on the contrary treated with contempt suggestions made by the non-official Indian members in that connection. It is to be regretted that Government have not yet given up their attitude of suspicion. The Indian members advocated enrolment of Indian cadets on the lines of the European units, and Government themselves knew that such a step would have powerfully helped in the recruitment of the Indian Defence Force, but the request was refused. What does it show? It only shows that Government is not yet prepared to trust Indians. Notwithstanding all this, we call upon Indians of all classes to run to the help of Government and enrol themselves as volunteers.]

11. "There is no doubt that great opportunity is accorded to India by Government's decision to constitute a Defence of India Force consisting of both European and Indian units, and we feel sure that it will be seized upon with alacrity and enthusiasm.......... The call has come and it must be responded to by the whole country. The present occasion has peculiar claims upon the educated and progressive classes. In proportion to their demand for rights and privileges, they must show a readiness to bear the burdens of Government, and if for any inadequate reasons they fail to respond to the call of duty, it will remain a paralysing and permanent reproach to them.......... Both the necessity of the moment and our future interests demand that we shall not be remiss in doing our duty by our King and Country to the best of our power and ability.........

But not in the hope of reward, and not in the spirit of calculation, do we make this appeal to our countrymen to rise for the defence of our Country and Empire. It must be done in the spirit of service, sacrifice and patriotism. .... We hope there will be recruiting meetings in various parts of the country, and young men will be exhorted to join the new army. Eager as they are for the regeneration of their country, their motto should be: 'The path of Duty is the way to Glory." [The paper in the subsequent issue wishes that Government had incorporated the suggestions of non-official Indian members in the Indian Defence Force Bill before passing it into law. It defends the action taken by the Select Committee in including Anglo-Indian, Parsis and Indian Christians in the definition of European British subjects so far as they are members of Volunteer Corps, on the ground of the emergency that has arisen to utilise the services of the volunteers on whose training so much money and time have been expended. It expresses a hope that Parsis who have already received military training will prove themselves worthy of commissions and that commissions may thus be thrown open to Indians through them. The Sánj Vartamán makes an appeal to educated Indians to enlist themselves in the Indian Defence Force in large numbers. Shri Venkateshwar also makes a similar appeal. The Jám-e-Jamshed exhorts young men of military age to join the Indian Defence Force and thus show their loyalty to the country and the King-Emperor. The Gujaráti Punch reminds the young men of the stirring appeal made by Mr. Tilak at Poona in this connection and asks them to enlist. The Indian Loyalist reminds the young men of the advice given by Shri Krishna to Arjuna in the Bhagwat Gita and asks them to join the Indian Defence Force. The Hind Vijaya also exhorts young Indians to enlist themselves and make the fullest use of the opportunity given to them by doing deeds of valour that would redound to the credit of India.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 3rd Mar.

12. We had earnestly hoped that the Select Committee would find out some means of removing the distinction between the Europeans and Indians and it is but natural that the public should be disappointed to see their hopes frustrated by the rejection of all the suggestions advanced by the non-official Indian members. Some satisfaction will be expressed by the Parsis who were already Volunteers by the extension of the definition of the term "European British subjects" to make it applicable to them, but immense joy would have been felt by the Indian public in general if they had also been regarded as European British subjects, for by their exclusion they have been denied the pleasure of receiving commissions in the army. We very much wish Government had accepted the suggestion of admitting Indians to the Officers' Training School at Quetta. Be that as it may, we would ask all young men of military age to join the Indian Defence Force.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 4th Mar., Eng. cols.

*13. In the course of an article in which it exhorts the Parsis to join the Indian Defence Force in as large numbers as possible, the Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"With the improvement and expansion of the existing Volunteer Force which, the Commander-in-Chief said, the Government of India were doing with the help of the Indian Defence Act, about 200 Parsis will pass into and become members of the Indian Defence Force. Now that the racial bar which was keeping our men from entering the Army and giving their share in the defence of their country has been removed, we shall be surprised if the Parsee Community which prides itself on its education and advancement rests satisfied with this paltry quota to the need of the Empire.......... The Parsees are today a living, moving and forcible entity because of the British connection. That connection has lifted them up and imbued the remnants of a past greatness and glory with a spirit of freshness and vigour that has brought the Parsees into the hegemony of the Indian communities............ The Parsees' answer to that call is but one and that is to be true to that legendary lore which has marked them out as the sons of the valiant Rustom and Sohrab, true to those historic facts which record their descent from Jamshed and Kaikhusro, Gushtasp and Noshirwan, Cyrus and Darius, true to their gospel that lays down loyalty and allegiance to the Sovereign as one of its chief tenets. The fear of extinction need not trouble them.......... We trust the Parsees will rise to the occasion that has presented itself before them and in spite of their numerical weakness lead the rest of India in the matter of enrolment for the defence of the Empire as they have done in all other matters in the past."

Alleged recruiting disturbances at Kolhápur.

Message (6), 28th Feb.; Kesari (95), 27th Feb.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 28th Feb.

14. "We learn, with regret, from the Vishwabandhu of Kolhápur, that on the 16th and 18th instant, the people in that city assembled in crowds near the Foujdar Kacheri with a view, as stated, to offer opposition to recruiting for the army. His Highness the Maharaja promptly put in his appearance there and took effective measures to disperse the rowdy crowd. In view of the possibility of the recrudescence of such spirit of opposition to the recruiting going on there, a notification has been issued by order of His Highness the Maharajah, forbidding the coming out of the citizens there with sticks, or even umbrellas. Forming of people into crowds is thereby forbidden,—cricket, tennis, dramatic and other shows even are for some days forbidden as a precautionary measure to prevent large crowds. Those who will oppose or try to oppose recruiting are threatened with prompt and severe punishment. A 'Punitive' Police Force will be formed, if necessary. In case any injustice is being done or inconvenience caused by the enlistment of a particular recruit or in case force is alleged to have been used in securing a particular recruit, people concerned should duly apply to the proper authorities, and they are promised justice and redress of grievances, if any are proved. From the account given above, it will be clear to the readers that Kolhápur is not quite in normal conditions now. We can only express the hope that these conditions will not last long." [The Kesari remarks :—We find no justification for the action of the Kolhápur authorities in ordering that every passer-by should salute a military officer. It is particularly to be deplored that peaceful and respectable persons should have been insulted under this ill-conceived order. The question of recruiting is rather delicate. Had the authorities handled it with tact, this disturbance could have been averted. We suggest that they should now make amends for the insults the peaceful citizens have received and also pardon those who joined in the disturbances, through a misunderstanding. The Dnyán Prakásh says :—Attempts should have been made to explain matters to the people and to conciliate them, but nothing appears to have been done in that direction. On the contrary, the steps taken are likely to increase the fears entertained by the people. Severe measures like the imposition of punitive police are justified only in the case of a grave situation arising, and their employment in the case of ordinary scuffles only gives rise to panic. It behoves the Kolhápur authorities to publish the facts of the case.]

The Indian War Loan.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 3rd Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 2nd Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 2nd Mar.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 3rd Mar.; Gujaráti (13), 25th Feb.; Bombay Samáchár (55), 2nd Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 2nd Mar.

15. The Praja Mitra and Pársi expresses approval of the terms of the new War Loan and particularly of the Post Office Cash certificate scheme which will enable even the poor classes to contribute their quota to the War Loan and expresses hope that the Indian people will show their loyalty to the Empire by subscribing to it and thus ensuring the success of the Allies in the war, which they are waging for a righteous cause. [The Hindusthán also expresses hope that the people of India will readily subscribe to the War Loan. The Akhbár-e-Islam exhorts mill owners and rich men among the Muhammadans to subscribe to the war loan and to offer facilities to their employés to do the same. The Shri Venkateshwar appeals to the rich to subscribe to the War Loan and thus hasten the victory of the Allies. The Gujaráti writes :—One main thing about the Indian War Loan is not made clear, namely, whether it is to be given as a loan or as a gift and whether India is to bear the burden of the additional debt. We would very much like the point to be cleared up.

The Bombay Samáchár expresses admiration at the able manner in which the Finance Minister has drafted his scheme for the 5 per cent. War Loan, 5½ per cent. War Bonds and Post Office Cash Certificates and for the facilities that have been offered for converting the old loans into the new one. It is fully confident that the rich as well as the poor will readily come forward to subscribe to the War Loan. The Jám-e-Jamshed also approves of the terms of the War Loan and asks people not to mind the depreciation of the old 3 per cent. loan in the market owing to the high rate of interest offered for the new loan. It expresses hope that the prices of all the Government loans and securities will rise considerably after the termination of the war.]

Gujaráti (13), 4th Mar., Eng. cols.

*16. "This poor country has in the past borne more than its share of military expenditure even to the detriment of her moral, intellectual and material development and has so far done what she could to help the Empire with men and money at this supreme crisis. The donation of 150 crores represents two years' revenue of India before the war and we are glad she has seized the right opportunity to participate financially also in the mighty struggle, apart from the voluntary contributions she has made in a variety of forms.......... We cannot say that the method adopted by the Viceroy in committing the Indian people to an unprecedented financial burden without consulting their representatives on the Supreme Legislative Council beforehand was right or proper. His Excellency could well have afforded to treat their views and feelings with greater consideration. This precedent is open to serious objections. The scheme of the War Loan, however, is well conceived and ought to evoke a generous response. We congratulate the Finance Member on the lucidity of his financial exposition and on the courage, sense of justice and impartiality, and statesmanship he has displayed in tapping the right sources of income with one exception for meeting the annual charge of six millions. The whole fiscal and economic policy of the Indian Government has so far been largely dominated by powerful British interests and last year the poor Indian had his salt taxed further because of the tenderness shown by the Home Government to the interests of the British cotton manufacturers. This political and fiscal scandal, of which Japan and other well developed countries have taken the fullest advantage at the expense of this backward country, has at last been removed to the satisfaction of the whole country. We are grateful to His Excellency the Viceroy that he has not allowed his festina lente to come in the way of the removal of a long-standing and painful sore. We are sorry we can not approve of the surcharge imposed on firewood and other necessary articles of food which have already gone up in price. With this one exception we welcome the Financial Statement and gratefully congratulate the Government of India on the equitable, courageous and honourable policy they have adopted in adjusting their financial arrangements."

Message (6), 25th Feb.; Sandesh (103), 28th Feb.; Sholápur Samáchár (106), 27th Feb.

17. "Prospect of monetary advantage apart, it is the duty of every Indian to help the Empire with whatever money he can spare. A rupee given to the loan is a bullet more at the enemy. The Munitions Ministry cannot manufacture the 'silver bullets,' and therefore, it will enthusiastically welcome such addition to their output of munitions. A local bank has consented to accept payments to the loan by instalments, and we have no doubt that Indians—rich as well as poor—will take advantage of this, or any such facility offered to them and hurl their 'silver bullets' at the enemy of the Empire." [The Sandesh says:—Meetings are being held at several places to make the War Loan a success. This is a call to the whole country and will meet, we trust, with a worthy response. It is a well-known fact, however, that although we are strong in man-power our pecuniary resources are comparatively limited. Still each one of us should contribute his mite. India contains a population of 25 crores, and a very modest contribution of a rupee per head will make a decent total of 25 crores of rupees. The Sholápur Samáchár says:—By contributing liberally to the War Loan we shall be assisting our King-Emperor in winning the war. This is a golden opportunity which we should not lose.]

Indian Social Reformer (3), 4th March.

18. "Five years ago no one would have thought that India was in a position to make a free gift of £100 millions for any purpose. And even to-day, having regard to her slender resources relatively to other parts of the Empire and the manifold needs of her population, she is making it not out of her plenty but out of her poverty. But she is giving it in no grudging spirit. She gives it gladly out of gratitude for all that the British connection has done for her, and because this war is, so far as the Allies are concerned, a war for the ideals which she hopes to realise for herself within the British Empire. As compared with the vast expenditure of blood and treasure which Great Britain is pouring out, our contribution is as nothing. But we hope our critics will not lose sight of the conditions and the spirit in which it is made. They will then realise that small as our contribution is, it represents an immensely larger good will and sacrifice than greater contributions from other parts of the Empire.......... We hope the country will respond enthusiastically to the call that is made on her. It is the call of gratitude, of patriotism, of duty."

Comments on a speech delivered by the Collector of Sukkur at a Durbar in connection with the Indian War Loan.

Pársi Sansár (26), 17th Feb., Eng. cols.

19. Commenting upon the remarks made by Mr. E. L. Moysey, the Collector, at a Durbar held at Sukkur, on the subject of the Indian War Loan, the Pársi Sansár regrets that he should have belittled the contribution already made by India towards the war and continues:—"We believe the cause would have been served better, had no attempt been made to belittle India in the manner mentioned above. How can it be said that India is not paying enhanced taxes? She is bearing the enhanced taxation upon the income of every individual man quietly and silently. It is said that there has been no rise in prices prevailing in India. But those who say so are rather unaware of the conditions. Leaving aside the question of India, we would cite instances in our own midst; Sind is agitating since long regarding the heavy prices of foodstuffs, ruling at present......... How can then one say that since the war, people are not paying high prices? We admit that the people in England do pay higher prices than the people of India, but Mr. Moysey, while saying so, does not compare the income side of the question between the people of England and the people of India. A particular Zamindar or a wealthier class is not to be judged at, but the subject should be looked at from the common point of view. India is so poor and miserable in general that in proportion to her wealth she has played a fairly good part by way of paying money for the common cause. We ourselves, however, would certainly appeal to the people to contribute all they can towards the New War Loan, and we are sure they will; we only write this as it seems to us an attempt has been needlessly made to belittle India."

What the Indian representatives will have to do at the Imperial War Conference.

Message (6), 27th Feb.

20. "Mr. Chamberlain's statement in the House of Commons that 'he would be the only representative of India who would be a member of the Imperial War Cabinet for the purpose of the special sittings', ought now to set at rest all speculations as to the character of the 'Indian' representation at the Conference. Whatever one may have to say of the oddity of a Tory English gentleman, who has never seen India, never known India, except through the red-tape of the India Office carried on from a distance of 7000 miles and who has never professed in his past career any goodwill for India's well being—that is of course inconsistent with the jingo imperalism of the Tory party—one cannot help being utterly disappointed at the cold treatment of India by the 'push and go' Premier. Our readers will recall the recent interview which Dr. David Lloyd George gave a representative of the Australian United Service Cable, wherein he declared that he would rise above all precedents. To us, at any rate, this does not look like having risen above any precedent. On the other hand, whatever his past views may have been in regard to matters of common justice and fairness Mr. George has obviously given them the go-by at the machinations of his co-triumvirs Lord Curzon and Lord Milner and has thought that by giving a stone where bread was sorely needed he has satisfied the crying wants of the Indian subjects of His Majesty!

There would have been some excuse if British statesmanship had failed at other times. But at a moment when the whole Empire is faced with a severe crisis, it is hardly conceivable that any body, much less a man of Mr. Lloyd George's type, would allow himself to be led into a mirage by the blind prejudices and party cravings of narrow-minded Imperialists. And yet we are faced with the hard reality of his first great failure to rise to the full height of the occasion!......... Translated into the language of the experience of the past fifty years we shall not wonder if the intrigues of high Tory politicians with journalists and superjournalists succeed only too well in leaving India under the reconstructed Empire worse off than she is to-day under the ægis of Great Britain alone! Mr. Chamberlain's announcement takes away the bottom of all pretence which some people had for believing that the Ruling Princes had been given direct representation and that His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner would represent them, as Mr. Chamberlain does 'India' at the Conference. On this point, too, there is no longer room for doubt, and His Highness, like His Honour Sir James Meston and Sir Satyendra Prasanna Sinha, will be playing second fiddle to the Great Mogal who obviously holds in his palm not only the destinies of 250 millions of British India but now of the 65 millions who are the subjects of 'our Allies'. Mr. Chamberlain's 'colleagues' (or assistants?) would accompany him at the sittings and take such part (as may be graciously allowed) in the deliberations as the subjects under discussion required!"

Government should take steps to enforce economy and discourage the enjoyment of luxuries.

Sind Observer (10), 17th Feb.

21. "While Government are engaged in a strenuous endeavour to collect all the available money in the Empire through the medium of a very attractive war loan, the terms of which have been drawn up so that even small sums may be invested in the Fund, no attempt has yet been made to impose a sumptuary law to reduce expenses. This attitude is characteristic of the British Government which puts off compulsion to the eleventh hour, and is singularly timorous of grasping the nettle in a resolute manner. Germany is quick at recognising what action should be taken by the State at a certain juncture and the machinery is promptly set in motion, which compares very favourably with our lumberous methods of organisation. And we pay dearly for our drifting policy in the end. We have eventually to resort to the German way to successfully combat her organisation. When England saw plainly that she must summon and train her man-power in order to win the war she began to do so at her usual slow pace, so leisurely that in India in the thirtieth month of the great war registration of eligibles has commenced, and the bill to call them out has not yet been placed before the Legislature. Help the Empire to victory by lending your money to the country! cries the State, and two-and-a-half years after the outbreak of war floats a war loan in India. But what measures has the State adopted to curtail expenditure on luxuries and the various et ceteras on which so much money is wasted? Nil. The people are merely advised to save their money and invest it in the loan, the success of which is vital to the Empire. In the meantime luxuries of all descriptions are permitted to pass through the ports for the delectation of a nation at war. Charity and non-charity dances continue at the rate of about two a week, and bands or strolling comedians are allowed to exploit the country. We do not wish it to be understood that we advocate the abolition by law of all amusements. But if the people will not realise that the country is at war, and that unlimited expenditure on such matters is fatal to the commonweal, it is time for the State to prohibit them except within reasonable bounds. The public must eschew delights and live laborious days because the Empire is now in a life and death struggle with a powerful and determined foe whose victory will mean their domination of the world... While on the subject we may as well say a few words in respect of the charity dances which have attained such a vogue in this city. We think, from information which has reached us, that Government should demand accounts from the organisers and promoters of such entertainments. We do not mean to insinuate that these dances have not been run honestly nor do we desire to impugn the integrity of any body, but we assert that there has been much wasteful extravagance and the amounts by which charities have benefited are startlingly small compared with the sums collected. Government having made up their minds that money is wanted and that every rupee counts, it is the duty of Government to see that the sinews of war are not frittered away in the idle pleasures and wasteful luxuries. It is the duty of all patriotic citizens to see that extravagance at a crisis like the present is wicked and a horrid mockery, and must cease, otherwise the Empire must be overcome by the enemy."

England is unable to combat the evil of drink even in these times of war.

Kesari (95), 27th Feb.

22. At a critical time like the present when provisions are running short, England has further restricted the import of certain articles of food. But strange to say the daily expenditure of 60 lacs of rupees on spirits has escaped the attention of Government! While the general public is being immensely inconvenienced by the curtailment of railway train services owing to the shortage of coal, liquor distilleries in England are daily cosuming five thousand tons of coal! The evil stars of England appear still to be in the ascendant in that she has failed to profit by the example of her allies France and Russia in this respect. Is it not strange that a man in England should be able to procure an unlimited quantity of drink at a time when a proposal for the issue of bread tickets is under consideration? Nay, it is considered unlawful to stand before a liquor shop and preach temperance! How long is this state of things to last?

Reflections on the progress of the war.

Hindusthān (17), 27th Feb.; Hind Vijaya (60), 28th Feb.

23. People ardently wish that peace may come by the end of this year and Sir Douglas Haig's utterances go to strengthen this wish. However, Lord Northcliffe is of opinion that the war will be protracted for five years. We cannot say which of the two conflicting opinions will prove to be true. Some signs, no doubt, go to prove that the end of the war is not far distant. The internal condition of Austria and Germany is not very satisfactory and people there seem to be clamouring for peace owing to scarcity of foodstuffs, but we must not count too much upon the reports of discontent in the enemy countries. We have reasons to believe that our offensive in the West will achieve great results and every advance in that field of action brings us nearer the end. We cannot possibly expect much in the Eastern sphere. Large tracts are still to be retaken from the enemy and we cannot depend much on Russia which cannot provide munitions for its own army. England's wealth is not inexhaustible and we should bear in mind the speech recently made by Mr. Bonar Law. The question of the Navy is causing some perplexity and the opinion is shared by the generality of public that the task of meeting the submarine menace is extremely difficult. The question of foodstuffs is the most important of all and though our position is much better than that of the enemy we cannot be indifferent to the difficulties that stare us in the face. We know that the future of France and Belgium is assured. What then are we fighting for? Have we now to fight for enabling Russia to get Constantinople? The reply given by the Allies to the German overtures of peace gives us no indications as to the terms on which they want to conclude peace. We wish the reply had expressed a desire to know what terms the enemy was willing to offer. The Allied reply did not ask the enemy his terms of peace in spite of the suggestions of the Liberal Press. The public is fully aware of the present situation and some people expect greater hardships in future. We, therefore, cannot but admire the courage and patriotism of the Allies in making up their minds to defeat the enemy in spite of adverse circumstances. We would conclude by expressing a hope that the war may cease by the end of this year. [Commenting upon the progress of the war the Hind Vijaya writes:—It is a gratifying feature of this year's campaign that the Allies have commenced to gain ground before the commencement of the spring offensive and as the enemy has to fight in various directions he will soon be placed in an embarrassing position. The enemy, in despair, has resorted to ruthless submarinism and though it may not affect the issue of the war it will no doubt create fresh difficulties which will have to be surmounted. Mr. Lloyd George has made a weighty pronouncement in this respect. The relations between America and Germany have been estranged but if the latter gives an assurance of not sinking American steamers it is probable that America will abstain from entering the war.]

Appeal to Government to grant their menial servants some increase of pay to make up for the abnormal rise in prices brought about by the war.
Phœnix (7), 28th Feb.

24. "An anonymous correspondent, writing to the Phœnix, dwells on the general rise in prices and points out that while the Railway authorities, the Karachi Port Trust and the Karachi Municipality, whose peons are paid at a higher rate than menials in Government service, have granted increments ranging between Rs. 1-8-0 and Rs. 30 to their menial staffs, Government, who usually take the lead in such matters have done nothing yet for their inferior servants. Is it possible, he asks, for a man with a family to live on Rs. 10 which is the monthly pay for the most part of these servants of Government? 'These are hard times,' he concludes, and Government should come to the aid of these people."

Comments on the re-capture of Kut-el-Amara.
Bombay Samáchár (55), 2nd Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 28th Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 3rd Mar.; Shri Venkateshwar (75), 1st Mar.

25. The Bombay Samáchár hopes that the congratulations offered by His Majesty the King-Emperor to General Maude on the re-capture of Kut-el-Amara will encourage him and his army in bringing to a happy termination the task on which they have embarked. It believes that victory will greatly help to wipe off the slight adverse effect that might have been produced upon the spirits of those connected with this expedition by the fall of Kut in April last. It is of opinion that regard being had to the condition of the expeditionary force at the time when Kut fell and to the difficulties and conditions amidst which our army had to make its way at that Front, the period of ten months that has elapsed since the fall of the place can scarcely be called long and remarks that the shortness of the period only proves the greatness and glorious character of the victory achieved by the British generals in charge of the expedition. The paper confidently hopes that our troops will now soon be in a position to accomplish the objects with which this expedition has been undertaken. [According to the Hindusthán the defeat of the Turks at Kut is a sign of the growing inability of Germany to help her Allies at the different fronts, as she was once able to do. It, however, remarks that we have no cause for joy at the re-capture of Kut. It maintains that it will gladden the hearts of the Indians to learn that Indian troops had a hand in the present victory, a fact which has greatly enhanced their glory. The Jám-e-Jamshed notes with gratification the re-capture of Kut. It regards the synchronisation of this victory with the successes of the Allied armies on the Western front as the beginning of a successful offensive against the enemy. The Shri Venkateshwar also expresses jubilation over the victory at Kut.]

Reflections on the official account of the German atrocities in the Cameroons.
Gujaráti (13), 25th Feb.

26. Remarking that the book supplied to it by the Bombay Government containing an official account of the atrocities perpetrated by the Germans in the Cameroons (Africa) affords gruesome reading, the Gujaráti observes:—But to us the question arises what would be the object of circulating such a narrative here in India where the Colonists and the Anglo-Indians made distinctions between the white and the black and tried to build up their prestige on the alleged superiority of the white European nations over the Indians. Are these people now convinced that man has two eyes, two ears, one nose, one month, two hands and two feet everywhere and that superiority does not lie in the whiteness or blackness of the skin or in the fact of a one's belonging to Europe or India? In fact, Germany's grievance is that England and France have taught the black and uncivilised nations of Asia and Africa to confront the white people of Europe and have lowered the prestige of these whites among the black people of Asia and [illegible] by exposing the German atrocities. Just as the Germans have indulged in inhuman practices in the present war, accounts submitted in the British House of Commons have contained instances of similar inhumanities practised, before the war, in Belgian Congo and other colonies, in connection with the rubber trade, etc., and, therefore, the belief of the Indians that superiority does not lie in the colour of the skin is not incorrect.

Comments on the orders excluding Mr. Tilak from the province of Delhi and from the Punjab.

Kesari (95), 27th Feb.

27. Following upon the order of the Punjab Government the Chief Commissioner of Delhi has ordered Mr. Tilak not to enter the province of Delhi. We shall not be surprised if yet another administration pays the same attention to Mr. Tilak. One would suppose that as the orders are issued under the same Act they must all be similarly worded with only change in date, place and signature. But there is rather an amusing difference between the two orders served on Mr. Tilak. While the Punjab Government charges him with the 'intention' of acting in a manner prejudical to public safety, the Chief Commissioner of Delhi goes a little further and says that Mr. Tilak has acted in that manner. Of course the Local Governments can say anything they like so long as the law does not compel them to disclose the ground on which they act. Such orders are indeed defamatory. In our opinion it is most unbecoming that Government should try to accomplish their illegitimate ends by taking shelter behind the Defence of India Act. But at present Government have become so very indifferent that they do not care about public opinion. Mr. Tilak's activities are confined at present to two objects, viz., to educate public opinion on Home Rule and to induce people to enter the military service. Surely Government does not regard the latter object with displeasure. It is evident, therefore, that his Home Rule movement is distasteful to Government. The Government of India and the High Court of Bombay have already recognised that the demand for Home Rule is not unconstitutional. We humbly pray, therefore, that notice should be taken of the arbitrary acts of these Local Governments. We would remind Government that they are pursuing an unwise policy at the present moment. The people have expressed their disapproval of these acts in the press and from the platform in no uncertain terms.

Message (6), 25th Feb.

28. "If the other Governments and Administrations erred a little on the side of moderation, Mr. Hailey, the Chief Commissioner of the Province of Delhi, has outdone them all in asserting that Tilak has acted prejudicially to public safety. Granting that it is so, we have a right to know whose public safety it is that has been prejudiced, whether it is that of the Delhi Province or that of the whole of India. If it is the latter, it was more fitting that the Government of India should have taken action and saved the unpleasantness and inconvenience to the various administrative units of the Indian Empire. But as regards the action of Mr. Hailey, we do not want to protest any more—there is no longer any value in protests and prayers. We will content ourselves by merely asking in the name of common sense what all this means. We will even grant that Tilak has acted in a manner prejudicial to public safety. Is it not reasonable to suppose that a man who has prejudiced public safety would be dealt with in accordance with the laws of the land and punished according to the measure of his guilt? If, as Mr. Hailey says, Bal Gangadhar Tilak has acted thus, does not the order leave him free to go on acting in that manner outside the sacred limits of the Delhi Chief Commissionership? It is difficult to assume that this order could have been issued without the knowledge or consent of the Viceroy, if not of the Viceroy in Council, and we wonder if even he, who is himself a member of the English bar, has been so lacking in ordinary fairness and justice which the meanest standards of English public life demand......... If as the cumulative result of these ill-conceived, ill-advised acts of repression, intensified discontent is completely driven underground, it would be a day of dire misfortune—which God forbid—both to India and the Empire. It is high time that an immediate brake should be put upon the unrestrained tendency of the bureaucracy towards repression.

These acts are increasingly becoming a riddle to all thoughtful people and if the Government of India are sincerely anxious to help at least the Empire, if not India, in reaching its ideal, it is their primary duty to solve this riddle."

Young India (11), 28th Feb.

29. "Before the public has had time to recover from the shock which was administered to its feelings by the Punjab Government's order of prohibition against Mr. Tilak and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal, there comes another order from the Chief Commissioner of the Delhi Province directed against Mr. Tilak. This order is the more remarkable for the positive assertion of the Chief Commissioner that in his opinion Mr. Tilak has prejudiced public safety. This is going as far as any authority could under the array of legal and illegal powers vested in him. But what about the consequences to the aggrieved party? He is without a remedy, while his adversary is safely entrenching himself behind the Defence Act in taking away his character. Even in England, where a kind of general martial law is the order of the day, the subject has got open to him certain safeguards. But in this country where we are frequently reminded that we have not felt the burden of war, can there be a greater burden of war than the one which has been imposed in the shape of the Defence Act? The bureaucracy, if it so chooses, can establish a veritable reign of terror and lawlessness and yet point with impunity to the Defence Act as a justification."

Message (6), 28th Feb.

30. "We had been led to think by the recent order of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb against Lokamanya Tilak that His Honour was sitting on a volcano which might be in eruption at any moment. It is comforting, therefore, to learn from the latest administration report of the province that 'Those who knew the Punjáb and the people while they felt the anxiety which is natural when passing through critical times, saw no cause for alarm.' This sets one thinking as to what might be the cause of the panic-stricken order which he issued. On his own admission the Punjáb is not a surcharged volcano and the community there is as peaceful as any other community elsewhere. Therefore, no question of danger to public safety, if it means public peace and order, can arise. As for the safety of the State, we cannot assume that it was ever threatened and that the threat would come from Lokamanya Tilak. No one outside a lunatic asylum willl ever venture to say that against the Lokamanya. Why was the order issued at all? Did the Lieutenant-Governor, then, lose his head like some of his colleagues? This is a matter which needs explanation even in the interests of official 'prestige'."

Gujaráti (13), 25th Feb.

31. We are at a loss to know whether our rulers want to enlist the sympathy of the Indian people or to estrange them. Orders have recently been issued prohibiting Messrs. Tilak and Pal from entering the Punjáb and the province of Delhi on the ground that they would disturb public peace. But the irony of it is that both these gentlemen had no intention whatsoever of entering the provinces from which they have been banned. We only wish no one has played a joke on the rulers of these provinces. Mr. Tilak's reply-paid telegram asking for the name of the Government informant remains unreplied! The incident illustrates how the Defence of India Act can be misused. In former days the opponents of Government were allowed liberty of speech and were taken to task if they exceeded the bounds of honest criticism. But now our rulers have become hasty and intolerant and gag the mouths of people on the assumption that they would do something to disturb the peace.

Reflections on the mentality of the English and the character of English rule in India.

Young India (11), 28th Feb.

32. Mr. L. G. Khare writing to Young India quotes the following from a public utterance of Lord Ronaldshay's in London :—"The English community in India was a very small drop in a very large ocean. It was living in exile among strange surroundings, and somewhere back in their sub-conscious minds there was the instinct of self-preservation" and remarks :—"One is justified in explaining to oneself from this that the English [illegible] of years as the masters of India have failed to create for themselves a position of trust in this country. They cannot feel that among the Indians without arms over whom they rule they enjoy a position of security. To keep their present position of political dominance as a ruling caste, they must hedge themselves round with artificial barriers, barriers which sometimes insult the intelligent section of the ruled, who are willing to exhibit their loyalty to the Empire and their appreciation of the British principles of justice and fairplay by volunteering their services for the cause of that Empire. But the English attitude is one of aloofness, of a kind of hauteur which the Indian cannot understand, as it is neither Oriental, because of its lack of dignity, nor natural, because intimate intercourse with individual Englishmen convinces him that it is not so. This English attitude, we would like Young India to understand, is not peculiar to the English in India. It is exhibited in the English governing classes in England, in the Colonies, in fact wherever the Englishman finds himself in a position to administer the affairs of others. ...... One is struck sometimes very sharply by the honesty and the stupidity of the British. The Briton always means well, it is in translating his excellent intentions into practice that he so singularly fails. He earnestly wishes that his Government of India should not be a slur on that British honesty of intention, so he tries to govern as best as he can, but he governs by his prejudices, not by the principles which he once cherished. Indians of all shades of political thought will agree that the British Government in India means well. It is a good government in so far as in the India of to-day there is far more freedom of speech than in the England of Mr. Lloyd George; but this is a very cold consolation, as the C. I. D. menial on Rs. 12 a month has the initiative of deciding what that freedom of speech is: it is a government which attempts to be just, in that it deals out justice between brown and brown almost with meticulous care: it is an efficient government, the presence of pompous Inspectors-General of this and that flitting about the country to produce dreary blue-books, leaves no doubt of that efficiency. Yet in the back of the British mind along with the 'instinct of self-preservation' discovered by Lord Ronaldshay, there is the feeling that his rule does not make the ruled feel happy; it does not catch their imagination, as the rule of the French in Anam and Morocco fires the imagination of the inhabitants of those territories, and makes them enthusiasts for France.......... The Briton has a horror of the obvious. If the ineptitude of the present administration in India is brought to his notice directly, in simple unvarnished form, he is inclined to disbelieve the tale; but tell him that the Indians are so incensed that there is an actual fall in the imports of British goods in India, and his eyes get opened. It is notorious that on the subject of indentured labour, the view that strikes him most forcibly, is that the pockets of his cousins the Colonists will be heavily and suddenly pinched, if he interferes with it, not the Indian view about the gross insult to Indian womanhood. If we, Indians, have to prosecute any propaganda work in England, we have to take into full account this British horror of the obvious.......... A point more, before we conclude. Young India must clearly understand that in the ultimate resort it is not the Briton who rules either himself or India. It is his oligarchy.......... It is of the ignorance and the obstructive tendency of the British oligarchy in India, that we Indians, must convince the Briton in England."

Comments on the orders of the Central Provinces Director of Public instructions for watching the conduct of students.

Mahrdtta (5), 4th Mar.

33. Referring to certain instructions issued by the Director of Public Instruction, Central Provinces, to Head Masters of Schools to keep a watch on the conduct of students, the Mahrdtta says:—"How can the Head Master do this except by making a division in the boy's camp and employing a corps of raw pupil-detectives to watch and report the doings of their brother school-fellows? The Central Provinces Government has issued instructions which prohibit not only attendance at a political meeting, but goes much further. They prohibit 'participation in any form of political agitation whatsoever or in arrangements connected with political meetings, whether prior to or subsequent to such meetings'. What this means in practice is that the right of the parent to guide his son in his extra-school activities is rudely taken away and vested in the Head Master who if he falls in entirely with the queer views of the Government will be a terrible tyrant with a force of boy spies at his disposal. These boy-spies are likely to consider—and likely to be taught to consider—their spying duty as the most important one falling to their lot and in their zealous discharge of this duty are likely to pay little attention to their studies. Their promotion will come about in spite of their unfitness as students if they satisfy the 'school authorities' in their 'detective' capacity. Thus will the schools be places of an unhealthy atmosphere, teaching nothing but spying......... We have indicated above the dangers of a successful execution of the order by a teacher falling in with the views of the Government. But we have our doubts in regard to the carrying out of the ludicrous circular. We expect that many Head Masters will refuse to take up the spying upon themselves and resign their posts. We expect that many others will be very slack in their performance of the new un-teacherlike unwholesome task—and will in due course (as a result of police reports) be made to resign their posts. So if Government insists on making spying the chief function of the school-teacher, Central Provinces schools will soon be manned by new teachers specially chosen for their spying enthusiasm. How will the parents and guardians act under these circumstances? There are two ways: One is to submit to the hard conditions and teach the boys—sons or wards at home to think ungenerously about a Government that bars them from learning patriotism by participation in public meetings. The other is to make a united protest boycotting the schools until the circular is taken back. We don't know which way will recommend itself generally to the parents and guardians of Central Provinces boys. We have an idea, however, that the first one will be followed in many homes. And if it is followed in right earnest, the intention of the circular will be frustrated. How will the Government of Central Provinces prevent parents and guardians from following the first method of counteracting the effects of the prohibition circular? But where was the necessity for the order? What is happening in Central Provinces? Nothing dangerous so far as we know. The Home Rule Movement is the only movement against which the Central Provinces Government can be supposed to be acting by the circular under notice. This movement is a unique one in that all repression and attempt at repression, direct or indirect, serves and can serve—only to spread it with more speed. This does not seem to be realised by the authorities."

Kesari (95), 27th Feb.

34. It is well-known that most of the provinces have not adopted the famous Risley Circular. This Circular was so comprehensive that it was almost impossible to give effect to it. Its universal application would have involved an enormous increase in the police force and the taking over by school masters of the functions of the C. I. D. This question has lately cropped up again in the Central Provinces. The Maháráshtra of 21st February publishes an account of a private meeting which is both interesting and instructive. Both officials and private individuals were present at the meeting where the Circular was fully discussed. It was adversely criticised by Europeans and Indians alike. Dr. Robertson, Principal of the Hislop College, declared that the Circular was vague and that it was very difficult to enforce it. How could the boys, he asked, be expected to respect their teachers if the latter spy upon them? Another European Professor of the same College argued that teachers could not legitimately be entrusted with the duty of maintaining discipline among boys out of school hours. After some discussion the Educational Inspector who presided gave a vague assurance that he would communicate to the Chief Commissioner the opinions expressed at the meeting. In our opinion the question of the attendance of students at public meetings should be solved by Government and the guardians of the boys in any way they like, but the poor teachers should not be needlessly involved in it. We agree with our contemporary the Maháráshtra that parents are more anxious about the welfare of their children than Government.

The duty of Indians not to embarrass Government at the present juncture by political agitation.

Political Bhomiyo (new), 2nd Mar.

35. The Political Bhomiyo dwells at great length on the duty of not embarrassing Government at the present juncture by political agitation, public discussion of grievances, and pressing Government to grant such privileges as Swarajya, free and compulsory education, equal rights with the Colonials, abolition of indentured labour, etc. It alludes to the large number of public meetings held in support of such demands and remarks that in doing so the Indian public make an unfair use of the rights they possess as British subjects, of demanding concessions from Government. It then goes on to exhort the Indians as follows:—The present is not the time for making demands but for rendering all possible help. If you are really loyal to Government, refrain entirely from making demands. Do not embarrass or confuse Government at the present crisis by making one demand after another. To tell the truth, you want to take advantage of the present situation of Government. Is this proper? Should you render help or annoy Government at such a critical time? Why do you want to lose the confidence which Government placed in you and which has been redoubled by the help rendered and loyalty displayed by you in this war? It behoves you to give up your present activities. Therein lies the true good of all parties. Government should remember that the demands made by the various meetings that are being held at present are not the demands of the mass of the general public but only of certain agitators who have made a name for themselves by their learning and oratory. We tell you (Indians) again and again that the path you have chosen is not the royal road, but it is one beset with thorns and thistles which will lead you not to the kingly palace but to the dens of the lions. We speak thus because we see that in such a course lies the good of India as well as that of the Indian Government.

The new Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 3rd Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 1st Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 2nd Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 2nd Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 3rd Mar.

36. The Bombay Samachár characterises the Budget recently presented by the Honourable Sir William Meyer to the Imperial Legislative Council as a really popular one. It remarks that it constitutes the brighest page in the financial history of India and believes that the Indian public will receive it with acclamation. It expresses its satisfaction at the manner in which the Finance Minister has proposed to raise the additional revenue required, without imposing any fresh burden upon the people. The paper congratulates Sir William and thanks him and the Viceroy for the deep sympathy they have evinced for the Indian public by refraining from increasing the salt duty. It wishes that those concerns and businesses which have earned large profits on account of the conditions created by the war had been made to bear their share of the new burden. It regards the raising of the import duty on piece-goods as a concession to the popular demand and considers it to be the most welcome feature of the new Budget. It remarks that the abstention from making a corresponding increase in the excise duty on indigenous cotton goods will be regarded not only as an act of justice to India and her important mill industry, but it will materially help that industry to flourish even after the war. [The Sánj Vartamán observes that the Finance Minister has been scrupulously careful not to impose any fresh burden of new taxation upon the poor and that, therefore, the present Budget will prove highly popular. It also strongly believes that the increase in the import duty on foreign piece-goods will be highly appreciated by the public. It trusts that the contribution of one hundred million pounds which Government propose to make on behalf of India to His Majesty's Government as her share in the war expenditure will be regarded by all as a substantial one, regard being had to India's pecuniary position and resources. The Praja Mitra and Pársi considers the raising of the import duty on piece-goods to be the first step towards the grant of financial autonomy for which India is so anxious It declares that the Finance Minister has exhibited great far-sightedness and has earned the blessings of the poor by not enhancing the existing duty on salt. It remarks that India's proposed war contribution is calculated to maintain her prestige in the eyes of the wold. The Jám-e-Jamshed regards the Budget as extremely satisfactory. It observes that no loyal Indian will grudge, in the slightest degree, the help India has volunteered to render to England in meeting the expenditure in the present war. The paper remarks that the Indians have placed this slight gift at the feet of England with feelings of overflowing gratitude. The Akhbár-e-Islám also writes in a similar strain in appreciation of the new Budget.]

Mahrátta (5), 4th Mar.

37. "The Finance Minister has discharged his onerous duties in a laudable manner. He has avoided the temptation of enhancing the salt tax or levying a special cess on land and has tried to distribute the burden amongst the richer classes. Further, we have the satisfaction of seeing an important principle conceded in the doubling of the import duty on cotton fabrics. The educational grant, very modest though it be, is another item for satisfaction. The most prominent item of all is, of course, the announcement of the new princely gift of India. India has till now contributed in men and money and material in a lavishly liberal manner. And the new gift, added to the help already given to the Empire, ought to awaken in the British statesmen a genuine sympathy for the aspirations of India. Time will show how far our self-sacrificing liberality has appealed to our masters! Whatever other effects our generous attitude and actions in these anxious times of war may or may not produce, they undoubtedly have this one most satisfactory effect. They stiffen our attitude in regard to the one question which is agitating enlightened India and compelling the attention of the masses—the question of Home Rule. The more liberally we give, the stronger becomes our claim to receive our rights. Thus work our minds, and this working, we repeat, is the most satisfactory effect of Indian contributions to the war.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council on the working of the Defence of India Act.

Hindusthán (17), 26th Feb.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 28th Feb.

38. Commenting upon the debate that took place in the Imperial Legislative Council over the resolution brought by the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy on the subject of the administration of the Defence of India Act, the Hindusthán endorses the complaint raised by the Honourable member against the present procedure under which evidence is collected against a person for his offence or supposed offence after his being interned under the said Act. It also believes that the Criminal Investigation Department wields an authority higher than that of the Courts of law inasmuch as it can arrest and intern a person immediately on his stepping out of a law court after having been declared innocent. The paper expresses itself in favour of appointing advisory committees as suggested by the Honourable Mr. Chanda to consider cases falling within the purview of the Act. It then refers to the statement made by Sir Reginald Craddock to the effect that no case could be pointed out in which a person was unjustifiably arrested and remarks that the elected members are not so foolish as to waste the time of the Council with such propositions and amendments if they were not convinced of the correctness of their position. It cannot comprehend what weighty reasons prompted Government to reject the original proposition as well as the Honourable Mr. Chanda's amendments which were brought in the Council in order to remove the belief correctly or incorrectly entertained by the public that the Defence of India Act is being administered in an arbitrary and unjustifiable manner. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi dwells on the desirability on the part of Government of taking such measures as would remove any false notions entertained by the public with regard to the working of the Act. It observes that the declaration made by Mr. Tilak and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal that they never intended to go to Delhi or the Punjáb and that Government had been put on the wrong scent in issuing the prohibitory orders against them under the Defence of India Act has created misapprehension even among well-informed circles. Is it desirable, inquires the paper, that such misapprehension should remain permanently in the minds of the public? It is of opinion that as suggested by the Honourable members, Government would do well to employ means to reconcile the public mind in connection with this subject.]

Comments on the Honourable Sir Shankar Nair's opposition to free and compulsory primary education in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 3rd Mar.

39. The Dnyán Prakásh characterises the Honourable Sir Shankar Nair's speech in opposing the Honourable Mr. Sarma's motion in favour of free and compulsory primary education as most disappointing, and observes that though he was bound to oppose the motion as its principle has not yet found favour with Government, it was surprising that he should have done so on the ground that there had been no distinct demand on the part of the public for such a step being taken. It argues that when measures of a compulsory character are to be undertaken, Government does not wait for a public demand in that behalf, but at the same time points out that the Indian public have already pronounced themselves in favour of compulsory primary education as they have done in no other matter. It, therefore, regrets that the Honourable Sir Shankar Nair should, as the representative of the Imperial Government, have gone out of his way to speak against Indian aspirations.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Sastri's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council on the subject of the Calcutta University Commission.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 24th Feb.

40. Dwelling upon the urgency of tackling various problems affecting University education in India and referring to the proposition brought by the Honourable Mr. Shrinivas Shastri urging the desirability of asking the Commission proposed to be appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Calcutta University to include the Bombay, Madras, Punjáb and Allahabad Universities within the scope of its inquiry, the Sánj Vartamán remarks that the whole of India endorses the demand made by the Honourable member. It expresses dissatisfaction at the reasons given on behalf of Government for the rejection of the proposition and regrets that Government have not accepted this demand made by the public. The paper maintains that if the abovementioned Universities or the respective Provincial Governments did not make any such demand as was made by the Honourable Mr. Shastri, it was because their opinions in this connection were not invited by the Imperial Government. It further considers this silence on their part immaterial in view of the fact that the present demand had the support of the entire Indian public as could be seen from the strong backing up the proposition of Mr. Shastri received from the elected members of the Council. It expresses its disapprobation of the principle of accepting a suggestion only if it has emanated from a Provincial Government, pointing out that no demands were made by Provincial Governments in connection with the appointment of the Public Services and Industrial Commissions. The paper, in conclusion, suggests the appointment of a separate Commission composed of capable independent Englishmen to consider the questions affecting other Universities in India.

Comments on the resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council requiring one month's notice before the introduction of a private Bill in the Council.

Gujaráti (13), 25th Feb.

41. In the opinion of the Gujaráti it was a sorry blunder on the part of the Honourable Mr. Bhupendranath Basu to have supported the resolution moved by Government prohibiting non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council from bringing any Bill before it unless they have submitted to Government the full text of the bill, with the statement objects and reasons, one month prior to moving it and Government have granted permission to do so. The paper considers it rather anomalous that non-official members should be required to give one month's notice before moving a particular Bill instead of one of three days as heretofore, while Government can bring in a measure at any time and can even get it passed at a single sitting, when Bills brought in by elected members have to pass regularly through the various stages of discussion laid down by the regulations. It maintains that by the passing of the present resolution even the privilege of entering into a preliminary discussion of the objects of a Bill hitherto enjoyed by the elected members will depend upon the fact of Government granting the necessary permission.

Comments on the Secretary of State's reply to the Government of India's despatch of 1915 on Indentured labour.
Message (6), 28th Feb.

42. "The light-hearted reply of the Secretary of State to the Government of India Despatch of 15th October 1915 on the question of Indentured Labour cannot but rouse the keenest indignation in this country. It is an outrage on the national feelings and sentiments of the people of this country, whose honour is assailed by the infamous system.......... The infamy of the system has been recognized by the Government in this country and by the Secretary of State himself. It is remarkable, therefore, that the latter should presume to tell the Government of India that 'the recommendation you have made for the abolition of the indenture system is one for which I had not been prepared by a perusal of the correspondence that followed the report of the Sanderson Committee.' But is he prepared to do so in the light of what has taken place since? 'No.' On the other hand we have his statement in the House of Commons on Thursday last that 'he was glad to say that the condition of indentured labourers had been greatly ameliorated by recent changes in the Colonial laws.' Mr. Chamberlain paid a tribute 'to the spirit in which Colonial administration had met the Imperial Government in the matter.' It is indeed remarkable that the great Mogul at the India Office should be cow-towing to the petty little administrations of the Crown Colonies. And for what? For their extreme generosity in abolishing the imprisonment of a freeman and an equal subject if he wished to change one absentee employer machine for another? What appears even more remarkable is the utter ignorance of Mr. Chamberlain in regard to the recent development of Indian feeling in this matter. Are we to understand from this display of ignorance by the Secretary of State that the Government of India has failed to keep him duly apprised of what is going on in this country or has the Secretary of State wilfully ignored what he has been apprised of in order to obtain the goodwill of the 'Colonial administration'?......... In his reply, the Secretary of State reluctantly admits that the 'growing feeling in India must be accepted as a fact,' but he seems to labour under the belief that this feeling is due 'to a confusion between the Dominions that exclude free Indian emigrants and the Colonies that still import indentured labour.' It is the obvious duty of the Government of India to tell the 'know-nothing' Secretary of State that there is not and there cannot be any confusion in the Indian mind. The Indian mind is distinctly clear as to what is the issue and will not rest until that issue is decided in the only way that is acceptable to it, and that is consistent with the national honour and sense of self-respect of this country. We want no more belittling of that honour.......... The Government of India must realise that it is here no more to tinker with the sense of self-respect of a whole people, simply because it would suit the convenience of the Colonial planters, who, thanks to the obliging nature of the party politician who is at the helm of the Government of India in England and the Government on the spot, have persuaded themselves to think that they can, and have a right to, buy as much Indian humanity as they can through the unscrupulous agency of recruiting agents, under the ægis of an obliging Government. Whatever its sins of commission and omission in the past, the Government of India must now stand up for the down-trodden rights of Indians and emphatically tell the Secretary of State that it is no longer here to countenance the legalised sale of the free and equal subjects of His Majesty by perpetuating for however short time a system of serfdom. It must frankly and unequivocally tell him that in view of what has taken place since its despatch of October 1915, it is not at all prepared to advocate the policy of co-operation with the Colonial Office—co-operation not for ending this disgraceful blot on the British administration in India but for mending it, 'with due consideration to the interests of the Colonies affected.' There can be no mending, no compromise whatever. And unless the Government of India wants to drive the people of this country to the last constitutional resort, which is open to a helpless people, we expect that it will give its solid, unwavering support to the demand of the people and get the system ended by the 31st May 1917, the date which the people have with characteristic generosity agreed upon. If the Government fails to bring home to the dull comprehension of the burra sahib of the India Office the full strength of the feeling in this country, it will stand condemned in the eyes of God and man for a grave omission, whose consequences are not very alluring to contemplate."

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's statement in Parliament with regard to the question of Indian indentured labour.

Young India (11), 28th Feb.

43. Referring to Mr. Chamberlain's recent statement in Parliament on the subject of indentured labour, Young India declares that it is characterised by callousness towards the feelings of the vast mass of people in this country. Mr. Chamberlain, thinks the paper, ought by now to know the depth of feeling aroused on this subject, and it is his duty to see that the infamy is not perpetrated again. It then continues:—"There cannot be a more humiliating spectacle than that of a member of the British Ministry bowing before the petty Colonial administrations, in all gratitude for small favours shown. Is the India Office then so impotent that it must needs go on its knees before the planting interests of the Crown Colonies and beseech their pleasure for the abolition of an indisputably pernicious system, a system that degrades men and women, may be coloured men and women, to the level of beasts? Mr. Chamberlain must realise at once that Indian opinion is no longer prepared to tolerate the continuance of the system, be it for a short length of time.......... So far as we, the people of India are concerned, we will not submit any more to this shameful treatment which exalts the sordid interest of unscrupulous exploiters of human labour above all considerations of justice and righteousness. If the Secretary of State thinks that the security of his seat in Parliament will be jeopardised by his taking up the matter in all earnestness on behalf of the voiceless millions of this land, and he, therefore, fails to act up to the true interests of the country, the people will be compelled to resort to the only alternative that lies before them and that is to offer a kind of 'Passive Resistence' and make it impossible for the unscrupulous recruiting agents, in this land, of the moneyed planters to spirit away our unfortunate brothers and sisters. Mahatma Gandhi's words are still ringing in our ears as if they were being now uttered. 'Remember the 31st May 1917', he said in his deep, emphatic voice at the Excelsior Theatre, 'you have taken great responsibility'. If we fail to realise our responsibility and allow our ignorant and illiterate people to be sold into slavery, we shall be answerable to God and man for our acts of omission."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 28th Feb.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 26th Feb.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 27th Feb.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 26th Feb.

44. The Bombay Samáchár expresses its disapproval of the reply of the Secretary of State for India to the despatch of the Government of India on the subject of indentured labour. In its opinion the slight changes which the Colonies importing indentured labour have made for the improvement of the lot of the Indians and with which the Indian Secretary appears to be satisfied will neither remedy the anomalous character of the indenture system nor will they be likely to allay the strong feeling aroused in the public mind in connection with this subject. It maintains that so long as the question of the self-respect of the Indians which is involved in the present system remains unsolved, any commendation of the Colonies' readiness to co-operate with His Majesty's Government in the tackling of the Indian labour question, as was indulged in by the Secretary of State in the House of Commons, would be too premature from the Indian point of view. The paper believes that the confusion which the Secretary in his abovementioned reply charges the Indians of making between the question of indentured labour and the question of the prohibition of free Indian immigration to some of the Dominons really exists in his own mind inasmuch as the Indians, though they attach more importance to the former question as affecting their national self-respect, keep both these questions quite apart. It concludes with wishing that Lord Chelmsford will place before the Secretary of State the Indian feelings on the subject in their true perspective and remove this delusion from his mind. [The Sánj Vartamán remarks that the public will be sorry to read the Secretary of State's reply. It regrets to declare that he has failed to comprehend why the Indians are so keen on urging the total abolition of the indenture system at an early date. It expresses dissatisfaction at Mr. Chamberlain's solicitude for safeguarding the interests of the Colonies. The paper believes that the Indian public will not consent to the continuance of the present system till another more satisfactory one is introduced. The Jám-e-Jamshed wants to know if the feelings expressed on the subject in public meetings held at numerous places in India have been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State and the British authorities. The anxiety of the British authorities to please the Colonials and safeguard their interests leads the paper to infer that the Conference which is going to be held in May to consider the question of indentured immigration will only result in protecting the interests of the Colonies. It wishes that in that Conference the Secretary of State may give the question of protecting Indian interests precedence over all other considerations. The Praja Mitra and Pársi remarks that the Colonial Secretary is competent enough to safeguard the interests of the Colonies and that what Indians have often to regret the most is that the Indian Secretary who is appointed to protect the interests of India plays the role of an advocate of the opponents of Indian interests. It observes that the belief of the Secretary that the immorality among the Indian labourers in the Colonies is due to the recruiters collecting women of an undesirable type is mistaken and regrettable and asks, if that be the truth, how is the very large proportion of suicides among them to be accounted for. The paper believes that all the Indian difficulties would disappear if the Secretary of State for India would present a bold front and once for all let the Colonies know through the Colonial Secretary that effective steps would henceforth be taken to deal out the same treatment to the white colonial settlers in India as is accorded to the Indians in these Colonies.]

Message (6), 28th Feb.; Rást Goftár* (28), 4th Mar., Eng. cols.

45. "Readers are aware that Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Willingdon have lately been visiting Baroda and other Native States. On this occasion, in two of the States—Baroda and Rajpipla—'the catering has been in charge of the able and popular manager of the Taj Mahal Hotel.' 'Some idea of the extensive arrangements involved', says the paragraph in a morning contemporary, 'may be gathered from the fact that four-head-waiters, one head cook and two assistant cooks, three hamals, 15 waiters and five wine waiters, were despatched by the Gujarat Mail last Wednesday, while a similar detachment left on Friday for Rájpipla, while the functions for which these two small armies had to cater included a banquet for 60 persons and breakfast, lunch and dinner on two days at Baroda, breakfast, lunch and tea at the shooting camp, and a banquet for 40 persons at Rájpipla.' While it no doubt reflects on the popularity of the Taj management, we are constrained to ask why those who are in a position to set a better example to society should tolerate this puerile extravagance. And having done that, is it necessary to advertise that fact broad-cast? If really there was so much money to throw away on fleeting pleasures in employing 'two small armies' to cater for a day or two's convenience which could have been easily given up, would not that money have been better spent in giving it away to some War Fund? There is at present before the public the appeal from Mrs. Abbott, the representative of the Scottish Women's Hospitals. These good women are admittedly doing excellent work in attending to the relief of the sick and the wounded. When such useful institutions are going abegging for more public support, why should not those who lead set a better example of practising strict economy and giving away the saving to those institutions which are in urgent need of help? At least His Excellency ought to give society in the city and the Presidency a better lead." [The Rást Goftár, on the other hand, though it declares that there is much room for economy in the expenditure incurred in gubernatorial tours in the various provinces of India, dwells on the utility of these tours and urges that reduction in expenditure should not be carried so far as to mar the benefits to be derived from a closer acquaintance between the rulers and the ruled. It then continues:—"During their recent sojourn in Baroda, Their Excel-besides, the Governor and his consort, have seen, for example, enough to direct their thoughts to beneficial channels. After all which Their Excellencies saw and learned and the friendships that were cultivated on the tour, who can say that the expenses incurred on these tours are simply frittered away without any return in kind to the people of the State?"]

Comments on the Bombay Excise Administration Report for the year 1915-16.
Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 26th Feb.

46. Commenting upon the Excise Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1915-16 and referring to the contention of the opponents of the Abkári policy of Government that the reduction in the strength of country liquor, instead of keeping down its consumption, has only resulted in increasing Government revenue, the Jám-e-Jamshed remarks that the authorities should institute an inquiry into the subject and that they should revert to the former system if the present reduction in the strength of country liquor has, as a matter of fact, resulted in enhancing its consumption. It declares that Government should place considerations of public health above those of revenue. It expresses gratification at the rise in the consumption of toddy in some districts of the Presidency during the year under report and, with a view to prevent adulteration of toddy, suggests that some measures should be devised for examining toddy at the shops where it is sold for ensuring its purity on the lines of the systematic examination of the liquor sold in country liquor-shops carried out by Excise Inspectors. In view of the high prices of sugar and treacle prevailing at present, the paper commends the action taken by the Abkári Commissioner in permitting the manufacture of treacle out of toddy though the carrying on of this industry on a large scale is likely to affect adversely the Abkári revenues.

Suggestion for starting salt depôts in the Ratnágiri District as has been done in the Punjáb.
Satya Shodhak (104), 25th Feb.

47. The abnormal rise in the price of salt in the Ratnágiri District is pressing very heavily upon the poor. It is now almost on the same level as that of rice. We will not attempt to explain the cause of this scarcity, but humbly suggest a remedy for the consideration of Government. They should open depôts for the distribution of salt at reasonable price to consumers. Similar scarcity was lately experienced in the Punjáb and Government have consequently decided to open depôts of salt there. Government recognise the necessity of making salt available to the people in sufficient quantities. Instead of relying on dealers, therefore, they should take up the question of distribution themselves. The population on the western coast mainly depends for its supply of salt on the uncertain movements of small country craft. We invite the attention of Government to this matter and trust that they will soon open depôts in the Ratnágiri District to ensure a regular and plentiful supply of salt.

The Defence of India Act and the Police.
Indu Prakásh (36), 24th Feb.

48. The Public Services Commission has recommended that the majority of higher appointments in the Police force should be filled by Europeans. This shows that in spite of our numerous sacrifices in the present war the Commissioners, and indirectly the Government, are still sceptical about our devotion to the British Empire. This attitude is particularly unsatisfactory when responsible statesmen declare that Britain has now changed her 'angle of vision' in respect of our aspirations. We are sure the operation of the Defence of India Act would have been more satisfactory if there were more Indians holding higher appointments in the police. In order to show their smartness the lower ranks in the police who are generally an ignorant lot report any rumours they hear to their European officers whose knowledge of the vernaculars is necessarily imperfect. They in their turn pass on their information to the higher authorities and thus the law is eventually set in motion on information which, to say the least, is most un-reliable. If Government are bent upon not removing the Act from the Statute book they should be very careful to see that it does not involve any unnecessary hardship. In our opinion this object can only be attained if at least half the higher appointments in the Police are held by Indians. We are sure Government will then get more trustworthy information and then there will arise no necessity for enforcing the Defence of India Act.

Comments on the policy of the new non-Brahmin paper Justice issued at Madras.

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 3rd Mar.

49. Referring to the new daily paper Justice started in Madras on behalf of the non-Brahmins in Southern India, the Dnyán Prakásh says that though the editor has announced that the paper is intended for the elevation of the backward classes and not for dragging down the advanced communities, there appear to be strong grounds, from the tone adopted by the paper in the issues already published, for the apprehension that it is sure to come in the way of the political advancement of the country. It points out in support of this view that the paper has expressed itself in opposition even to the suggestion for an increase in the number of Indian Fellows in the Madras University Senate and has also indirectly disapproved of the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Rajgopalachariar to the Madras Executive Council. It expresses its apprehension that the paper will only serve to further embitter the relations between the different castes.

EDUCATION.

If the Englishmen in India were to part with their authority in educational matters to Indians the results would be marvellous.

Sind Journal (9), 17th Feb.

50. "We are sorrowfully reminded of the fact that western education as it is imparted in the schools and colleges of today, is an exotic plant foreign to the soil of India. We find some glaring defects of the system, which will be the first evils to be remedied if the heads of the Education Department were Indians. At first sight, we find that the status of the teacher has considerably gone down. The fault is not of the student but of the system.......... Unfortunately for the country our educational authorities are blind to the spirit of the East and its ideals and consequently this degradation of the teacher and the waning of the ancient splendour. Let natives control the affairs of the department. Let the European authorities sacrifice voluntarily the leading strings and transfer their power to their Indian brethren and lo! the change will be simply marvellous. What stronger demonstration of the ability of Indian educationists do we require than the wonderful work of the institutions organised and founded by the Arya Samaj such as Gurukula of Hardwár, Rabindranath Tagore's school in Bengal and several other institutions managed by Indians in the Madras Presidency? We realize that progress is the natural result when the leading strings are entrusted to Indians. A system of education will then be substituted which will conduce to the prosperity of the family and of the nation, which will raise the intellectual and spiritual status of the nation and restore her to her ancient place of glory and splendour when she shone among the nations of the world. Political liberation, social salvation and intellectual emancipation of the nation can then alone be attained when Indians have a hold on the sacred as well as the secular education of the nation."

Muhammadans and the question of compulsory primary education in Bombay.

Muslim Herald (123), 2nd Mar.

51. The Muslim Herald discusses the expediency of making primary education free and compulsory in Bombay, and besides repeating the old arguments against the proposed measure such as the fact of young boys earning at least a part of their living of which compulsory educatiotion will deprive them, the paper is anxious to be enlightened on the point as to whether recalcitrant boys and girls will, under the scheme, be taken away forcibly by the peons to the schools. It is of opinion that that might be suitable in the case of boys, but that Muhammadan parents at least are not prepared to see that peons should lay hands on their daughters, and that the employment of means such as the one indicated above might cause a riot similar to that which took place when patients suffering from plague were compulsorily segregated.

The D. J. Sind College principalship.

Sind Advocate (8), 15th Feb.

52. "The College Board resolved the other day to inform Government that Mr. Hampton, whose services the Government wanted to lend to the Sind College, not being the History and Economics man, would not be useful as a Professor and that Government might therefore select another man. Is it right, is it decent, to insist on the appointment of a European, when the man, is required only during the pendency of the war, after which Mr. Ludlow, the permanent Vice-Principal now at the front, is to succeed to the Principalship? Professor S. C. Shahani who is now acting as Principal is, from all credible accounts, doing excellently well and in these days when there is so much talk and so much promise of a much larger employment of Indian talent in higher offices in their own country, it is, to say the least, very depressing to find the Sind College Board or the Government grudging even a temporary Principalship to an Indian—an Indian too who has served the college for a lifetime, and an Indian who not only possesses the requisite academic qualifications but who has proved his fitness in a practical manner.......... We believe Professor Shahani is a History and Economics man and if one like him cannot be entrusted by Government with the charge of the college and that even temporarily, then farewell to all hopes of Indians getting anything like their due. We are being told that after the war, there is sure to be a rich recognition of Indian talent and ability. But does this mean that during the war when Europeans are not even easy to spare, the talented Indians are to be parsimoniously dealt with?"

A Moslem complaint about God being styled "mother and father" in one of the lessons in the Third Gujarati Reader.

Sánj Vartmán (29), 23rd and 28th Feb.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 1st Mar.

53. In the course of a letter addressed to the Sánj Vartamán one Saiyed Pirmia Badamia, an assistant teacher in Minara Masjid School, Bombay, invites the attention of the Muhammadans to the fifth line of lesson 8th in Book III of the Gujarati Readers Series. The lesson is a short poem in praise of God and the line taken exceptian to if rendered into English would run "Oh, God, you are my mother and father". He raises the question whether a Moslem student can call God his father and mother without being guilty of Shirk (belief in a plurality of deities) which is the greatest of sins according to the tenets of Islam. He also refers to the second line on the third page of the first book of the Urdu Readers Series issued by the Anjuman-e-Himayat-ul-Islam of Lahore, which says "The Lord has got no parents nor is He the father of any one" and asks the Muhammadans to consider what confusion would be created by such conflicting notions about the Creator in the minds of their young children. The writer also refers to the Surat-e-Ekhlas (a chapter in the Holy Koran) which among other things says "God is one. He need not supplicate anybody. He gave birth to none nor anybody gave him birth nor has he got any relations." He observes that it is the duty of every Muhammadan to bring the line in the Third Gujarati Reader to the notice of the Vernacular Text-Books Revision Committee with a view to getting it suitably altered. He concludes with exhorting Moslem leaders to save hundreds of thousands of Muhammadan children from the sin of Shirk by getting the necessary alteration made in the poem as soon as possible. [In its issue of the 28th February the paper publishes the substance of a communication from a correspondent describing the proceedings of a meeting of the Anjuman-e-Islam, Ránder, held on the 26th February, in which meeting a resolution was passed requesting Government to get a suitable alteration made in the line above referred to in the Third Gujarati Reader. It was stated in support of the resolution that the said line was likely to create an impression antagonistic to the tenets of Islam upon the tender minds of Moslem children, who ran the risk of committing Shirk by reading such matter, and also to injure the religious feeling of the Muhammadans. The communication also states that the Honourable Saiyed El Edrus is going to put a question in this connection in the local Legislative Council. The Akhbár-e-Islám also publishes a substance of this communication.]

RAILWAYS.

Treatment of high class Indian railway passengers by Europeans.
Mahrdtta (5), 4th Mar.

54. Referring to the reported case of some members of the family of the Honourable Nawab Chowdhari having been ejected from a first class railway compartment in Bengal by Mr. Ross, S. D. O., the Mahrdtta gives the following quotation from Sir Henry Cotton's book New India:—" There are few Indian gentlemen even of the highest rank who have not had experience of gross insults when travelling by railway because Englishmen object to sit in the same carriage with a native. This form of insolence generally takes the shape of forcible ejection with all goods and chattle. In a Times review of the Leaves from the diaries of a soldier and sportsman by the late Sir Montagu Gerard, I read as follows:—A subaltern gets into a railway carriage where to his disgust he finds a couple of Hindu gentlemen. He quietly waits till the train is in motion and then as he expressed it 'fires them out of the door'. A petty Rajah going on a state visit to Agra, takes his seat in a first class compartment, with a magnificent send-off by his loyal subjects. On his return he sneaks out of the third class and explains to the expectant crowds that on the former occasion he had been boxed up with a couple of sahebs muddy from snipeshooting, who had made him shampoo them all the way." [The paper remarks:—" This was written before 1907, but the insolence, this incident reminds us, has not died out and the officer, be it remembered, is of the rank of an S. D. O. While such S. D. O.'s and other white men go about insulting Indians, all talk of mutual good understanding and closer relations is futile. We hope the Honourable Nawab will take the necessary steps and bring to book this truculent officer and show that Indians cannot brook such insults any longer."]

A Railway complaint.
Message (6), 28th Feb.

55. " We have received a complaint to the effect that an Indian lady passenger was not admitted in the 2nd class Ladies' Compartment, though she possessed the necessary ticket. The obstruction in this case came from a European lady. The guard was requested to interfere, but he would not. The gentleman accompanying the lady—his wife—asked the lady passenger inside why she did not admit the Indian lady, but the former refused to give any reason. There was room for three passengers more in that compartment. The gentleman could not enter the ladies compartment, the lady was too much afraid of the European amazon to assert her right and the guard would not interfere. The correspondent asks us what he ought to have done in the matter to secure a seat in the ladies' compartment for his wife. We simply refer him to the railway authorities and give publicity to the affair only because, we think, it is typical of several such cases."

MUNICIPALITIES.

A complaint against the Chairman of the Notified Area Committees of Santa Cruz, Borivli, etc. (Thána).
Gujaráti (13), 4th Mar., Eng. cols.

56. " The newly appointed executive officers of the bigger municipalities are fairly on the way to become the dictators and over-lords of their masters but Government pay little attention to such complaints. The Notified Area Committees, dominated as they are by officials and nominated members, furnish one more illustration of the way in which high officials think it fair and proper to discharge their duties. These bodies are formed under the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act by Government for some of the rising suburbs like Santa Cruz, Andheri, Goregaum, Malad, Borivli, and other places. Towns and villages separated by a distance of more than one mile of uninhabited land must have a Committee of their own according to law and one Committee for all these suburbs is not allowable. But all these Committees have one Assistant Collector, one Mamlatdar, and one Magistrate as a permanent feature of their personnel, while the two other members are nominated by Government from amongst the local landholders. The Committees, so formed and officialised, command no confidence of the public. The nominated members, even if they [illegible] to be independent and courageous, are always in a minority and therefore practically powerless to represent the wants and wishes of the ratepayers and safeguard their interests. But the most extraordinary feature of the working of these Committees is that the Assistant Collector, who is their ex-officio Chairman, thinks that his own convenience is the supreme consideration. He has his office at Palli Hill, Bandra, which is two miles distant from the Bandra station. The rate payers have to go to this office for paying their annual tax, obtaining forms of applications for permission to build or repair their buildings or for getting any business done in connection with their lands or houses. Several ratepayers have been served with notices, calling upon them to urge their objections against the increased letting value put upon their houses and bungalows. The Chairman has intimated that the objections must be urged in person and not in writing, though written objections are quite permissible under the Act. The notices issued by the Chairman are, therefore, illegal and calculated to entail a good deal of hardship upon the ratepayers who are required to spend money on railway fare and carriage hire and expected to run the risk of having to wait for some hours and attend some other day, if all the cases are not disposed of on one and the same day......... The absurdity and cruelty of calling upon all house-owners including professional and businessmen and officials to attend at Palli Hill at 8 or 9-30 A.M. must be patent to all fair-minded persons, though not to the Notified Area Committees with the Assistant Collector for their Chairman. Why they cannot condescend to meet at different suburbs and listen to the grievances and objections of their respective ratepayers altogether passes our comprehension. Such a reasonable procedure used to be followed before. As a matter of fact, when the houses and bungalows were assessed years ago, written objections were allowed to be urged and Mr. Turner visited the towns in order to give a personal audience to the house-owners. But now that sensible procedure seems to have become very antiquated and it is regarded as more just and reasonable to force all people to attend at the bungalow of the Chairman at a very inconvenient time and at considerable expense and trouble only to see their objections rejected in almost all cases......... Indignant protests have already appeared in the press. Some ratepayers have, we are informed, complained to the Chairman in writing but he has not condescended to give them any reply whatsoever! And yet we are told that educated Indians feel no sympathy for their less fortunate countrymen and that it is the alien officials whose hearts go out for them!......... We think the present anomalous and selfish system of administering the affairs of the suburbs from the Chairman's comfortable bungalow at Palli Hill ought to be put an end to as soon as possible and that the Notified Area Committees made to understand that the ratepayers are not created for them but that they are constituted for the sake of the ratepayers and that they ought to consult the convenience and interests of hundreds of people rather than the convenience and comfort of their Chairman. We understand that the nominated members are themselves dissatisfied with the present system but are altogether powerless. The two official members have of course no opinion of their own in the presence of the Assistant Collector and that the latter is the supreme master of the whole situation. This is what is called local self-government within a few miles from Bombay and such is the treatment meted out to ratepayers in spite of past precedents and of protests addressed to the Chairman and published in the press."

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

The Indian Defence Force.

Young India (11), 7th Mar.

1. In the course of the second instalment of his article in Young India on the Indian Defence Force, "V. R." writes:—"We are tempted to enquire why the Government of India should have wasted so much valuable time in drafting the Bill and then taking it through a number of meaningless formalities. Thanks to an over-generous legislature, it has obtained in the past unlimited power and authority by which it can commandeer, by the simple expedient of a Viceregal ordinance, the entire resources of India both in men and material. But then, we presume 'capitalistic imperialism' would not countenance that expedient in the present instance. Such a course, however, would have been preferable to bad legislation, from our own point of view. Those who have 'conceded' to Indian opinion would consider us guilty of 'ingratitude', if we express our keen disappointment at the outcome of the Bill so far as it concerns Indians. But it appears to us, in the light of what has taken place, that neither the Government of India nor the military authorities could be charged with being guilty of much earnestness in the matter of raising voluntary units of Indians outside those classes which furnish recruits to the Indian army. It seems a mere matter of expediency. For if compulsion had been applied to Europeans and all those who had to be brought within the definition of European British subject so as to ensure that 'persons who had undergone some form of military training at the expense of the State might aid the State at the time of need' and if Indians had been left out in the cold, there would surely have been bitter feeling and criticism, impossible to be ignored, particularly 'at the present juncture'. Assuming that the authorities were prompted by the best and highest motives, those motives have practically been nullified by the unhappy turn which subsequent events have given to the grudging measure of concession to Indian feeling and sentiment. It had been fondly expected that even if nothing were done to remove the bar of race under which we have been suffering for ever so long a time, it would not in common fairness, at least be accentuated. But because there was no 'Indian Abbott' before the select committee to god-father the forlorn cause of Indians, not only has the existing bar been maintained but also a new one added.......... What would be the exact position or status of Indians in this force is still shrouded in mystery. The Commander-in-Chief has not shown to the best advantage as a great tactician, at any rate in the Council, though in the Select Committee he succeeded with commensurate (?) skill in warding off the ineffectual blows of the Indian members.......... The choice that has now been offered to us is Hobson's choice. Whether we take the chance or leave it alone, we do not benefit much. Looked at from the point of view of self-interest, the Defence Force has no attractions to offer to us. But as Mr. Tilak opportunely told us at the mass meeting on Friday, we cannot regard it from the point of view of self-interest alone. There is the higher consideration of the duty we owe to the Motherland. The Force will, there is no doubt, be called upon to be ready for the defence of India against external aggression and if the instinct of patriotism is still left in us and if we are not altogether dead to the martial traditions of our past, this last consideration alone should suffice to inspire us to a worthy and fitting response to the call to arms. In responding in large numbers, it must be remembered that we are doing this both for the sake of the Government and in fulfilment of the duty to our Motherland. And this one consideration alone must prove of potent force in inspiring us to sacrifice personal interests and offering ourselves in large numbers with a generous sincerity for whatever service we may be called upon to perform. We view the chorus of approval which in the end greeted the passing of the Bill in this light and we trust the country will do the same and demonstrate to our rulers and to the world outside that in spite of disadvantages we can appreciate our responsibilities and rally round the defence of the Motherland. In [illegible] is the measure of our fitness for Home Rule. We are not children deceived by specious reasoning and shows of arguments; we are men who will march up to our posts of duty. We shall fight because the honour of our Mother is involved and where that comes in, all other considerations vanish."

Kesari (95), 6th Mar.; Dnyánodaya (33), 8th Mar.; Sandesh (103), 6th Mar.

2. We revert to the Indian Defence Force Bill which has now been passed into law. This measure materially differs from the Volunteers Act of 1869 which debars both Hindus and Muhammedans from enlisting as volunteers and does not repeal it. That disability still exists and Hindus and Muhammedans cannot get themselves enrolled as volunteers. Volunteers enlisted under the Act of 1869 undergo training for a certain number of days during the year without being required to give up their ordinary avocations and are only called out in case of need, but recruits for the Indian Defence Force are to be immediately trained and entrusted with the defence of the country during the absence of the standing army on active service. So far the Government of India, for reasons best known to themselves, generally excluded the educated classes from the army. An Indian could not, and still cannot, aspire to higher rank than that of Subedar Major. Perhaps this involved no hardship so long as the army was recruited from the lower classes of the people. Men of education and social standing cannot, however, be expected to be satisfied for ever with subordinate positions. In our opinion Government should have taken this opportunity to throw open the higher appointments to Indians. The Commander-in-Chief burked this question by declaring in the Imperial Legislative Council that the Act was only a war measure and that, therefore, the larger issue of granting commissions to Indians did not come within its scope. The legitimate demands of the people, he added would be satisfied in due course and that they should be content with the present opening. We do not regard this vague assurance as satisfactory; it will only have the effect of chilling the enthusiasm of thousands of possible recruits. The authorities surely know that anything that tends to check the flow of recruits at this critical time seriously militates against the true interests of the Empire. Although we protest most emphatically against this attitude of Government, our own duty in this matter is quite clear. We are asked to take a share in the defence of our own country and cannot, therefore, ignore the call. It is true Government have not conferred any new rights on us. But their attitude has undergone an appreciable change. Up to this time every action of ours was viewed with distrust. If a man practised riding on horseback or applied for permission to carry arms he was suspected to be a seditionist. The Home Rule movement will also gather additional strength by the entry of a considerable number of educated men into the army. We do not urge our people, however, to join military service permanently until higher appointments are thrown open to them. The present call is only for temporary service and every one is free to quit the army after the prescribed period if he finds the conditions of service unsatisfactory. We cannot shirk our duty on the plea that Government have not yet conceded our just demands. The present opportunity of acquiring military training, if now lost, will not occur again. In conclusion we enter an emphatic protest against one invidious and in our opinion needless distinction made in the Act. It has been decided to place the present Volunteer units on a level with the European section of the Indian Defence Force. This means that Eurasian, Parsi and Native Christian Volunteers will be classed as Europeans and will receive better treatment than their comrades in the Indian section of the Defence Force. Whatever the expediency for this step, it is sure to offend the susceptibilities of Indians. If Government were anxious to improve the status of these men they could have done so by other means than that of dubbing them as 'whites'. We wish Government had not fallen into this error. [The Dnyánodaya declares that the passing of the Indian Defence Force Act marks the dawn of the future glory of India and calls upon Indian Christians to join the force at once without raising the question of the grant of commission to Indians. The Sandesh writes:—We welcome the decision of Government not to employ Japanese troops for the defence of India, but to entrust it to Indians and Englishmen in India. As this is a sign of the future rise of India, Indians should make all haste to join the Defence of India Force. Indians would never like to see even the Colonial forces employed for the defence of India, much less would they, therefore, approve of the employment of Japanese for the purpose. Had the wishes of India been consulted in the matter no treaty would have been made for the employment of Japanese troops in India in case of necessity. Indian public opinion did not, however, count in these matters. But it is no use discussing past things. Fortunately for us, Government have decided to give us military training, and we should take advantage of this golden opportunity without delay and lay the foundation of Home Rule. Home Rule will receive more help by people enrolling themselves in the Defence Force than by joining the Home Rule League.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 6th and 9th Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 3rd Mar.; Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 4th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 5th Mar.; Arya Prakásh (12), 4th Mar.

3. The Bombay Samáchár expresses gratification at the enthusiasm that is being expressed in all quarters at the passing of the Indian Defence Force Act. It expresses regret that the organisation of the Force being a temporary war measure, Indians will not have sufficient opportunities to qualify themselves for commissions. It, however, regards the assurance given by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief with regard to the future prospects of Indians in the matter of commissions as satisfactory and asks young Indians to register themselves without any delay so that they may not have to experience disappointment afterwards owing to the limitations that will be placed on the number that will be enrolled in the Indian Defence Force. [In a subsequent issue the paper refers to the recruiting meeting held in Bombay under the presidentship of Mr. Tilak and expresses hope that Government will give no cause for complaint to the Indians in the matter of the organisation of the Defence Force and that they will give them opportunities for qualifying themselves for commissions. The Sánj Vartamán identifies itself with the protest made by the Indian members of the Imperial Legislative Council against certain inequalities to be observed between Europeans and Indians enlisting in the Defence Force and wishes that Government had not unnecessarily given cause for complaint to the Indians by considering Volunteers of all races as European British subjects. It, however, feels sure that Indians will, nevertheless, come forward to enlist in the Force and thus show their loyalty to the country and the Empire. The Kaiser-i-Hind writes in a somewhat similar strain. The Hindusthán endorses the opinions expressed by various speakers at the public meeting held in Bombay under the presidentship of Mr. Tilak and expresses hope that the rules under the Act will be so framed as to foster the enthusiasm of the Indians and to give them encouragement to enlist. It strongly urges upon educated men the necessity of joining the Defence Force and thus showing their fitness for Home Rule. The Arya Prakásh does not like the idea of Indians being made to enlist in their own units as in its opinion such a course will put a premium upon their religious prejudices. It suggests that all Hindus should be enlisted together irrespective of caste or creed, excepting that vegetarians and non-vegetarians may be separated for the sake of messing arrangements. It exhorts Gujarati youths to join the Defence Force.]

Prakásh (102), 7th Mar.

4. Not only was the Indian army, which was trained at the expense of the poverty-stricken Indian subjects, sent to the front at the beginning of the war, but many Indians offered their services to go to the front to fight with the enemy. Their offers, however, were not then accepted as Government were suspicious about the loyalty of Indians. But those suspicions have now been removed and Government are also feeling the want of men in an increasing degree. This has induced the authorities at the eleventh hour to form the new Indian Defence Force and to allow Indians to join it. Paucity of men is the only explanation of this concession. England is finding itself in a similar difficulty with [illegible] to money. It has indeed grown rich by the money which has been flowing into it from India and other parts of the world. But how long can she suffer the terrific drain of money that is going on account of the war? India, therefore, must loyally assist England, though it is being unjustly treated in the matter of indentured labour and though its legitimate ambitions are being suppressed by the operation of laws like the Press Act and the Defence of India Act. We are sure, therefore, that the War Loan of one hundred millions will soon be taken up by the people even though they have to do it with much difficulty. The terms offered to the public are liberal and even poor people can help in making the loan a success.

Gujaráti (13), 4th Mar.

5. It is on account of the war that Indians have been allowed the privilege of raising the Defence Force. The future of India will depend largely on the response Indians make to this new call and it will go a great way in deciding whether the Arms Act is to be repealed and whether Indians are to be given Commissions in the army. Besides, the Act will enable those races who have been stigmatised as unfit for military service to get the stigma removed by putting their spirit to the test. The Indians want to have Home Rule, but it must be remembered that those who want to govern their country must be able to defend it. We hope the young men of Gujarát will in no way lag behind their brethren in other provinces in the matter of responding to the call to arms. Students in schools and colleges should join the Defence Force and secure the benefits to be derived from military training. A time will come when Indians will have to defend their own country and the Indian Defence Force may be said to be the first small beginning of the permanent Defence Force that may have to be formed in future. The martial spirit needs to be fostered in the Gujarát and we hope the Defence Force will give our youths the training that will convert them into sturdy warriors. We hope college students and graduates will come forward in large numbers to join the Force throughout India.

Message (6), 6th Mar.

6. Commenting on the Kandewadi meeting, the Message remarks:— "Circumscribed as are the conditions of recruitment, readers will do well to bear in mind that in responding to this call in large numbers, they are not responding to the call of reactionary or narrow-minded officials who are on the stage to-day but disappear to-morrow. But they will be responding to the call of the Motherland and the Empire. We trust that the honour of our city will be fully upheld by all those who are of military age readily coming forward to join the ranks, and playing their part as men.......... After all what is it that we want? A paltry one hundred thousand or thereabouts. Can we not have among our educated classes 100,000 people willing to join to the colours? Will the educated classes allow a curse to fall on their education and enlightenment by keeping back at such a supreme moment as the present? Will they have studied in vain the great epics of Ind, the gallant achievements of Akbar and the soul-stirring deeds of Sivaji?"

Comments on the war Loan meeting at the Town Hall.

Message (6), 7th Mar.; Mahrátta* (5), 11th Mar.

7. "The well-deserved tribute which His Excellency Lord Willingdon paid yesterday to the voluntary effort throughout this Presidency will we feel sure be appreciated by the people. The voluntary contributions of our Presidency towards war relief and other funds are by no means negligible. The tremendous sacrifice involved in the present war has not been realised by thousands of people, because nothing has been done in that direction.......... If some of our well-to-do and patriotic citizens had only followed the example of the English plutocrats and arranged for the distribution broadcast of lucidly written pamphlets in the various Vernaculars regarding the various phases of the present struggle, we think they could have rendered great service to the cause they in common with the rest have so much at heart. There is another part of His Excellency's speech, to which we are constrained to take some exception. This is in regard to his reference to 'a considerable section of our citizens under influential leaders, who since the war began have been promoting a strong political agitation.' Whether political agitation is good or bad is another matter and those who are concerned with it know best which way their interest lies. As Mr. Srinivas Sastry remarked the other day in the Imperial Council, they are not all children, who deserve to be brought up in leading-strings lest they should go astray. His Excellency's reference to them and their agitation was, we submit with all deference, irrelevant to the occasion. We should like to point out in this connection that those who organized the meeting have all along fought shy of this section of people, for reasons best known to themselves. They have neither sought their co-operation nor accepted it, we believe, when it was forthcoming. Notwithstanding their coldness, many of those whom His Excellency characterized as doing harm to the cause they have at heart, were present at the meeting in the hope their co-operation would be sought even at the eleventh hour. But nothing of the kind was done, as we now know. We can speak with personal knowledge of these political 'agitators' that ever since the terms of the Loan were announced, it is they who are first in the field without seeking any self-advertisement, doing individually and collectively, the work, which the promoters of yesterday's meeting are still contemplating to do.......... Whatever view they may take of politics and political agitation, in this matter as in the winning of the war, they are thoroughly at one with the Government and the rest of the Empire. His Excellency would perhaps have shown better his broad-minded sympathy for 'the political hopes and aspirations of our citizens' by asking the promoters of the Sheriff's meeting why they had not secured the presence of the people's trusted leaders like Mr. Tilak'." [Elsewhere the paper remarks:—"We trust the Committee which has now been appointed will do its best to reach every class of people, even the poorest. In this direction it is necessary to enlist the whole-hearted co-operation of the popular leaders and we hope that the members of the Committee will sink their political differences in the higher cause of the Empire and join whole-heartedly with those who are already doing silent and unostentatious work in educating the masses as regards the moral and material advantages in subscribing to the War Loan. If the committee proceeds in the right direction and enlists the co-operation of the leaders of the people, we have no reason to doubt that the response of our Presidency will be the most magnificent of all." In another column the paper again remarks:—"While speaking on the War Loan, His Excellency the Governor thought it fit to read a sermon to the audience on the advisability at the present time of abstaining from promoting political propaganda. Frankly, we are not yet convinced of the advisability. But we should like to be convinced by His Excellency. If His Excellency would kindly enlighten us as to whether or not, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand have eschewed all political agitation, we shall reconsider our position. Again, we should like to know whether Lord Chelmsford has or has not recently sent a despatch to the Secretary of State, on a political subject? Thirdly, is there no political activity carried on by men like Mr. Lionel Curtis and Sir Valentine Chirol? Fourthly, were they not helped in their political studies by some officials?" The Mahrátta remarks:—"When even Governments indulge in unnecessary law-making and unnecessarily irritating the people by uncalled for orders and prosecutions and so forth, it is too much to expect the people to keep silent—it is unreasonable to expect them to open their mouths only to praise the authorities and their pockets only to fill the War purse.......... As His Excellency remarked, we Home Rulers think with all sincerity that by our 'agitation' (we should use the term 'education'), we are doing good service for our country. His Excellency differs. We are doing very bad service, we are told. And what are the arguments? His Excellency fears that 'the impression conveyed to the minds of the people of the rest of the Empire and particularly to those in the Mother-country will be'—highly unfavourable. But what are the people of the Mother-country and those of the rest of the Empire doing? Have they stopped all political talk save that of 'war-war-war'? We know that it is not so......... It is not many days now that the Curtis-correspondence convulsed the Indian community by its never-to-be-forgotten revelations. How can we rest quiet when our house is in danger?"]

Young India (11), 7th Mar.

8. "While whole-heartedly supporting the object of yesterday's War Loan meeting at the Town Hall, we are constrained to say that we regret that his Excellency Lord Willingdon should have found it necessary to direct some remarks at 'one other class of the public' who are engaged in political activities....... What we fail to understand is why, when every other part of the Empire is busy revolving schemes of the concessions they can wrest from the 'Mother Country' for what they have done, India alone should be singled out for counsels of inaction. And after all, India is not asking for any reward or boon, but only that the most elementary rights of free citizenship be restored to her sons. Why should this 'prejudice' what his Excellency holds to be 'the just claims of India to a fuller and fairer partnership with the rest of the Empire?' In the very 'mother country which is bearing so much of the strain and stress and the privation of the culminating efforts of this war,' big things, very big things indeed, are in the air and multitudinous schemes of far-reaching and vital reforms are being assiduously promoted. Because England is at war, we have never heard it even whispered that her people should put on sack-cloth and ashes and think no more of the future. The Dominions have been told authoritatively by the Colonial Secretary 'to strike while the iron is hot'. Yet such is the angle of the vision of people in authority that where Indian aspirations are concerned, her people are told that they must stand silent during the war. Moreover, the way to stop all agitation regarding vital questions of the future is in the hands of the authorities themselves. If they would only take the people into confidence and declare their intentions regarding the post-war changes, which, we have been told, over and over again, in a vague sort of way, would be fully in accord with the popular demands, the people would have nothing more to say. This view has been put forward on all hands and his Excellency himself had it placed before him through some of those to whom he had spoken privately about this matter. His Excellency, we are told on excellent authority, himself had agreed with this view. The Government has, we are told, forwarded a despatch to the Secretary of State on post-war changes but they have consistently refused to make the terms of it public. In this condition of affairs, the people feel that the only way to keep their claims present before the minds of those in whose hands our future lies, is to continually harp on the need of change and state clearly our view regarding the nature of the change. We feel therefore that His Excellency's reprimand was not justified by circumstances."

Indian Social Reformer (3), 11th Mar.

*9. "We are bound to say that the method adopted by the Government of India in making the offer of the gift to the Imperial Government, was not the best calculated to bring out the fact of the real enthusiasm which the people of India feel for the principles which Great Britain has espoused in this war. To a large extent, it is true, they were handicapped by the limitations of our political constitution whose inadequacy could not have received a more conclusive demonstration. This consideration, we may say in passing, might well have deterred Lord Willingdon from the sweeping condemnation which he passed on the prosecution of movements of political reform during the pendency of the war.......... If India is to take a larger share of her responsibilities, in a manner which will not obscure her genuine attachment to the Empire, the constitution of her Government will have to undergo change so as to make it in a more recognizable manner than at present the mouthpiece of India's loyalty and and devotion to the Empire. This is nothing but political reform, and we do not think that Government either here or in England are likely to be embarrassed by an effective and urgent expression of our desire to have it carried out. We remarked above that the Government of India was handicapped, to a large extent, by the limitations of our political constitution, in the selection of a method of making India's patriotic offer to the Empire. Even with these limitations, however, it was possible to have found a way which would have had less of the appearance of five or six gentlemen at Delhi summarily disposing of the resources of the Indian people. The Government of India is not a responsible Government, in the sense that it is responsible to the people of India, but it is mere affectation for it to pose as an Oriental despot who is bound by no considerations of constitutional decency......... The hole and corner manner in which the Government of India has elected to convey the country's response to the call of the Empire illustrates Lord Morley's remark that the British lion sometimes betrays a curious preference for masquerading in the skin of a quadruped more renowned for its stolidity than for its majesty."

Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar., Eng. cols.

10. "The Hon. Mr. Carmichael pointed out that the Cash Postal Certificates can be availed of even by the poor who can spare Rs. 7½. Unfortunately the masses are ignorant and it will be some time before all their suspicions or doubts are dispelled and they become convinced of the perfect security of the amount they advance....... As suggested by a District Officer, the Revenue Officers from the Mamlatdars upwards should be entrused with the task of popularising the loan and collecting subscriptions from the people within the limits of their jurisdiction.......... In his speech His Excellency called upon the leaders of the Indian people to give up political agitation and to 'join with us in our united effort' to secure victory. Whilst agreeing with His Excellency that nothing should be done to embarass Government at this moment, we fail to see how all political activities can be abandoned when measures are being taken by Government more or less calculated to produce controversy.......... Does His Excellency expect the people to remain silent, whilst grave questions are being officially considered behind their back? The India Defence Force Bill raised questions of fundamental importance to the Indian people. Were they to remain silent and not speak out their views? We do not think even His Excellency realises fully and correctly the position of the Indian people, or is quite conscious of the fact that with all his sympathy with their aspirations he has not been able to impress his individuality upon the administration and to enforce that 'broader outlook in many branches of our administration to which he referred.......... We are really sorry His Excellency was led to strike a jarring note on an occasion when all were of one mind in regard to the main subject which had brought all the communities together."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 8th Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 8th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 7th Mar.

11. Referring to the speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Willingdon as Chairman of the public meeting recently held at the Bombay Town Hall in support of the Indian War Loan, the Bombay Samáchár assures His Excellency that the Presidency will give "a ready, generous and warm-hearted response" to the call of the Motherland of the Empire to help her in her need. It exhorts the capitalist class not to miss the present opportunity of ensuring future safety by largely subscribing to the loan, and strongly appeals to them to come forward and make the best use of their money to avoid precious blood being uselessly spilt, which is being done at present on account of the vain obstinacy of a defeated enemy. The paper congratulates His Excellency on his resolve to reduce the scale of living at the Government House during the war, and hopes that it will serve as a very good example for the people to practise economy. It also endorses the Governor's admonition to the educated sections of the people to eschew all political agitation during the present crisis and hopes that they will respond to His Excellency's appeal for co-operation with Government to secure victory. The Akhbár-e-Islám regards Lord Willingdon's speech as a very valuable and noteworthy pronouncement. It expresses disapproval of the activities of some of the Indian political leaders who have been making efforts for securing either Home Rule or self-government for India, and of others who are pressing for the repeal of the Press and Defence of India Acts and, supporting His Excellency's belief that they are doing disservice to India by their present political agitation, remarks that this is the time when the Indians should demonstrate their loyalty by utilising all means in their power. The Hindusthán remarks that the advice given by His Excellency to the public leaders to give up all political agitation at the present juncture was ill-timed looking to the occasion on which it was given. While appreciating the sympathy of His Excellency for the aspirations of the [illegible], the paper observes that the public leaders have to do their duty by their country side by side with discharging their obligations towards the Empire. It maintains that the Indian public have, in the present struggle, given a response in proportion to the confidence reposed in them. It refers to the efforts of Mr. Tilak and Mrs. Annie Besant in collecting Indian recruits for the Defence of India Force and inquires if His Excellency does not know of a meeting, larger than the Town Hall one, held in the heart of the city under the presidentship of Mr. Tilak for the purpose of encouraging people to volunteer and of enlisting those who were ready to do so.

Muslim Herald (123), 9th Mar.

12. The Muslim Herald publishes an account of the meeting held at the Town Hall, Bombay, to exhort the public to subscribe to the Indian War Loan. It is of opinion that those who subscribe to the loan are not making a tithe of the sacrifice made by those who have been wounded or who have died on the battlefield. It admits that India is a poor country; at the same time it maintains that the true measure of the value of the sacrifice is not the total amount of money which might be subscribed but the spirit in which self-denial is practised by the people. It hopes that the Indians, particularly those living in the Bombay Presidency, would lose no time in demonstrating that their loyalty is not of the lip variety, and it concludes by reminding the public that their leaders can formulate demands for larger political rights only when the people play their part well.

Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 10th Mar.

13. The Akhbár-e-Islám exhorts Moslem leaders to make strenuous endeavours to induce the members of the Muhammadan community to subscribe largely to the new Indian War Loan. It remarks that the present is not a religious war but one influenced by considerations of territorial acquisition and consequently it is of opinion that if the Moslems are slow to help Government on the present occasion on the ground of Turkey being involved in the war, it would be a blot upon the loyalty of the Muhammadans. India enjoys peace and comforts even during the present crisis, observes the paper, and it is the duty of every Muhammadan to wish safety, prosperity and victory to the British rule. It suggests that the leading Muhammadan citizens of Bombay should busy themselves in initiating movements for creating an awakening in their community as to the desirability of taking up the new Loan on an extensive scale.

India's war gift to England.

Message (6), 4th Mar.

14. "The people directly and immediately concerned have been treated with a studied disrespect and disregard, opposed in every way to the declarations of trust and confidence in the people and their representatives. Sir William Meyer suggested as the main reason for this magnificent generosity the resolution which Sir Gangadhar Chitnavis moved in the Council in September 1914, with the approval of the Government of India, in respect of direct contribtion to the war, and added that in their view 'the time has now come when we can safely put our wish into effect and thereby gratify still further the patriotic feelings unanimously expressed in this Council'. We do not wish to express any opinion whether this 'gift' is just or unjust or whether it is in consonance with public feeling in this country. But, it must be pointed out that an altogether new meaning has been read into Sir Gangadhar Rao's resolution, which it originally never contemplated and to which the members did not certainly give their assent. Even assuming for the moment that the interpretation put upon it by the Viceroy was correct—we think it is not—it must be remembered that may of the members of the present Council were not there then and they had not committed themselves to any such course. Was it not fair, therefore, to have consulted the Council beforehand, before the Government decided upon any course of action? Had not the Viceroy and his colleagues many opportunities of meeting the Council before the Viceroy sent his telegram to the Secretary of State? Why were they not consulted at all, before a surprise was sprung upon them? We are not exaggerating in the least when we say that it came to the public as a veritable bolt from the blue. The justification which Sir William Meyer has given is the least convincing and gratuitously insulting to the intelligence of the people. Now, what is this justification that has been put forward? Sir William Meyer said in his speech: 'We have been subjected to much criticism in certain quarters for not contributing more than we have done.' We know what these quarters are. They are the organs of the Tory Press in England, which are the tools in the hands of the Northcliffe deal and that section of the press in this country which is in the leading-strings of that deal......... The Government of India have no manner of excuse to be influenced to far-reaching decisions by the mean, misinformed and misdirected criticisms of the Northcliffe deal in England and India and the people have treated its venomous "outpourings' with absolute contempt as it so richly deserved......... There is the class of critics to which we have referred above. We do not think it will ever be satisfied until the last drop of India's blood is sucked. And then there are the British Government and the Parliament. We do not doubt for a moment their sincerity or integrity, and they have both recognized the value of India's services. If the situation is sufficiently made clear to them, we cannot believe that they will ever willingly consent to any arrangement that will still further weaken India's capacity to bear the already heavy burden. The duty of acquainting the Home Government primarily rests with the Government of India. But, we say it with extreme regret that it has proved too weak in the hands of its blind critics. The Government could have assumed sufficient boldness to withstand its malignant critics, it could have done much to dispel the erroneous impression created by their mischievous activities. While it has shown remarkable activity in unjustly putting down the Indian press and platform, an impression prevails largely, that it is helpless before the strong and influentially backed organs of the English and Anglo-Indian Press. Whatever that may be, the fact remains that the Government has committed the country to a course, without even a show of formal consulation, and we believe it is the duty of the Indian public to submit to what is now inevitable with silent resignation."

Kesari (95), 6th Mar.

15. Our Finance Minister was able to show a substantial surplus at a time when a huge deficit was expected on account of the war. He also announced the Government's intention of handing over a sum of 150 crores of rupees to the British Government for carrying on the war. It would be a puzzle to many to account for this unexpected financial prosperity of India. The explanation, however, is not far to seek. The surplus is arrived at by a skilful manipulation of figures. While framing the budget our Finance Department under-estimates the revenue and over-estimates the expenditure thus securing a handle for imposing new taxes and enhancing old ones on the ground of a possible deficit! The balance thus made available is devoted to meet Police or military charges or to Railway construction. The recognised principle of sound finance of levying just enough taxes to cover the ordinary expenditure is unfortunately ignored in framing our Budgets. Government always raise more taxes than are necessary and then devote the surplus to objects the expenditure on which ought properly to be met by loans. We particularly object to their decision to pay the interest on the War Loan from the surplus. The contribution of India towards the expenses of the war may not appear to be very large when compared with the huge sacrifices of England. But it will appear to be very heavy indeed when her limited resources are taken into consideration. India certainly ought to have fiscal autonomy in return for her splendid contribution. One feature of the budget is, however, eminently satisfactory, viz., the decision to increase the import duty on the cotton goods without a corresponding increase in the excise duty. Nay, the Finance Minister has held out an assurance of entirely abolishing the latter at the first favourable opportunity. There is thus reason to hope that this unjust impost will shortly be done away with. The super-tax on large incomes is also equitably distributed. We wish, however, that Government had fixed the taxable minimum for super-tax at 20 or 25 thousand rupees instead of Rs 50,000. This would have brought a considerable number of fat-salaried officials within the limit of the tax. We trust Government will consider this suggestion at the time of framing their next Budget. We would also point [illegible] surcharge on railway goods traffic at the rate of two pies per [illegible] heavily on the poor. It should have been so adjusted as to [illegible] necessaries of the poor such as bajri, jowari, etc. The Budget [illegible] whole, although not free from objectionable features, is gratifying.

16. The Government of India have announced a gift of 150 crores of rupees to the Imperial Government on behalf of India. Our leaders are right in complaining that they should have been consulted before Government came to this momentous decision. We are aware it is not usual to consult non-official members while framing the Budget, but it was clearly the duty of Government to take the popular leaders into their confidence before taking this step and imposing an annual burden of 9 crores of rupees on the Indian exchequer. We are, besides, of opinion that this is too heavy a burden for a poor country like India and will assuredly arrest our progress for a number of years. Government need not have been in a hurry to determine our share of the total war expenditure. That question could have been settled later on in consultation with our leaders. We do not wish, however, to engage in fruitless discussion now, and urge our people to support wholeheartedly the War Loan. [In a subsequent issue the paper remarks :—We are glad to note that Government are resolved to devote the whole resources of India to the successful prosecution of the war. We were never of opinion that India should not bear her legitimate share of the burden. We maintain, however, that every part of the Empire should contribute according to its means. This does not appear to have been the case. Whereas we are taxed to the utmost of our capacity the contribution of the Colonies is proportionately much less than ours. It is unfair to expect India to contribute liberally without calling upon the Colonies to make a similar sacrifice. We would also urge our Government to adopt a more sympathetic attitude towards this country. At present our prospects are not very cheerful. We doubt very much whether the Imperial Government ever remember India except when they want to impose a new burden on us. It may perhaps be argued that they are too much occupied with the conduct of the war to devote any attention to us. How is it then that they are always so eager to please the Colonies? We have a right to expect the Secretary of State for India who is our spokesman in England to watch over our interests. As a matter of fact he appears to be against us. Fortunately the war has given us an opportunity to take a share in the defence of our country and prove our worth. Government were not well-advised, however, in discriminating between Europeans and Indians in the matter of pay, prospects, etc. Although people have demanded with one voice the abolition of the indentured labour system and the repeal of the Defence of India Act, Government are unwilling to make any concession to popular sentiment in these respects. We hold that we shall not be adequately recompensed for all our sacrifices in the war unless we get self-government on colonial lines.]

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 5th and 6th Mar.

*17. The Gujaráti gives full particulars about the War Loan and Post Office Cash Certificates and adds :—The facilities offered by the War Loan are such as can be availed of by even the poor and middle class people and so it should be widely advertised all over the country not excepting small towns and villages. It would not be wrong on the part of Municipalities to levy a special cess on motor cars and on marriage festivities with a view to raising funds for subscribing to the War Loan. Government are the protectors of their subjects and people could not make a better and safer investment than by placing their savings at the disposal of Government. We feel sure the War Loan will be largely subscribed by the Indian people.

Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar.

18. Commenting upon the progress of the war, the Gujaráti writes :—The Germans are reported to have retreated some miles and have evacuated some villages but it seems that they had planned this retreat inasmuch as they have taken up new positions without suffering any loss. One would naturally ask why the Germans have retreated and some people are of opinion that the German retreat was effected with a view to frustrating the plans of the Allies by making them change the position of their artillery which they had arranged in accordance with the observations made by aircraft and to gain time by compelling the Allies to make fresh observations for directing the artillery fire and thus fight on a battle-field of their own choice. It is to be seen whether the Germans succeed in their designs. In Mesopotamia Kut has been occupied by the British and their army is advancing towards Baghdad and the Turks are being routed. It is to be seen whether the British army proceeds as far as Baghdad or stops short somewhere on the way to it. A large army will be required to lay siege to Baghdad and arrangements must be made on a large scale to supply all its requirements at the proper time. In Russia a difference of opinion has arisen among political leaders. Some are in favour of peace though public opinion is against it. The Czar is determined to fight till victory is achieved, but political differences adversely affect military preparations. There is no lack of men in Russia, but there is a great scarcity of munitions felt there. Japan is no doubt helping Russia in this respect but its help is not sufficient to meet Russia's requirements. Besides, Japan is more intent upon capturing new markets than supplying Russian requirements. Russia has therefore to depend on England and America for the supply of munitions and German submarines have created fresh difficulties in its way. The submarine menace has not greatly affected England, thanks to the vigilance of the British Navy. The ruthless submarinism has had some effect on Europe as a whole, and England is now trying to supply all its needs. Strenuous action is undertaken when the necessity for it is brought home to any nation. When will the necessity of prohibiting indentured labour be brought home to our rulers?

Reflections on the present situation of the war.

Gujaráti (13), 6th Mar.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 5th and 9th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 6th Mar.

19. The Sánj Vartamán refers to the retreat of the Germans on the Western front and is of opinion that they have retreated to a more secure position with a view to avoid wastage in men. It expresses gratification at the fall of Kut and the subsequent rout of the Turks with great losses in prisoners and war material, etc., and believes these events will tend to encourage the Allies and add to their enthusiasm to carry on the struggle. It quotes the figures of imports to and exports from British ports and avers that the infinitely small number of ships sunk by the enemy submarines greatly redounds to the vigilance and efficiency of the British Navy. In conclusion it asks the Indian people to help the Government to bring the war to a successful termination by subscribing to the War Loan and by enlisting themselves in the Indian Defence Force. [In a subsequent issue the paper gives extracts from Mr. Lloyd George's recent utterance on the general situation and exhorts the Indian people to avail themselves of the opportunity offered to help the Allies to win victory and reminds them that their position in the Empire depends largely on the part they play in the present war. The Hindusthán quotes the opinion of the Times of India regarding the falling back of the Germans in the Western front and the possibility of their making a rush for Petrograd and opines that the recent retreat of the Germans affords a positive proof of their increasing difficulties.]

China and the Allies.
Message (6), 7th Mar.

20. "It was disconcerting enough to learn at one time that the Chinese Government was employing the Germans in the docks, harbours, etc.......... From the recent developments, it appears that the Chinese Government has not allowed itself to be deceived. It has taken up a strong attitude in regard to the aggressive intentions of Germany. The Allied Ministers have presented the Celestial Government a memorandum sympathising with this attitude. The memorandum is very friendly and has offered to suspend the question of Boxer Indemnity payments during the war, in the event of China effectively severing her relations with Germany and Austria. In the present unsettled state of affairs, the country needs strong friends and the 'Celestial Empire' cannot have better friends than the Allies."

Comments on His Excellency the Viceroy's reply to the deputation of the Indian Press Association.

Message (6), 8th and 9th Mar.

21. "His Excellency's reply, which is a carefully prepared and lengthy document, leaves one under the impression that Lord Chelmsford, and much less his advisers in this matter, had any (sic) inclination to give a fair hearing to the deputation. At any rate, the reply is as one-sided as it could be, and the tone of it was needlessly harsh and certainly not reassuring, considering the time and place of its delivery. We were under no circumstances prepared for the curt, minatory tone which the Viceroy adopted in his utterance towards the deputation. If he did not want to repeal the Press Act, because his 'predecessor saw no reason to relax the restrictions it imposes,' he might have said so without unduly giving offence. Those who waited on His Excellency on Monday were not children to stand in need of rebuke for protesting against what they and the rest of the 'Indian' press conceive to be a gross injustice. We have emphasized here the term 'Indian' as distinguished from the 'Anglo-Indian' press, because it is not the latter that has felt the lashes of the Act and could therefore afford to smile at it complacently. .... Lord Chelmsford deemed it expedient to indulge in a kind of rhetoric, which is unusual in the Viceregal atmosphere and which has not been repeated save and except during the regime of Lord Curzon, since the memorable Viceroyalty of the late Lord Lytton. He commenced by reminding the deputation somewhat superfluously that 'the Empire is in the throes of a life and death struggle and that such a time is hardly the moment at which to raise even such an important matter as this'—a sentiment, by the bye, which was faithfully and loyally echoed a few hours later by another high authority somewhere far removed from Delhi. He proceeded, however, to say: 'I put aside this consideration (that the time was inopportune) though it has meant that precious time has had to be devoted to a matter which might have awaited a more convenient season.......... I want to show that in a matter like this I am always ready to meet those who feel they have a grievance to advance.' We have never entertained any doubts in regard to His Excellency's desire to meet readily 'those who have a grievance' just in the same manner as he has always been anxious to take Honourable Members of his Legislative Council into his confidence on matters of vital importance such as India's War Gift and the Indian Defence Force Bill. He might have well spared himself the trouble of the reiteration of this fine sentiment. His Excellency readily met the deputation and treated them to a heroic effort at self-justification, by quoting extracts apart from their original context and then pronouncing an obiter dictum on the duties of journalists and judges. The journalists have perforce to bow before it in all humility. But not so the judges. Thanks to the farsighted statesmanship of our earlier rulers, the judiciary has been placed in a position which cannot be assailed.......... We respect Lord Chelmsford for his courage and frankness in not sparing even the Judges for what he considered to be their departure from the legitimate province of determining what the law is to that of saying what that law ought to be. He is himself a lawyer and has claimed with pride that he belongs to that much abused profession—the profession of law. He should have therefore remembered that the judges have at all times and in all climes, except perhaps in Russia, enjoyed the right of doing both.......... The line of reasoning adopted here by the Viceroy is too specious to deserve refutation. His argument amounts to this in effect that 'because this journal or that offended against the law, so brand the whole race of Indian journals.' Even at the risk of being considered bad analogists we shall venture to think that this appears to us like a particular German case in Belgium. Because some one fired at the German troops as they were entering a certain village, the German commander gave the order for the sacking of the village and the shooting of every Belgian, whether armed or unarmed, found in the village.......... We would pray His Excellency to consider dispassionately whether his reply to the deputation does not amount to something of this character. There are no doubt times and circumstances which justify the curtailment of popular liberties. If when the Press Act was enacted, circumstances demanded a special arbitrary legislation of this character, those circumstances, we venture to assert most emphatically, do no longer exist. There may be and there is unrest in the land and that is only an outward manifestation of the surging tide of life within. Our rulers instead of being upset by this manifestation ought certainly to welcome it as the crowning triumph of their labours in this land and give shape to it." [In the next issue the paper writes:—"As poisons in the hands of good physicians lose their evil character, so even the most obnoxious laws will have no terrors for the people, if they were always administered by good 'physicians of the body politic.' When the patients are sure that their physician is an expert in his line and is not given to fits of passion, they do not complain even though they see some bottles on his shelf labelled 'poison' in red ink. But when some of the hospital assistants are known to be given to alcoholism or worse, they do not quite relish to see that poisons are always near at hand to persons, all of whom are not models of virtue.......... When some Honourable Members of Council complained, while the Press Act was on the anvil, that there was not adequate provision in the Act against any possible abuse of power by the executive, they were told by the Government apologists that the aggrieved party could go to the High Court for a redress of its grievance. When one such aggrieved party went to the High Court, he was told that his appeal was useless, as the High Court could not rescind executive orders, issued under the Act.......... Now, when the Press deputation goes to the Viceroy to amend the law so as to give the High Courts real and more effective power to hear appeals, it is again referred to the High Courts! It is told that the High Courts have power! If the mother persists in refusing food to the child and if the father persists in not allowing him to go out to seek food, what is the child to do?"]

Mahrátta* (5), 11th Mar.; Young India (11), 7th Mar.

22. The Mahrátta, referring to the complaint of the Viceroy that the Press Association had asked for an interview at a time when the Empire was in the midst of a life and death struggle, remarks:—"This was a wonderful cut. Was not the Viceroy at liberty to chose his own time to receive the deputation? They were not children who waited on him for personally explaining matters. They realise the situation of the day, as the most loyal heart can possibly do it.......... How came the difference when the realisation of the present situation is, as we claim it, equally intense in either party? Our idea is that the difference in positions brought about the difference in judgments........ Indians are the direct sufferers and the sufferings are of a grave character. The deputation represented the sufferers. They represented the Indian public generally and the Indian Press specially. This was the position of the deputation.......... His Excellency's position is that of ruler who, however sympathetic he may be himself, has to depend upon advisers for the material to form an opinion. The material that those advisers supplied to Lord Chelmsford was, as the reply of His Excellency amply proves, defective in the extreme. That may excuse His Excellency's view of the importance of our grievances to a certain extent. But we do think that after all that can be said in explanation of the rebuke which Lord Chelmsford administered to the deputation for choosing a moment which he himself considered inopportune—we do think that the rebuke might well have been spared. An Englishman with an extremely strong bias in favour of a free press, as His Excellency declared himself to be, would have acted differently. [The paper then tries to answer some of the points touched upon by the Viceroy. and with reference to His Excellency's remarks about the picture of 'official terrorism' drawn in the memorial says:—]The Council of the Press Association is going to issue a detailed statement dealing with the Viceroy's reply and we expect that in that statement the charge of using 'general terms' in regard to the fact of terrorism which the Viceroy brought against the Memorial will be wiped off as far as possible. We say as far as possible advisedly, because many a press and many an humble newspaper will think a hundred times before giving their consent to the publication of the petty tyrannies which they have confided to the Association. And this for obvious reasons.......... As to the next point we shall simply say that we have more reason to rely on facts and the opinions of eminent High Court Judges than on the isolated opinion of His Excellency." [Young India, referring briefly to the Viceroy's reply to the deputation of the Indian [illegible] Association, remarks :—"We shall return to this speech in our next issue. For the present we shall content ourselves by expressing our regretful protest against the attitude and tone adopted by His Excellency towards this vital subject."]

Indian Social Reformer (3), 11th Mar.

*23. "We are not inclined to adopt the view that the reply which His Excellency the Viceroy gave to the deputation of the Press Association of India is altogether disappointing. We are sure that the Press Association did not expect that Lord Chelmsford was only waiting for the deputation to announce the repeal of the Press Act. Short of this, we see a good deal to justify a hopeful interpretation of His Excellency's words. The very fact that he took pains to answer the Press Association's formidable indictment with such fulness of detail, shows that Lord Chelmsford recognises the existence of a grievance. More than that, His Excellency declared that, as an Englishman, his education, his training and inherited instincts, biassed him in this matter in favour of the case presented by the Press Association. He admitted that the Press Act was a measure which cannot but be regarded as a slur on the good name of the Press. He assured the deputation that Government had issued definite instructions to the effect that the Act should not be administered with harshness and without discrimination. In his concluding sentence, His Excellency definitely held out the hope that the need for the Act will be gone when the Press itself will have taken the matter into its own hands. Whatever may be the intrinsic merits of His Excellency's arguments to prove the necessity of the Act at present, these are certainly the sentiments of one who realises that the Press of India labours under a just grievance, though he may not see his way immediately to redress it. The arguments in favour of the Act reduce themselves to three: there are newspapers in India which write in language which the Executive Government consider inimical to the interests of good government; the provisions of the Act have been sparingly used and the increase in the number of printing presses and newspapers since the commencement of the Act show that it does not operate as a deterrent to the growth of journalism. The Press of India should be judged not by the few black sheep but the many white ones. The number of presses and newspapers which the executive found objectionable is a small proportion of the total; and even if the printing press be totally prohibited in India, there will be some bold spirits which will run the risk of prosecution and imprisonment in order that the people may not die of mental inanition. We ask His Excellency if he thinks it fair, just and English that a measure, which is a slur on the whole Press, should be retained in the statute book because a few papers are found to use language which Government consider objectionable? His Excellency asked that Government and Government officials should be given credit for honest intentions. May we not ask that the Press and its conductors should be given credit for honest intentions also? Government ought to do towards the Press as it would be done by, by the Press."

Gujarâti (13), 11th Mar., Eng. cols.

*24. "The Viceroy's reply to the deputation, which waited on him on behalf of the Press Association of India, is reported to have disappointed the members of the deputation. And well it might......... No right-minded person will object to the executive being armed with powers to punish attempts to preach disaffection and violence, but freedom of honest criticism is curtailed by the provisions of the Press Act which may come down upon a writer and printer at any time. The Viceroy quoted figures to show that the number of presses and periodicals had increased since the the passing of the Press Act and drew from them the conclusion that the Act had not interfered with legitimate freedom. It is the anxiety, the mental worry and the pecuniary loss from which pressmen suffer that have to be taken into account in estimating the merits of the Act and not the statistics of increase in presses and periodicals......... Lord Chelmsford observed that the present was not the time when such a controversial measure should have been discussed. Certainly all the energies of the country must be concentrated on the prosecution of the war and public attention ought not to be diverted to other matters. But is this not also the psychological moment when the fetters should be removed from the Press and it should be encouraged to exhort the people to co-operate with Government in making a supreme sacrifice for winning the war?"

Hindusthán (17), 8th Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 7th Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 9th Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 9th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 7th Mar.

25. The Hindusthán remarks that the whole Indian Press and the people of this country will deplore the narrow-minded reply given by the Viceroy to the deputation of the Press Association of India. It characterises His Excellency's reply as unstatesmanlike and maintains that instead of receiving the deputation to give such a reply he could well have declined to receive it at all. It compares the reply of the Viceroy to the action of a host who slaps his guests after inviting them. The paper argues that if the number of the occasions on which the provisions of the Press Act were brought into operation is as suggested by the Viceroy to be considered small, regard being had to the long period of five years during which the Act has existed, that very fact goes to establish the undesirability of continuing the existence of such a severe measure on the Statute Book of the country merely for the sake of keeping in order a small number of newspapers and presses. It advises the journalists of this country not to be disappointed at the Viceroy's reply and, significantly reminding them of the fact of the succession of Lord Ripon after Lord Lytton, expresses the hope that if they persist in their agitation against the Press Act it is sure to be repealed by the British authorities after the termination of the war. [To the Sánj Vartamán the Viceroy's reply appears as if it had issued from the lips of Lord Curzon rather than from those of Lord Chelmsford. It remarks that the reply is indicative of political short-sightedness and is totally devoid of all political wisdom. It is of opinion that the High Court judges have every right to criticise the defects or severity of a legistative enactment and that the Viceroy's action in delivering a sermon upon what should be the duties of these judges was one ill-befitting his high position. Who else can expose the blemishes of a law the paper inquires, but these High Court Judges? The Akhbár-e-Islám, on the other hand considers the Viceroy's reply to the deputation to be very farsighted and statesmanlike. It dwells on the justifiability on the part of Government of using all the means necessary for exercising a healthy check upon the Press of the country and the activities of public leaders during a crisis like the present. The paper remarks that a large section of the Press in India is not in favour of securing a repeal of the Press Act at the present juncture and expresses its disapprobation of the policy of the so-called public organs of endeavouring to secure greater liberty for the Press in order to enable them to raise a storm of agitation for obtaining all possible rights for the Indians. The Jám-e-Jamshed has no cause for complaint against the Viceroy's reply. It remarks that in view of the extracts quoted by His Excellency from some papers in support of his position, the Viceroy would be an angel if he did not express himself in the language that he did. The paper, however, points to the alleged defective nature of the Act and suggests the appointment of a "Press Committee", composed of officials and non-officials, to consider the articles which are regarded as objectionable and to demand explanations from the journalists concerned before taking proceedings under the Press Act. The Praja Mitra and Pársi observes that the passages quoted by the Viceroy are indefensible from the point of view of their highly objectionable nature and, therefore, regards His Excellency's reply as justifiable. While admitting that the duty of judges is not to criticise the law but to administer it, the paper considers it to be natural that the lay public should come to hold an adverse view about the working of the Press Act in the absence of the publication of full information, when men learned in law like High Court judges are found inclined to share such a view. It, therefore, suggests that inquiries into important cases under the Act might be held in camera but that the judges at least should be given the opportunity of knowing all the facts concerning those cases.]

26. We are thankful to His Excellency the Viceroy for his frank reply to the deputation from the Press Association. We do not mean to say that the deputation was satisfied with his reply or that it was in any way satisfactory. It enables us, however, to understand the grounds on which Government seek to justify the existence of the Press Act. The authorities seem to have convinced the Viceroy that it was impossible to ensure the good behaviour of the press in this country without keeping it under strict control and that a marked improvement had been noticed in the tone of the press after the amendment of the Penal Code in 1898. We are unable to reconcile His Excellency's ready acceptance of these doubtful assertions with his avowed sympathy for a free press. He seems to be under the impression that the authorities cannot make mistakes while enforcing the provisions of the Press Act. In our opinion it is futile to attempt to stamp out sedition by gagging the press. The provisions of the Act are so vague that it is not at all a difficult task to bring any well-conducted journal within its operation. We do not think the Viceroy's reply will satisfy anyone who demands the repeal of the Press Act. [A correspondent writes in the Indu Prakásh that the Viceroy's reply has cast a gloom over the entire Indian press. The Sandesh remarks:—The Viceroy's reply is most disappointing. We wish the deputation had not at all waited on him. The reply is unbecoming a Government which calls itself 'Supreme'. We hear much of late of a change in the angle of vision regarding our aspirations, but unfortunately our experience does not prove this to be the case.]

Prája Mitra and Pársi (24), 10th Mar., Eng. cols.; Rást Goftár* (28), 11th Mar., Eng. cols.

27. "The effect of Lord Chelmsford's exhaustive and vigorous reply would be, we are afraid, to take the wind out of the sails of those whose privileges and grievances the deputation went forth to advocate and represent. Of course, many points in the Viceroy's speech can be controverted, and we believe will be controverted by the Press Association; but the effect of the whole speech seems calculated to destroy the case which the deputation tried to make out. The facts and figures quoted by Lord Chelmsford, as they stand, show that the agitation over the Press Act is largely hollow and artificial.......... We believe the least satisfactory feature of the speech is the animadversions upon judicial opinions upon the character and working of the Press Act......... The Act is so framed as either to shut out all inquiry into its working in a court of law, or to deprive the court of the power to interfere with executive action. That circumstance by itself is, in the British Constitution, a grave invasion of the primary and fundamental rights of a subject.......... His Excellency apparently is not well pleased with judges going out of their way, as he believes them to do, to make extra-judicial remarks against the executive or the legislature. "The function of a judge is not to say what the law ought to be, but what it is." That is, of course, strictly true. But the laws are not made in heaven.......... If judges go out of their way to condemn an Act while administering it, it must mean that the Act is really unsatisfactory.......... On the whole, we believe that at a time like the present, Lord Chelmsford would have been better advised to give the usual formal and civil reply which expressed sympathy and held out no definite promise, than to make a studied and elaborate speech calculated to create controversy and bitterness." [The Rást Goftár remarks:—"It was a mistake—a diplomatic blunder—to have given the deputation a hearing and then to have sent it away with a cool and curt reception. The same sentiment, the same ideas, the self-same determination to hold on with the present machinery for the control of the Press could have been expressed without leaving on the personnel of the deputation a sense of resentment. If the time was not fit for receiving a long and laboured representation on a subject at once so thorny and delicate as that of the freedom of the Press, it would have been a better course to have accorded a polite refusal to the leaders of the deputation than to have granted them the honour of an audience and then to tell them that the moment they had chosen for the representation of their grievance was not at all opportune for the purpose. The deputation was admittedly ill-timed and could have been well deferred for a more apposite moment, preferably at or after the end of the war. It was therefore an error of judgment on both sides, which, on the side of the Government was further aggravated by the stern candour of His Excellency's reply. Considerations of the influence which the modern Press of India exercises on public opinion and the very satisfactory account that it has rendered throughout the war as a loyal and law-abiding body ought well to have weighed with His Excellency as an overwhelming reason for the use of the most guarded and diplomatic language......... If he had apprised the members of the deputation with the difficulties of the Government and told them that relaxation of the control over the Press at a time like the present might be abused by the extremist and irresponsible section of the Press, and, if he had but stopped short there except it may be with a pledge for its modification, and an appeal to their patient co-operation till at least the war was over, the deputation would not have felt hurt at the declension of their offer and might have seen their way to be less importunate in their demand."

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 11th Mar., Eng. cols.

28. "Frankly speaking we are disappointed at the reply given to the Press Association deputation by His Excellency the Viceroy. No true journalist will rejoice over the sentiments which, the Viceroy showed, appeared in some newspapers of 1916. But we ask with all respect whether it is right to muzzle the whole class because of the whinings of some stray rabids. That in spite of the operation of the Press Act, presses, newspapers and periodicals have increased in numbers cannot be gainsaid. The question is not whether their numbers have increased but whether the increase has been in proportion to the country's advancement in other directions. We are glad that the Viceroy has been so frank in his reply. We still hope that it will be the lot of Lord Chelmsford to effect 'the removal from the statute-book of a measure which cannot but be regarded as a slur on the good name of the Press.'"

England's duty towards India at the present juncture.

Mahratta (5), 11th Mar.

29. The Mahratta approvingly quotes from a recent article in the Times of India on "National Service" and remarks:—"If the State deserves the 'best' out of a citizen, it must take a shape and form itself and create conditions in its territory, such that every citizen will have something to give. In India what are the conditions? Even in these pressing times of war, many, many of us are so poorly equipped that they don't know that there is a war going on which affects India! Many others are unable to give anything beyond good wishes. Many are unable to give any decent portion of their best, because the best cannot be given simply for the asking to any and every applicant. There must be a 'title' in the applicant to such a 'best' or a portion of it. When there is a continuous stream of unpleasant and oppressive measures flowing from the fountain-authorities, it is too much to expect that the subjects will forget all—even the present festering sores—and say a hearty 'Yea' to every demand of the Government. 'Yeas' no doubt fill the air whenever they are required to, but there is not as much of the heart in them as would be found in the 'Yeas' of the members of a self-ruling prosperous country. We must go on repeating incessantly that the conditions in which England has chosen to keep India—despite the swayings of the new wave of Democratic spirit which has made a tour of all 'benighted' lands—are unfortunate, exceedingly unfortunate! We call upon England to be up and awake. Reckless sleeping in a house which is infected in multifarious ways can do no good to the sleeper. And suppose a peculiarly made member or two of the family escape infection, is that a ground for neglecting the sanitation of the house? India is full of 'insanitary' public measures. Some laws are bad in every letter. Some are 'unfortunately' worded and thus despite their worthy objects fall into line with those of the first category by reason of the wary Executive stretching them too far......... We have endeavoured to make it clear that India is suffering from 'neglect' and from 'over-meddling'—from want of salutary measures and from the existence of contrary ones. This part of the Imperial House is, we assert, badly infected in the above way. Will not England look to it that before long the disinfecting of this vast area shall take place? The last Congress has asked for a Pledge that this shall be done soon. Why is not the Pledge coming? A Word of assurance—that surely cannot be an impossible task. Does England mean to be fair towards us? If yes, why not say so? What is the difficulty—we repeat, what is the difficulty?......... Is India not entitled to a mere word of assurance even after the stupendous sacrifice it has made for the Empire? What logic is this that teaches England to consider all sacrifice on our part as reasonable and all demands proceeding from us as unreasonable? We appeal to the British statesmen to brush up their soiled logic and to read times aright and to read things aright. India expects them to do their duty."

Comments on the action of the Police in stopping Mr. Khadilkar from delivering a speech at Belgaum on Home Rule.
Mahrátta (5), 11th Mar.

30. "The purport of Mr. Khadilkar's lecture at Dhárwár surely does not indicate that anything 'pernicious' would have been said by him in his lecture at Belgaum. But the authorities who issue notices scarcely ever seem to reason that way. They are served with 'information' which often distorts facts in a most ingenious manner. Upon the basis of such information are notices issued. The orders of the Punjáb and Delhi 'Durbars' are ever memorable instances of this blind way of the authorities. May it be that the 'frank' opinion of our Governor has been taken by lower officials as 'an order' on the part of the Bombay Government? We hope not. We are inclined to believe that His Excellency is anxious to see that our Home Rule propaganda should not be misinterpreted by other parts of the Empire including the people of the Mother-country. We believe that his 'advice' flowed from this 'sincere conviction'. But surely His Excellency cannot say that he would take it upon himself to 'silence' the educative propaganda for the sake of the propaganda itself.......... The authorities ought to know that 'Rights make might.'......... The Russian Government showed an appreciation of this truth when they issued the memorable proclamation that the Russian authorities had made up their minds to do justice to Poland and that Poland need no longer fear that she would remain a dependency of Russia after the war. We know that the effect of this proclamation was unique—that the Polish people rushed forward with unprecedented eagerness to help the State which had acknowledgedly oppressed her in manifold ways. A mere pledge of the Czar that Poland would be free after the war was sufficient to rouse burning enthusiasm. Why should not this proved remedy against listlessness and apathy be tried here in India?"

Sátára should organise a Home Rule League.
Prakásh (102), 7th Mar.

31. The Prakásh considers it derogatory to the reputation of Sátára, once the centre of the Mahrátta Empire, that it should not have up till now taken any serious steps for the organisation of a Home Rule League though the rest of the Maháráshtra has been alive with the movement all the time. It, therefore, calls upon the local leaders to move in the matter and considers that if the different talukas of Sátára divide the work between themselves through the Taluba Sabhas, where they exist, the district will be easily able to secure three thousand members.

Government service does not afford sufficient scope for patriotic service.
Message (6), 9th Mar.

32. "If a high court Vakil earnestly working for his country is given a High Court Judgeship, then he leaves his patriotic work altogether and forgets everything about his country. Service under Government does not afford sufficient scope for patriotic service. This is clearly explained in a Nationalist paper thus: 'Every man who enters the Government service forfeits his birthright as a child of the soil, and he can no more serve the true interest of the Motherland. His career can serve only to tighten the foreign hold and prolong our present political serfdom. But oftener, to serve his alien master, he has to go against his country, for the interests of the Government are in some cases not the interests of the people. The rulers and the ruled in India stand face to face in opposition and who deserts his post and goes over to the hostile camp loses for ever the right and privilege of living and dying for the land of his birth. What to think of that education which has bred no spirit of independence? They keep their body but lose their soul. Is bread so dear and manhood so cheap? Behold the birds in the air and beasts in their den!—they too feel for their kith and kin, but we in our struggle for existence never feel the least hesitation in going against our country'. We want a body of Indians whose chief and prime business in life should be political work. This is the greatest need of our present situation."

Comments on the debate in the Imperial Legislative Council over the Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma's resolution regarding primary education.
Young India (11), 7th Mar.

33. Commenting upon the debate in the Imperial Legislative Council over the resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma on the subject of making primary education universal, compulsory and free throughout the country, Young India makes the following remarks on the views expressed by Sir Sankaran Nair:—"One wonders, while one is reading this, whether it is the Indian Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council or some versatile alien bureaucrat that is speaking. It is indeed remarkable that in these days when the South Indian Association, Limited, of Madras, claiming to speak for 40 million non-Brahmanas of the Presidency from which both the mover of the resolution and his esteemed opponent hail is working for the education of the masses, Sir Sankaran should have urged that there is no popular demand. He held that the objections which prevented the acceptance of Mr. Gokhale's Bill held good even to-day and, therefore, he very 'sympathetically' opposed the resolution.......... What was very striking in the debate was the manner in which official members made the late Mr. Gokhale a convenient peg to hang their pet views on. One official member said most authoritatively that Gokhale did not want this and did not ask for that. Another said that Gokhale wanted a particular course to be pursued and a third said that Gokhale's ideal was less ambitious. But nobody cared to bear in mind, in the first place that five years have already rolled by since Mr. Gokhale attempted to bring about by legislative pressure a quickening of the tardy processes of educational progress.......... It is impossible to believe that the Government of India is labouring under the impression that the chariot of Indian progress has come to a standstill since 1912. During the last few weeks, a large number of meetings has been held in this city alone, not by the intellectual classes but by extremely backward classes, who have been insistently demanding free and compulsory education from the Corporation. A similar desire actuates the people elsewhere.......... The Honourable Mr. Sharp said that the Government of India could lay down a broad policy, and this they had done. This, we presume, is the policy which was outlined in the now famous Resolution of February 1913. But has any local Government followed it or even tried to do so? It did not seem to us from the recent debate on Mr. Patel's resolution in the local Council that any such broad policy existed. The Honourable Mr. Chaubal pleaded, we still remember, that any favourable action his Government might take, would militate against the declared policy of the Supreme Government, and he therefore declined on behalf of his Government to accept it. Will some one kindly explain the apparent discrepancy?"

Comments on the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council on the subject of India's contribution to the War.
Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 10th Mar.

34. Commenting upon the resolution moved by the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya at a recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council suggesting a modification in the arrangement as regards India's share in the burden of the war and his protest against the procedure adopted in the matter in not consulting the Council, the Praja Mitra and Pársi writes:—The resolution was not quite in keeping with the views of the Indian public and we are, therefore, glad that it has been withdrawn. We, however, sympathise with the contention that the Government were wrong in arriving at a decision without consulting the Council. We wish the Finance Member had deemed it wise to explain the situation. If India's contribution to the War had been made with the consent of the Council, it would have tended to raise the posi-

[illegible] of India in the eyes of the Colonies who now might point their finger at the fact that Government did not deem it expedient to consult the representatives of the people in such a matter of Imperial importance. We are constrained to say that the Honourable Member showed narrowness of mind by suggesting a decrease in India's contribution to the war. We feel sure that with the increase in our commercial activities we shall in a few years be able to pay off the country's liabilities.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council on the working of the Defence of India Act.

Hindusthán (17), 9th Mar.

35. Referring to the resolution brought by the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy in the Imperial Legislative Council on the subject of the administration of the Defence of India Act, the Hindusthán remarks that Government's attitude in rejecting even such a modest resolution was one of obstinacy and that the joint appeals of all the non-official members of the Council had failed to produce any effect on them. The paper then goes on:—Who is to blame if, as the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy says, the rejection by Government of his request for submitting cases coming under the Defence of India Act to a body including, among others, a judicial officer, spreads disappointment among the public? Where would be the wonder if it made the people of Bengal, who complain most against the working of the Act, more discontented than before? The demand was not one for a repeal of the Act in question. It only urged that every case coming within the purview of the Act should be placed before judicial officers. Some of the members were prepared not to press for the inclusion of an Indian barrister in the body proposed to be established for dealing with such cases, and yet the placing of this very slight check upon the powers vested in the Executive was refused. Those who wish Indians to refrain from bringing forward for discussion important questions will judge for themselves whether such a policy on the part of Government is farsighted or not.

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's refusal in the House of Commons to raise the Excise Duties.

Mahrátta (5), 11th Mar.

36. "As a grateful nation we are thankful that the Government of India and the Secretary of State exhibited a laudable firmness in refusing the unjust request of the Manchester magnates to raise the countervailing Excise duties to the level of the Import duties. The imposition of the Excise Duties has been so bitterly deprecated by Indian public opinion that no amount of sophistry would afford it even a semblance of justification. To have raised the duties would in the circumstances have amounted to an unmitigated sin. We are glad that Mr. Chamberlain stood firm, and refused to be bullied. But we regret his attempted explanation. He said that to have raised the countervailing duties would have created so much indignation in the country as to have marred the prospects of the help India was giving. Here a motive of give-and-take has been attributed to India. Mr. Chamberlain did not maintain the justice of the Indian demand. His words convey that India has escaped an unjust tax not because Parliament was averse to it, but because they did not want India to be displeased at this critical time. Utterances such as these from the lips of responsible officials create in the mind of the guileless journalist an impression that leaders of English political life are governed by motives which are not necessarily altruistic. It is impressions such as these that he paraphrases. Bureaucracy has, as shown above, a hand in creating these impressions for which the poor journalist is at times made to suffer."

Comments on the Secretary of State's reply to the Government of India's despatch on indentured labour.

Hindusthán (17), 3rd Mar.

37. Commenting upon the reply of the Secretary of State for India to the Government of India's despatch on the subject of indentured Labour the Hindusthán remarks that Mr. Chamberlain has not understood the forces underlying the agitation against the indenture system and that he has in his above mentioned reply made an exhibition of his great ignorance of Indian affairs. It remaks that that agitation is not influenced by any motives of retaliation for the disabilities the free

Indian immigrants have to labour under in the Colonies. Is it not surprising, inquires the paper, that such confusion should arise in the mind of the Secretary? In its view this very erroneous belief on his part establishes the truth of the opinion that administration of India from a distance of six thousand miles is almost an impossible or at least an extremely difficult task and it only strengthens the demand of self-government for India. Referring to the Secretary's belief that the status of indentured women in the colonies, per se, does not expose them to ill-treatment to anything like the extent represented in some quarters, the paper wishes that an English translation of a book published by Pundit Totaram Sanadhya, wherein he has drawn a graphic picture of the condition of indentured Indian labourers, may be sent to Mr. Chamberlain for perusal. It believes that such a course will give this ignorant Indian Secretary the necessary enlightenment on the subject and will induce him to instantly abolish the system. It concludes with remarking that, whatever may be the length of the period of indentures, the Indian public opinion will not accept the system under any conditions whatever.

Comments on the High Court's decision in the Jain Vijaya Press forfeiture of security case.
Mahrátta* (5), 11th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 8th Mar.

38. "The forfeiture of the first security of the Jain Vijaya Press at Surat, and the rejection of the application of the printer, adds another sufferer to the long list of victims of the octopus of the Press Act. Of course it is impossible in every case to criticize the judgments of the highest tribunal on merits and when a question of principle is concerned the views expressed on either side would inevitably be divergent. In this particular case opinions might differ as to whether a particular passage falls within the scope of the Press Act. We are concerned not so much with the over strict view taken by the law Courts, as with the vagaries of the Act itself which has made such cases possible. A most objectionable Act creates such cases and the Act in its turn is sought to be justified on the strength of those unfortunate instances of wich it was the origin. We have thus a vicious argument in a circle. Even astute men like Lord Chelmsford could not escape the fallacy which certain English papers have been endeavouring to elevate into a strong argument in favour of retaining an Act which every principle of English justice must reprobate. What is the propriety of the proud boast of the freedom of the press if the vaunted freedom cannot allow free expression of opinion?" [The Praja Mitra and Pársi writes:—The unanimous finding of the High Court judges will tend to strengthen the position of those who are opposed to the liberty of the Press. The pamphlet in question issued by the Jain Vijaya Press is an outcome of folly and its publication during the time of the war when people are expected to help Government financially and by military service shows the morbid condition of the minds of its writer and publisher. The publisher, instead of pleading for mercy, had the audacity to appeal against the order of Government. The appeal will be an eye-opener to many and convince them of the necessity of compelling certain sentimental visionaries to sever their connection with the Press and of taking steps to maintain its prestige and strengthening the relations between the rulers and the ruled. The Press Association would do well to appoint a Vigilance Committee to help Government in purging the Press of undesirable elements.]

Indu Prakash (36), 10th Mar., Eng. cols.

39. "The recent Press Act case decided by the Bombay High Court was an unfortunate one from more than one point of view......... The Hon'ble Justice Macleod's judgment, short as it is, is objectionable in more than one way. It is a great boon to all the righful political educators that Justice Shah was a judge junior to Mr. Justice Macleod so that he could at once correct a mischief that was likely to spread by a greater part of Justice Macleod's judgment. What we have in mind is the interpretation of the word 'Swaraj.' Justice Batchelor scrupulously abstains from saying anything on the point. Then comes Justice Macleod who says it means nothing short of independence, and inasmuch as he was told that nowadays the word Swaraj meant 'self-government within the Empire' or 'self-government on colonial lines', Justice Macleod claims to go behind or enter into an imaginary ignorant reader [illegible] says that the word should mean only what he understood it to mean in the mind of that imaginary reader. Now what is Justice Macleod's title to say anything of the kind? Justice Macleod knows little outside the town and island of Bombay. If Justice Batchelor had said anything of the kind there was some meaning in it, as that learned judge did work in the mofussil. But there is not the slightest warrant for Justice Macleod's entering into what can most safely be called speculation of a dangerous kind. His argument on the point is astounding. It shows ignorance of ordinary convention. Can he say that he uses every word of his judgment in its root meaning?......... He says an ignorant reader would understand in the way he did. Perhaps that is so. But, then, where does he get it that an ignorant reader of the type he creates would read the pamphlet? It is only the person who does take some interest in these movements, who breathes the air of political progress and political thought that is expected to read this pamphlet.......... The word Swarajya has a history behind it of more than ten years. Dadabhoy Naoroji used it for the first time within the memory of the present young generation in the year 1906, and then the word went up to the High Court of Calcutta and was accepted as meaning nothing more than 'self-government within the Empire.' The word has since then been used, as Justice Shah says, and in the eyes of the public used with the sanction of the judicial tribunals, in that sense alone. No Indian now understands it in any other meaning. If Justice Macleod had asked for evidence on the point, he would have got witnesses of all positions and of all shades of opinion to testify to that. Mr. Justice Macleod appears to possess Chamberlainite ignorance of political writings.......... We are glad that there was Justice Shah—an incomparably more competent judge to say what he did say—to correct Justice Macleod's mistake.......... All thanks are due to Justice Shah for his rare courage and promptness in nipping in the veriest bud a mischief that would have sorely disturbed all right political education."

The Belgaum District Conference and the Mamlatdar of Chikodi (Belgaum).
Kesari (95), 6th March.

40. Preparations are being made to hold a District Conference at Chikodi (Belgaum) next month. We learn from a correspondent that the Mamlatdar of Chikodi has issued the following order to the village officers:—"We understand that the District National Congress will meet at Chikodi next month. You are not to help it in any way. If you do, you will be duly punished." We welcome the Mamlatdar's definition of the Conference as the "District National Congress" although it is a misnomer. How could the poor village officers possibly help the Conference? Or was the order indirectly meant for others? The Mamlatdar could very well have spared himself the trouble of issuing the order. The Indian National Congress is an institution recognised by Government as being conducted on strictly constitutional lines and it is a mistake to treat suspiciously the District Conference which is being held under the auspices of the District Congress Committee.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. W. C. Madge's minute of dissent appended to the Report of the Public Service Commissions.
Young India (11), 7th Mar.

41. Mr. L. G. Khare contributes an article to Young India in which he criticises the views expressed by Mr. W. C. Madge in his minute of dissent appended to the Report of the Public Service Commission. In the course of his article, the writer observes:—"For this community Mr. Madge claims special consideration. Why? because some members of it have a tendency to 'revert to the British type'. It is very unfortunate, I am sure, as I have come into personal and intimate touch with many real gentlemen among Eurasians, but, I say, it is unfortunate that the average Indian's idea of an Anglo-Indian is that of a ticket-collector on our Indian railways. The Indian very often cannot understand his English. He looks a 'Sab,' but his vocabulary consists largely of the words 'man' and 'b.l.y' and the Indian shudders at this Sab's aptitude in mental arithmetic, when he has to pay excess fare. The Indian notices that the community to which this 'Sab' belongs, considers the Railway services as its monopoly, and when individual members of it are rude to him and call him a 'nigger' he cannot understand how the result of the amours of a Tommy Atkins and a scavenger woman can insult a pure Aryan, and bear arms in the bargain. That is the situation: it is no good blinking it: yet says Mr. Madge, the community has been deprived of "its former place in the sun' and he notices with regret that 'the great bulk of the expenditure on Anglo-Indian education has come from private sources and not from State grants, which have been lavishly given for Indian education'. After this, we must really recommend Mr. Madge for a K. C. I. E., so lavishly erroneous are his ideas about the State support of Indian education. Mr. Madge complains that 'the exclusion in recent years of the domiciled community from appointments to which they ought to be eligible because they have rendered excellent service in them is to be lamented' and he has the temerity to observe its injustice and the political danger it is brewing. So this is a whine for more loaves of office, coupled with the threat that the refusal of the request will spell political danger!......... According to Mr. Madge the atmosphere of British institutions impregnated with the collateral home associations of Britain is preferable to that found in India. Thank you Mr. Madge: but many of us here are now earnestly engaged in making young Indians feel that the real 'home' atmosphere is to be found in India, and we are going to trust to the atmosphere of the land of our birth, not to the land which a mixed race will fondly call its 'home'."

Question of the early closing of liquor-shops in Bombay.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 5th Mar.

42. The Jám-e-Jamshed refers to the petition recently submitted by the wine merchants and retail license holders of Bombay to the Collector of Bombay protesting against certain suggestions of the Advisory Committee. It rebuts arguments of the petitioners and tries to uphold the suggestions of the Advisory Committee and asks the Collector to make the rule for the early closing of liquor-shops applicable equally to the foreign and country liquor-shops, as any preferential treatment given to foreign liquor-shops tends to encourage the use of inferior foreign liquors to the great harm of those who make use of them. It asks the Collector of Bombay to give a fair trial to the suggestion about opening toddy shops early and closing them late, but at the same time requests him to consult the wine merchants before taking any steps that are likely to affect their interests.

Contradiction of allegation that both the instalments of land revenue are being simultaneously recovered in parts of the Sátára District.

Prakásh (102), 7th Mar.

43. The Prakásh publishes the following in connection with the statement contained in paragraph 43 of Weekly Report No. 7 of 1917:—We published a letter in our issue of the 14th February 1917, under the heading "Land assessment" from a correspondent who says that both the instalments of land assessment are being simultaneously recovered. The attention of the Collector having been drawn to that letter he informs us that the statement of our correspondent is erroneous. We are thankful to the Collector for this information.

LEGISLATION.

The Income-tax and the Super-Tax Bills in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar., Eng. cols.

44. "The Income-Tax Bill called forth some just criticism. We are afraid the penal provisions now introduced in case returns are not filled in are somewhat stringent and having regard to the attitude of the income-tax authorities in the moffussil they will be productive of not a little hardship and dissatisfaction. The Income Super-Tax Bill also evoked criticism, in so far as it affects undivided Hindu families. The income-tax, even as it is, works grave injustice in the case of undivided Hindu families consisting of a large number of dependents, as no such circumstances are taken into account in the determination of the tax on the income it may be, of a single earning member. The administration of the new provisions relating to the super-tax will necessarily hasten the division of treatment which has been accorded [illegible] undivided families. We wish the Finance Member had taken this circumstance into consideration and accepted some modified proposal. No doubt the tax will affect very wealthy families only. But we do not think the State should by any action of its own interfere with the integrity or the domestic traditions and arrangements of old and respectable families that do not like the idea of partition. Undivided Hindu families have been placed on the same footing as firms and will be liable to the payment of the super-tax to the same extent and on the same principle as the latter."

EDUCATION.

India is not yet fit for the compulsory system of education.

Surat Akhbár (71), 5th Mar.

45. The introduction of a system of compulsory education in this country is an impossibility. They are revolutionists who wish to implant all European institutions into India. Think of the wide gulf that exists between India and Europe! Education in Europe is 300 years old, whereas in India it dates back 75 years. In the latter country it is, thus, in its infancy and it has not yet attained proper development and, therefore, those who make a precipitate demand for compulsory education do not seem to have any experience of educational institutions. Irresponsible persons have strained every nerve to raise a hue and cry against the British Government for their having flatly refused to introduce compulsory education in India. From the beginning we have expressed our disapproval of compulsory education which we regard only as a white elephant. [The paper here refers to the order issued by His Highness the Gaekwar to close 300 schools in the Baroda State as a sign of the failure of the compulsory system in that State and remarks:—We hope the advocates of the compulsory system will, after this experience, no longer trouble the British Government at the present juncture.]

Gloomy prospects about primary education being made free and compulsory.

Prakásh (102), 7th Mar.

46. Recent events have shown that the attitude of Government with regard to education is most illiberal. When the Honourable Mr. Patel moved his resolution about free and compulsory primary education last year in the Bombay Legislative Council, he was told that the matter lay in the hands of the Government of India. But now we find that when the Honourable Mr. Sarma brought a similar motion before the Imperial Legislative Council, the Honourable Sir Sankaran Nair, who opposed the motion on behalf of Government, declared that the matter lay within the purview of the different Local Governments as conditions differed in each province! The upshot of all this will be that the people will have to rot in illiteracy.

Comments on the permission given by the Bombay Government to Messrs. Macmillan and Company to raise the prices of the cloth editions of the vernacular readers.

Young India (11), 7th Mar.

47. Commenting upon the permission recently given by the Bombay Government to Messrs. Macmillan and Company to raise the prices of the cloth editions of the vernacular readers and to reduce the discount on them to the trade, Young India remarks:—"It is natural for the firm to have suggested such a course; it was in their own interest. But the Government has not merely to look at the convenience of one party. It does not seem as if Government considered the interests of the public in complying with the request of the firm. Apart from this, we do not think the agreement entered into between the Government and the firm provided for any periodical increase of price. If the cost of paper and cloth had gone up, it does not alter the agreement by one whit. As a matter of fact, Messrs. Macmillan hold the monopoly in this matter and any loss which they might be put to during the period of stress would be insignificant compared with the profit they must have made in previous years. Even if the firm were working at a loss, it is most unreasonable that the agreement should be revised to suit the convenience of one party. We cannot at any rate commend the favoured treatment which has been accorded to the firm by the Government."

Alleged objectionable line in the Third Gujarati Reader from the point of view of Muhammadan religious sentiment.
Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 10th March.

48. One Haji Dawood Hyderabadwala addresses a letter to the Akhbár-e-Islám wherein he refers to the protest raised by a meeting of the Anjuman-e-Islám, Rander, against a line appearing in the eighth lesson of Book III of the Gujarati Reading Series (vide paragraph 53 of the W. R. No. 9 of 1917). He remarks that whatever may be the opinion of the learned members of the aforesaid Anjuman, he for one cannot understand how the line in question can be regarded as objectionable. He believes that it would be more advisable if the attention of the authorities were to be drawn to it after somebody has proved by facts and figures that the line is really objectionable. The writer also requests the editor of the paper to publish his own views in the matter.

MUNICIPALITIES.

Need of a mosque in the Chowpatty and Malábar Hill quarters in Bombay.
Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 7th Mar.

49. In the course of a* leading article, the Akhbár-e-Islám deprecates the cooling down of religious ardour among Muhammadans of the present day and greatly regrets the absence of any mosque to serve the Chowpatty and Malábár Hill quarters which, while having some places of worship for the Hindus and Parsis, are otherwise only studded with grand and lofty buildings belonging to different communities including the Muhammadans. It considers it to be the duty of rich Muhammadans residing in those two localities to erect a mosque in the vicinity to be used as a place of public worship by their Moslem servants and the poor Muhammadan working people residing in those parts. The paper is confident in its belief that if a charitably disposed rich Muhammadan comes forward to erect a mosque in these localities he will, in all probability, be able to secure the requisite site free of charge either from Government, the City Improvement Trust or the Bombay Municipality.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Defence of India Force.
Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar.

1. We are aware that the Indian Defence Force Act does not satisfy a thousandth part of the aspirations of the Indian people. The attempts of non-official members to effect modification in the Act have failed and the inequality existing between the Indians and Europeans in the army has not been removed. But the Act has afforded a very small opening for Indians to enlist themselves as Volunteers. We do not know when the doors of the military service will be fully opened to the Indians. But we trust that now that the progress of events have given Indian sepoys the opportunity of fighting shoulder to shoulder with the Allied troops against an European enemy and have given the Indians a chance of enlisting themselves in the Defence Force, a time will certainly come when the doors of the military service will be thrown open to Indians. But before such an event comes to pass we should fully avail ourselves of the present opportunity offered to us and enlist ourselves in the Defence Force in as large numbers as possible. If many young men do not respond to the present call the officials will say that the Indians are lacking in war-like spirit and that they are not fit to govern themselves inasmuch as they have not the zeal to defend their own country. We should lay aside our grievances and should overlook our disabilities in the matter of commissions and should take the military training that will be given to us so that we may be qualified for officers' posts. There is at present no immediate danger of India being invaded, but can we guarantee India's immunity from such an invasion? Who will defend our homes in the event of an invasion if we do not possess any military training? Shall we at that time allow our motherland to be plundered and violated? The mettle of the Indian people is now going to be tested. We shall not be required at present to shed our blood in the defence of India. But in future other nations might cast longing eyes on India and try to take possession of it. Indians should therefore, freely enlist themselves in the Indian Defence Force in order to be able to defend their mother country from foreign invasions. We hope our young men will not hesitate to take the full advantage of the opportunity offered to them. You are at liberty to find fault with Government for not giving you all that you require, but by no means refrain from joining the Defence Force in a spirit of sulkiness.

Indian Loyalist (19), 15th Mar.; Káthiáwár Samáchár (64), 14th Mar.; Political Bhomio (New), 16th Mar.

2. If our young men do not join the Force on the score of their having not been given an assurance of being treated on a footing of equality with Europeans they will be merely making an exhibition of their weakness. We feel confident that the British Government will never be backward in bestowing political privileges on us when they are convinced of our fitness for them. The present time is not the one for asking rights but for preparing the way for the concession of political rights to our country by enlisting ourselves in the India Defence Force. [The Káthiáwár Samáchár expresses disappointment at the principle of compulsion not having been applied to Indians in the formation of the Defence of India Force and at the differential treatment given to Anglo-Indians. It appeals to the young men of Gujarát and Káthiáwár to enlist themselves in the Defence Force. The Political Bhomio writes in a similar strain.]

Akbár-e-Islám (52), 14th Mar.; Bombay Samáchár (55), 15th Mar.

3. The Akhbár-e-Islám expresses surprise at the indifference shown by Muhammadan leaders in not calling public meetings for exhorting young Muhammadans to enlist themselves in the Indian Defence Force and exhorts them to lose no more time in organising such meetings. It expresses hope that if an appeal is made to Muhammadan young men for enlistment a large number of them will respond to the call as the martial spirit is ingrained in them. It asks political leaders to refrain from taking part in political movements and to direct their energies to popularising the war loan and encouraging enlistment in the Indian Defence Force. A 'Jain' writes to the Bombay Samáchár exhorting young men belonging to the Jain community to enlist themselves in the Indian Defence Force. He tells them that the Jain religion does not in any way prohibit its followers taking up arms in self-defence. He, however, asks those who have conscientious objection to shedding blood to form themselves into a Jain Ambulance Corps and to help Government by relieving those in pain and suffering. He concludes by asking the Jains to subscribe to the war loan.]

Mufid-e-Rozgár (122), 14th Mar.

4. Referring to Mr. Chamberlain's utterance in the Commons regarding the granting of commissions to Indians, the Mufid-e-Rozgár regrets that neither the Viceroy nor the Commander-in-Chief made such an announcement and that such a momentous declaration was made out side India. It suggests that a Cadet College for Indians should be established quickly whence Indians, on completing a course of necessary training, may be gazetted to commissioned ranks direct.

Comments on a speech of Dr. Allan, Principal of the Engineering College, Poona, exhorting students to join the Indian Defence Force.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.; Mahrátta (5), 18th Mar.

5. "The public has been favoured with many an instance of the idiosyncracy of the Principal of the Engineering College by our esteemed contemporary, the Chronicle. One more instance has been added to that long list. In the little speech which Dr. Allan made to exhort the students of his college to join the Defence of India Force, he was pleased to make some irritating and uncalled for references to the kind of work which those who join the Force are expected to do. Dr. Allan appears to be endowed with little imagination. He tells his students that their services are required 'not simply to fight the outside enemy but to put down civil disturbances like the joining of all Mill-hands of Bombay at strike or a railway strike at Poona'. In a Machiavelian tone he says 'Non-obedience to any orders of the Government on your part is a mutiny.' Not content with these remarks, Dr. Allan goes to the extent of attributing to some of his students ulterior motives of 'forcing the Government to give up certain rights and privileges at the point of a bayonet.' We wonder whether the speech had its desired effect upon the students. Far from being encouraging, it is beyond doubt calculated to create disaffection amongst those who had the misfortune to listen to Dr. Allan's oratory. We would be surprised if the Educational Department which is well-known for its vigilance should pass over this mischievous speech of the head of the Engineering College." [The Mahrátta writes :—" The Principal must be congratulated on his frankness. But we feel that this plain speaking was not necessary. An educated youth, as the Principal inwardly feared, cannot think, without a twitching of the conscience, of the possibility of his having to fire on his own countrymen. But he will solve this problem in one of two ways. He will either keep away from volunteering or having volunteered will, if his conscience so dictates at the moment, politely decline to obey an order to fire on his fellow-countrymen. The martial law is there to take care of such a conscientious objector. There is no reason why educated Indians should keep away from joining the Indian Defence Force, simply because there is a possibility of their having to face martial law for breach of dicipline in a delicate moment. The possibility may never turn into actuality."]

Attitudes of the Principals of the Engineering College and the Fergusson College towards students wishing to join to the Indian Defence Force contrasted.

Message (6), 13th and 14th Mar.

6. "It is surprising that the Principal of the Poona Engineering College has had the extraordinary temerity of delivering an extraordinary address to his students in connection with volunteering. Whatever one's individual feelings may be in respect of certain matters, it is absurd that one should address a community of young men in the manner chosen by Mr. Allen. He is not an ideal principal; there cannot be much doubt about it. But it was not certainly within his province to tell those who were anxious to volunteer that there was some ulterior object at the back of their minds about forcing the responsible Government to give up certain rights and privileges at the point of the bayonet. Such insinuation is not only mischievous but also derogatory to the self-respect of the students. The way chosen by Principal Allen is not the best method of making the students understand the measure in the right spirit. We trust Government will put a little restraint on the mischievous propensities of Mr. Allen and kindly tell him to mind his own business." [In the next issue the paper writes under the heading "Look at this Principal and that":—"Principal Paranjpye of the Fergusson College, we understand, is trying to induce several college-students to offer themselves as recruits for the Defence of India Force. He has given appropriate facilities to Professors Bendale, M. R. Paranjpye, Kelkar and others of his staff so that they too might join and set an example to students which they might follow. But we hear that in the same city of Poona, another Principal of a College—Dr. Allen of the Engineering College, speaking at the recruiting meeting, conjured up such an imaginary but lurid and doleful picture of another mutiny and the horrid slaughter of Indians by Indians that some students who meant to join the Force were to a certain extent discouraged by the speech. Some of them, we hear, postponed, if not relinquished, their noble purpose, which the Viceroy said was as patriotic as it was for the good of the Empire. Who is fostering patriotism more, Dr. Allen or Professor Paranjpye?"]

India's war gift to England.
Message (6), 11th Mar.

7. The Message expresses agreement with the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's resolution in connection with the hundred millions war gift to England and remarks:—"If the Viceroy, the Indian Government and the Secretary of State ignored public opinion, His Majesty's Government should have at least ascertained before gratefully accepting the offer whether the responsible public opinion in this country had been consulted. Such a course would not only have 'touched the warm heart of India' but it would have also made the Government in this country show a little better regard for it in future. This is one more instance of Mr. Lloyd George's omission to show adequate regard for India, and he should realize that it is not these omissions which touch the warm heart of India.......... The right thing for the Government to do at this stage, would have been, as our contemporary of the Times of India has very rightly observed, to raise the largest possible sum, both by increased taxation and by loan, for the prosecution of the war.......... Such a course would not only have commended itself to Indian opinion as a thoroughly equitable arrangement but would have evoked its heartfelt gratitude for the same. Now that Government have committed us definitely to a course without even an effort at previous consultation, may be of a formal character, if we submit to it, it is quite a different thing. But in principle, belated as it may seem, we are constrained to enter our respectful but emphatic protest against the course pursued by the Viceroy."

Young India (11), 14th Mar.; Kesari (95), 13th Mar.

8. "The unceremonious manner of the Government of India in springing upon the people of this country the surprise of the 100 millions war gift provoked a warm and perfectly dignified protest from Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya....... Before the 'gift' was decided upon there was not even the show of a formal consultation with the representatives of the people in Council. The Imperial Legislative Council was all the while in session and if the responsible authorities had the scantiest consideration for the opinion of the people's representatives they would have availed themselves of the earliest opportunity to obtain their approval before the bargain was closed between the two Governments. Having regard to the fact that the Council had registered two resolutions previously 'to support the honor, dignity and prestige of the Empire' the Government of India had no reason to think that on this occasion when they were definitely committing the country to a very serious responsibility, they would not get the support of the people's representatives. The policy pursued by them in this matter indicates that in the dealings of the executive with the people, trust plays but little part. When Pandit Malaviya lodged his formal but emphatic protest, it was expected that Sir William Meyer or some other responsible Member of Government would meet the charge fairly and squarely. Nothing of the kind was done and Sir William Meyer, who spoke for Government, simply evaded the points raised by the Pandit by telling him that he should not have made a speech—why? Is it because it left no room for the Government of India to reply? [The paper here takes the Pioneer to task for its 'mean and undignified attack' on the Pandit in this connection and for calling upon the people of the United Provinces to disassociate themselves from him, and concludes:—] May we add that not only the United Provinces, but the whole of 'Indian' India associates itself in every particular with its revered and tried leader. We know that in the direction that he leads would be found the best interests of the country, the Government and the Empire." [The Kesari remarks:—The Honourable Mr. Malaviya was right in contending that the Imperial Legislative Council should have been consulted before Government contributed a sum of £100 million towards the expenses of the war, as the revenues of India cannot be devoted to any particular object without the consent of the Council. It is impossible of course that this consent would not have been forthcoming from a Council which contains such amiable gentlemen as Sir G. Chitnavis and Mr. Das! Any further discussion on this subject, however, is unfruitful and we allude to it simply with a view to preventing a similar irregularity in the future.]

Bombay Samáchár (55), 17th Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 15th Mar.;

9. The Bombay Samáchár thanks His Excellency the Viceroy for his message to the people of India reminding them of the opportunity presented to them of proving their loyalty by subscribing to the war loan. It dwells upon the benefits India has derived from British Rule in India and on the sympathy evinced by Lords Hardinge and Chelmsford in the solution of Indian problems and expresses hope that India will enjoy commercial prosperity and increasing political rights in the near future. It makes a strong appeal to the Indian people to hasten the day of the Empire's victory and the return of peace by subscribing generously to the War Loan. [The Sánj Vartamán dwells upon the protection offered to Indian commerce by the British Navy and exhorts the people to subscribe to the War Loan with a view to ensuing an early peace.

Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar.; Kesari (95), 13th Mar.

10. Commenting upon the speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Willingdon at the War Loan meeting held at the Town Hall, Bombay, the Gujaráti writes:—We are of opinion that if Lord Willingdon had not asked the people to refrain from political movements but had shown them the direction their political activities should take, he would have been able to secure a better contribution to the loan of victory. The repeated exhortations made to the people to give up political agitation has effects that are far from desirable, and they begin to ask as to why they should trust Government when they themselves are not being trusted by their rulers. People do not understand why Government should be so afraid of political agitation. Have not bodies conducting political agitation supported and made appeals for enlistment in the Defence Force and subscription to the War Loan? His Excellency referred to the ignorance prevailing among the people about the gravity of the situation; but it must be remembered that their ignorance is due to the lack of facilities for imparting education to them. Is it not, therefore, strange that officials should not support suggestions coming from popular leaders for providing the people with additional facilities for receiving education? People are being asked to effect economies to subscribe to the War Loan. Should not Government set them an example by curtailing the expenses on the migrations to the hills as long as the war lasts? We would appeal to the people to subscribe to the War Loan and show that they are capable of defending their country. This is the time for the people to show their fitness for swarajya and we feel sure they will prove equal to the occasion. The Kesari says:—At the War Loan meeting held at Bombay His Excellency Lord Willingdon advised the people to suspend the Home Rule movement during the progress of the war. At this meeting His Excellency also read a letter from Mr. Lloyd George appealing for the co-operation of the Indians. We are of course ready to give every possible help to the Empire at this crisis. But should we not have an adequate return for our sacrifices? It is unfair to ask Indians to suspend the Home Rule movement during the war. Mr. Lloyd George himself has offered Home Rule to Ireland on certain conditions although the war is still in progress. Why should India wait then till the the war ends? It is in the interests both of India and the Empire that Government should give a definite promise of conferring Home Rule on India soon after the war. The Home Rule movement does not clash with the true interests of the Empire and we should urge people to ignore the call to suspend the movement.

Alleged apathy of the Indian Government in taking steps to check extravagance and enforce economy in view of the war.

Sind Observer (10), 28th Feb.

11. Discussing the question of the "urgent need for economy" the Sind Observer remarks:—"The people of the British Isles have been told with a directness that must have come as a shock to many, and the Government at home has not confined itself to mere words, but is taking action to ensure that the necessary economy is enforced. In India Government have not as yet considered the matter, and a considerable proportion of educated people do not seem to be aware that we are at war. But what can we expect when the Lieutenant-Governor of a great province is spending lakhs of rupees on constructing an artificial lake whereon he and his friends will sail yachts, and when the same satrap directs that no lady should appear at his court in the same costume twice? This extravagant conduct, when we are supposed to be straining every nerve to overcome a powerful foe, is nothing short of wicked! The British Government and people are proverbially slow to adopt stringent measures and prefer to allow themselves to drift, but one would have thought that the past two and a half years have been full of useful lessons. It is simply astounding to see ships freighted with luxuries and unnecessaries arriving at our ports when tonnage is so short and when every extra ton carried adds to the responsibilities of the Navy. It is disgusting to see the reckless expenditure which certain people indulge in when thousands of men are putting up with terrible hardships in the fight for freedom."

Rást Goftár (28), 11th Mar.

12. The Rást Goftár quotes figures showing the import of foreign wines, biscuits and other foodstuffs, motors, etc., in India in the course of the last year and asks why the Indian Government do not teach the people to be more economical during the present crisis by placing restrictions on the import of such articles of luxury, as the British Government have done in England in the case of motor cars, tea, coffee, cocoa, etc. It believes that India can, at this juncture, very well afford to be without those delicately woven silk fabrics which are still being imported from France, Japan and China. It then remarks that the reason why the authorities do not take such a step is that by doing so many of the English manufactories would have to be closed. The paper inquires why the British Government have imposed restrictions on the import of jute and tea from India and thereby injured the interests of the poor Indian agriculturists. It remarks that this policy of the British authorities is an exemplification of the adage about the willing horse being the most heavily loaded.

The fall of Bagdad.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 15th Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 16th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 14th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 14th Mar.; Bombay Samáchár (55), 17th Mar.

13. The Sánj Vartamán expresses joy at the occupation of Bagdad by the British and adds:—The surrender of General Townshend had now been fully revenged. The Turks were able to spread their machinations in Persia and Afghanistan in the past, but the passing of Bagdad in British hands will make a strong impression in Afghanistan and Persia and will put an end to the troubles on the frontiers. [The Jám-e-Jamshed is of opinion that the part played by Indian troops in the occupation of Bagdad will greatly redound to the credit of India and will close the mouths of some critics of India who took delight in belittling the part played by her in the war. The Hindusthán remarks that the praise bestowed on the valour of Indian troops in connection with the fall of Bagdad ill accords with the preferential treatment given to Anglo-Indians in the Indian Defence Force, which, it is afraid, will be regarded as an ill advised and unjust step by the neutral countries. It expresses hope that the sense of justice of the British Parliament will prevail in the end and the disabilities of Indians will be removed and they will be given commissions in the army. The paper asks the Muhammadans not to regard the fall of Bagdad with any misgiving for it was no longer the captial of the Khalifs but was a centre of German intrigues and that, therefore, the passing of Bagdad into British hands should be welcomed by Indian Muhammadans. The Praja Mitra and Pársi also rejoices at the occupation of Bagdad and believes that the news of the British victory will greatly influence the Afghan tribes who will now cast in their lot with the British and cease giving trouble to Indian troops on the frontiers. The Bombay Samáchár dwells at length on the part played by Indian troops in the occupation of Bagdad and believes the victory will tend to encourage the troops fighting in other zones and stimulate them to achieve similar results.]

Rást Goftár (28), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

*14. "The news of the past week is the fall of Bagdad. And the news is memorable, momentous.......... The brilliant dash of General Maude has more than atoned for those grave errors of omission and commission which preluded and disfigured the Mesopotamian campaign and lost us the services of an exceedingly promising and valorous young General. The occupation of Bagdad spells a turning-point in the fortunes of the war in Western Asia so far as both England and Russia are concerned; and it irrevocably spells the knell of every long-pent, long-toiled hope and ambition on the part of Germany to secure an Open-Sesame to the East. There is an end also to that sordid misrule and corrupt régime of the Turk who had turned an ancient garden and haunt of beauty into an unpaved, unpath'd semi-wilderness."

Alleged dangers of belittling the enemy's strength and resources.

Sind Observer (10), 21st Feb.

15. Discussing the next move of the enemy, the Sind Observer writes:—"It has also been suggested that Hindenburg's plan is to swoop down upon Italy and to relieve the sore pressed Austrians, but this, too, is shown to be bristling with difficulties. Whatever course the great German strategist decides on, he will be supported whole-heartedly by the soldiery and it will be a bloody affair, for as we said above, the men can be readily induced to believe that they are about to end the war and urged to great effort and sacrifice. We noticed in the last Illustrated London News to hand a full page picture of a German prisoner taken on the Western Front and below we read that this sorry fellow who does not seem to have had a square meal for three weeks or more is a specimen of hundreds who are surrendering to the allied troops daily. We cannot imagine anything more mischievous. Does the London News wish us to believe that these miserable scare-crows are the men who are holding up the magnificent French and British soldiers with their stupendous supply of munitions? Such pictures and talk are worse than idle. The German army is still going strong, and this fact should be driven home as much as possible, so that there will be no dangerous relaxing on our part. The German soldier is still convinced that he can hack his way to victory because his Government is taking great care to keep ugly facts from him. He is not beaten yet and we must keep this in view. Just as the German navy has resorted to desperate deeds on sea and finds men to perform them, so on land there is no lack of stout hearts. Germany is most dangerous now owing to the wild anxiety which has hold of her rulers."

Reflections on the progress of the war.
Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 17th Mar.

16. The Akhbár-e-Islám ascribes the recent German retreat on the Western front partly to the weakness of the enemy and partly to their desire to occupy strong positions. It adds :—We do not think the enemy can afford to wage a defensive warfare as its subjects are tired of the war and want peace as early as possible. Besides, a defensive warfare will have an adverse effect on the economic position of Germany. It will, therefore, make a dash either for Paris or Calais. We have reason to think that the enemy will concentrate all its available strength and resources to take its revenge upon England for rejecting the peace terms by means of attacks by land as well as by sea. The occupation of Baghdad has added to the mortification of Germany and she will become desperate and make a last bid for victory. But we feel sure that Germany will sustain such a crushing defeat both on land and sea that her plans will be completely frustrated and she will never be able to raise her head again.

Comments on the formation of a Moslem committee for entertaining wounded Indian soldiers in Bombay.
Akhbar-e-Islám (52), 16th Mar.

17. Taking an appreciative note of the movement set on foot by some of the leading Muhammadan gentlemen of Bombay who met an the 13th instant at the Islam Club to appoint an Executive Committee for collecting funds from the Moslem community and for making necessary arrangements for the entertainment of wounded Indian soldiers during the continuance of the war, the Akhbár-e-Islám expresses its joy at the genuine spirit of patriotism now animating the Muhammadans of Bombay and the awakening that has taken place among them for supporting the British Government in the task of fighting the German enemy as evidenced by the abovesaid movement. It, however, declares that the sum of Rs. 2,506 collected at the above meeting is not adequate for the purpose of entertaining the wounded soldiers whose number is bound to be very large and it advises the Muhammadans to supplement the above collection by liberal contributions. The paper wishes that other sister communities might follow the example set by the Muhammadans in this matter. It concludes with remarking that the Moslems have yet to do much towards helping Government which, it believes, they will be able to accomplish by appointing committees, similar to the one mentioned above, for the purpose of co-operating with Government in other matters connected with the war.

The Indian Budget.
Message (6), 14th Mar.

18. "Since the year 1911-12, the Government of India have paid increased attention to the expansion of education and the increasing annual grants which formed a special feature of the Indian budget for three years before the war were evidence of Government's desire to spread education as widely as possible consistent with efficiency. Though so far as this country is concerned they have not yet been able to convince themselves that compulsion in education is a necessity, a great stimulus has been given to the spread of education......... The feeling of satisfaction at the increased importance which Government attach to education would have been enhanced if they had accepted the modest request of Mr. Srinivas Sastry for a small additional grant of Rs. 30 lakhs for elementary education. The request was by no means extravagant and the Government of India, who have never been mean or niggardly in regard to their expenditure, would not have found it difficult to find the small sum of an additional £200,000 for educational purposes. We are very grateful to them for providing a sum of Rs. 30 lakhs in the coming year for the improvement of the pay and prospects of teachers. It is a recurring grant and can be availed of for primary or secondary education as circumstances may demand. The improvement and training of teachers in primary and secondary schools is in itself an excellent object and nobody grudges, we hope, this item which aims at the raising of the efficiency of the teacher. If, as contended by Mr. Sastri, along with efficiency education proceeds pari passu, the result would be more excellent still.......... Educational expenditure may not be all important as compared with the expenditure on armaments; but it is undoubted that it is second to no other in importance or urgency. It, therefore, behoves Government in every way to stand by the principles to which they felt committed in pre-war years."

Bombay Samáchár (55),
12th Mar.

19. The Bombay Samáchár thanks the Government of India for the annual recurring grant of Rs. 30 lakhs provided by them in the Imperial Budget for the training of school teachers and for increasing the present scale of their salaries. It dwells upon the importance of giving preliminary training to teachers for better adapting them to their avocation and, referring to the paucity of the institutions for training them, welcomes the grant as likely to be useful in turning out a larger number of trained teachers than heretofore. The paper also commends the solicitude of Government for the improvement of the lot of teachers as evinced by their desire to earmark a portion of the abovementioned grant for increasing the present scale of their salaries. It expresses the hope that the liberal policy thus initiated by Government in the matter of education will not only be continued but will be allowed to attain fuller development with the return of normal times.

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th
Mar., Eng. cols.

*20. "Mr. Shrinivasa Shastri's resolution for the addition of Rs. 30,00,000 to the provision made for elementary education met its expected fate in the Imperial Legislative Council.......... Anticipating the objection which Government would offer Mr. Shastri emphatically pointed out 'that though the needs of the war were paramount, the needs of education and sanitation of the people came next in the order of importance.' Sir William Meyer's reply was disapppointing and evasive. Mr. Shastri's request cannot be complied with as there are many unforseen calls on the Exchequer. While Sir Meyer preached economy in the matter of Education, Sir Reginald Craddock rewarded the Police administration with a handsome grant of Rs. 10,00,000 for the brilliant services rendered by that department during the period of the war. We cannot admire the wisdom of this arrangement. It is a well known fact that the Police Department owes its existence chiefly to prevalence of crime and wrong which are in most cases the direct results of illiteracy and ignorance. Therefore logically speaking the more we educate people, the necessity for maintaining an efficient system of Police is considerably lessened."

Navsári Patriká (66),
11th Mar.

21. While commending the tact and farsightedness of Sir William Meyer in framing the new Indian Budget for the year 1917-18, the Navsári Patriká declares that the principle of political economy of meeting only the normal expenditure of a country by permanent taxation and of meeting sudden or occasional expenditure by raising loans is not observed in framing Indian Budgets. It does not approve of the policy followed as a matter of course, of raising by means of taxation more income than is necessary and then to utilise the balance towards the Army or Police Department or for the purposes of railways and irrigation works which could be better provided for by incurring debt. The paper, further, considers the annual payment of a sum of nine crores of rupees for 30 years towards making good India's proposed gift to Great Britain of 100 million pounds for war purposes to be a very heavy burden upon the country in her present economic condition. It, however, expresses gratification at the raising of the import duty on foreign piece-goods while leaving the excise duty where it was with prospect of its complete abolition in the future and regards it as a good set-off against the new war burden. It also advocates the application of the super-tax to annual incomes of Rs. 25,000 and upwards instead of to those of Rs. 50,000 and above as has been provided for in the Act. The paper declares that instead of imposing an additional duty of 2 pies on every maund of goods carried over the Indian Railways, which will affect the poor more than the rich, the tax ought to have been levied ad valorem. It also cannot view with approval the increase in the expenditure on the Army, the Political Department and the Railways, when education has received a grant of only Rs. 50 lakhs.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 14th Mar.

22. Referring to the Budget discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Bombay Samáchár expresses the wish that the people would carry into effect the suggestions made by the Honourable Sir Claude Hill while speaking on the subject of the development of Indian forests. It dwells on the necessity, on the part of the public, of starting joint stock companies for the purpose of the development of the paper pulp industry for which this country offers a very good field. It praises the intention of Government of calling in an expert for the purpose of raising a body of engineers skilled in forestry, but while appreciating the prospective benefits that might arise from the labours of such engineers remarks that the Forest Department should not benefit at the expense of agriculture. According to the paper the people wish that the activities of these engineers may not result in the area available for grazing cattle being diminished instead of being increased. It also expresses gratification at the statement made by Sir Pardey Lukis with regard to the efforts of Government in carrying on a vigorous campaign against the ravages of consumption and in encouraging scientific medical research undertaken by private individuals by rendering them help, as has been done in the case of Dr. Sudhamani Ghosh for enabling him to carry on his researches in the treatment of leprosy. The paper then refers to the observation made by Sir George Barnes in the Council, anticipating the possibility, in the future, of a curtailment of trade facilities on the Indian railways just as there has been a diminution in the facilities for sea-borne trade, and expresses the wish that the business community as well as the public will calmly put up with the difficulties that might arise from a shortage in the means of railway communication.

Message (6), 13th Mar.

23. "The cotton excise duty will continue to remain as it is at present, namely, 3½ per cent. We should have welcomed it as a small measure of justice if Government had decided to do away with this unfair, unjust and unequitable imposition on one of our most potential home industries. We accept, however, Sir William Meyer's assurance that this is not exactly the time to do away with a source of income. Our acceptance of this assurance would have been unreserved if he had taken steps to tap a new source of income by imposing a tax on the export of raw cotton. We find that the suggestion made by the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy was practically ignored by the Finance Member. It is easy to see the reason for refraining to benefit from this untapped source of income. It is believed that any such course would wound the susceptibilities of other countries, particularly Japan which is at this moment exporting the largest quantity of Indian cotton. But that consideration alone ought not to have weighed with the authorities in letting this source remain unexploited to the detriment of other sources, which should not remain on the Indian Budget even for a day longer. We refer here particularly to the salt tax which was raised last year, notwithstanding the protest made by Mr. Dadabhoy. Sir William Meyer said that this tax could not be reduced owing to the exigencies of war finance. We submit that at any rate this was not the time for maintaining the duty. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the prosperity of the country during the past two years, we are of opinion that the poorer classes whom this tax affects directly are worse and not certainly better off for all that prosperity. .... Turning to the super-tax which it is now proposed to levy, we have already expressed the view that those who have made large profits as a result of the prevalence of war conditions are justly liable to give a fair return to the State. The failure, however, of Government to accede to the reasonable requests made by Mr. Sarma for affording relief to undivided Hindu families is extremely disappointing. It works as a hardship both in principle and practice on these families for no fault of theirs except that they are attached to a social system, whether it be right or wrong. It was rightly characterized by Mr. Basu as placing a bar on the joint Hindu family system............ The penal provisions which have been imported into the Income-Tax Act are needlessly harsh and will operate on the people with the greatest hardship.......... In many cases in the past, the working of the Income-Tax Act and the rules framed thereunder has become a public scandal and we cannot but think that the new provisions will add considerably to it."

Comments on Government's reply to an interpellation in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding subsidised newspapers.
Indu Prakásh (36), 13th Mar.

24. Commenting upon the interpellation of the Honourable Mr. Asad Ali Khan in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding subsidised newspapers, the Indu Prakásh observes :—Government were so long evading the question. Now they tell us that they did not give any aid to any newspaper but that they only purchased copies of some papers. Is not a paper benefitted if copies of it are bought? The Honourable Sir R. Craddock also stated that Government have stopped the purchase of copies of all papers excepting the Jagad Vritt from this year. Why should the Jagad Vritt alone have been made an exception? Why should Government be wroth against other papers? What have they done? These are hard times of war and the aid should not be stopped. But why should Government resort to such devious methods? Why should they not start a paper of their own? We honestly feel that there should be a Government paper advocating the views of Government and replying to criticisms levelled against Government. It is not desirable to suppress or gag papers that criticise Government. We earnestly request Government to start a paper that would effectively expose the misleading criticisms of papers and we think that such a step would silence them. Then there would be no need of spending money over the purchase of copies of newspapers.

Comments on the Bombay Budget.
Message (6), 16th Mar.

25. "From the point of view of the closing balances, the Local Government has no reason to be dissatisfied inasmuch as the provincial balances with its bankers, the Government of India, have mounted up from slightly over a crore and a half in the actuals of 1915-16 to a little under two crores and a half at the end of the present financial year.......... Some of our friends who are interested in the direction and management of joint stock companies might envy the strong reserve position of Government, resulting from a succession of 'prosperous years.' But we doubt if outside their ranks, there are people who will be pleased at this large accumulation of large balances from year to year. Frankly, we, for our part, are not at all satisfied with the accumulation of large balances and thence arguing the 'prosperity' of the Presidency, as Government and some interested outside critics have done. There are primarily two reasons why we feel dissatisfied at this state of affairs; in the first place, urgent expenditure, however legitimate, is withheld under one excuse or another and, secondly, much more is taken from the people than the actual spending capacity of Government warrants.......... There was education; there was sanitation; there were other amenities of civilised public life. Year after year, inside the Council and outside, an irrepressible wail has been sent forth for education, more education and still more education. There have been many projects of sanitary improvement, such as pure drinking water supply and drainage, which have been hung up for 'want of funds.' Municipal improvement and district board works have suffered because of lack of means on the part of the municipalities and district boards. It appears to us that rural improvement even more than urban has suffered from the effects of a pennywise policy. Save in respect of certain items the Financial Statement presented by Mr. Carmichael is not certainly one on which we can congratulate ourselves or its author. The contemplation of the rosy picture of a large opening and a still larger closing balance may be a very pleasant task to its author. It is a startling revelation which the statement makes that, notwithstanding the depressing effects of a terrible war, the excise revenue shows further expansion.......... The other increases are mainly under stamps, income-tax, registration and forests; but these sink into insignificance compared with the tremendous expansion under Excise. Turning to the expenditure side, here, again, we have no special reason to be fascinated by the methods in which the opportunity given by the relaxation of the restrictions is to be availed of. We are told at the very outset that 'all expenditure which can be postponed without grave inconvenience is postponed till after the conclusion of the war and no provision is proposed for new schemes of expenditure unless they are of pressing urgency.' There are some items on the expenditure side such as the construction of the commemorative building at the Apollo Bunder, the amalgamation of the superior branches of the Excise and Salt departments and the appointment of three Deputy Commissioners of Salt and Excise, the new appointment of a second Income Tax Collector, the creation of fifteen new posts of the subordinate judge grade to be 'Personal Assistants to the District Judges' the appointment of an Inspectress of Girls' Schools, the large provision for the salaries of District Judges and Assistant Judges, the large increase under police and police buildings. These are items as to 'the pressing urgency' of which we are not convinced. In the course of the discussions yesterday, we believe it was Mr. Cadell who with great indignation told Mr. Kamat that he was 'unaware of the war', for his inexcusable fault of having urged that the discretionary grant of six lakhs be reduced to three lakhs and the saving thus effected be utilised for primary school buildings in the mofussil. We see nothing extraordinary in Mr. Kamat's proposal that Mr. Cadell must needs have pulled him up by saying that this was the war time. It does not at any rate disclose that Mr. Kamat was unaware of the fact so much as Mr. Cadell and his colleagues appear to be. If the exhibition given in the Financial Statement correctly reflects the official mind, we have reason to think that Government needs to be reminded of that fact more pointedly than anybody else. Practically every one of the items we have enumerated above is one which could have been postponed 'without grave inconvenience,' till after the conclusion of war, if not for ever."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 15th and 17th Mar., Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 14th Mar.

26. Commenting upon the Budget introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council, the Bombay Samáchár expresses its satisfaction at Government making provision in a fairly liberal manner for increased expenditure on education and sanitation during the year 1917-18 in spite of the financial stress due to the war. It refers to the estimated closing balance of over 2 crores of rupees for the year 1916-17 and wishes that a portion of this balance had been devoted towards helping the Dharwar College and educational institutions conducted by the missionaries on a more liberal scale than has been provided for in the new Budget. [In the subsequent issue the paper regards the demand embodied in the Honourable Mr. Kamat's resolution for transfering Rs. 3 lakhs out of the Rs. 6 lakhs provided in the Budget for P. W. Discretionary Grants to the head "Education" for the contruction of primary schools in the mofussil as just and reasonable. It contends that the claims of the Educational Department should be given priority over those of the P. W. D. and wishes that Government had accepted the Honourable Mr. Kamat's resolution. It expresses surprise at the want of zeal in the present Acting Director of Public Instruction, Mr. A. L. Covernton, in the interests of his own department and regrets that he did not see his way to stand by Mr. Kamat. The paper also contrasts Mr. Covernton's attitude with the enthusiasm displayed by the Honourable Surgeon-General in opposing the proposed transfer, and then goes on to thank Government for the provision already made in the Budget for spending Rs. 3,15,000 in the course of the coming year on building primary schools. Elsewhere in the same issue the paper commends the action of Government in providing in the Budget a sum of Rs. 5,000 to be given as a grant to the Poona Municipality for the furtherance of its scheme for ensuring a pure milk supply to the city of Poona and thinks that if this scheme proves a success it will facilitate similar arrangements being made for Bombay City. The Jám-e-Jamshed regards the new Budget presented by the Finance Member as satisfactory and congratulates him in his being able to make liberal provision for important items of expenditure. It [illegible] that people in the mofussil will feel grateful to Government for restoring to its original figure of Rs. 30,000 the grant for the opening of new dispensaries in the mofussil which they had to curtail on account of the war. The paper also approves of Government's earnest desire to provide big cities with a pure milk supply, as has been evinced by the help they have given to the Poona Municipality.]

*Rást Goftár (28), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.; Sanj Vartamán (29), 14th Mar.

27. "The Honourable Mr. Patel moved that the discussion of the Budget may be adjourned, and in stating his reasons for this unusal procedure made a lengthy statement of his own grievances in the Financial Committee of which he was a menber. Though the proposal was ruled out of order, Mr. Patel's protest remains and would have a salutary effect in the removal for the future of the causes which constrained the Honourable Member to adopt the course which he took. Even Mr. Carmichael had to admit that Mr. Patel had laid his case with great fairness and the reply which he gave to Mr. Patel's charges was inconclusive and beside the point. The chief count in Mr. Patel's remonstrance was that he was disallowed permission to go into the details contained in the Budget notes......... We trust that this and the other defects of procedure which Mr. Patel took exception to would not be allowed to recur in future inasmuch as they interfere with the right of free and untrammelled discussion in Committee and subvert the ends of the Reform Scheme. As to the Budget itself, we are glad that it has been framed with due respect to the popular outcry against a policy of indiscriminate retrenchment." [The Sánj Vartamán declares that treatment accorded by Government to the non-official members of the Legislative Council in the matter of their advice and opinion in the framing of the Budget is not liberal. It endorses the complaint made by the Honourable Mr. Patel in the Council against the Honourable Mr. Carmichael for not allowing him to bring forward certain suggestions in the Finance Committee while considering the Budget. It is of opinion that the elected members should be allowed to exercise in the Finance Committee the rights granted to them under the Morley-Minto Council reforms. The paper expresses the hope that when more extended rights are granted to the Legislative Councils the existing defects would be remedied.]

Message (6), 15th Mar.

28. "We express our deep sympathy with the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel in the motion he brought forward at yesterday's meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council that the presentation of the Revised Financal Statement be adjourned. It was no doubt a daring and unusual proposal, which is hitherto unknown in the annals of Indian Legislative Councils and must have staggered the official world as it must have astonished many of the people, but for the reasons which he set forth with sufficient clearness. He could not have done better than bringing forward such an extraordinary proposal in order to call attention to the irregular and high-handed procedure adopted by the Chairman of the Finance Committee.......... Mr. Carmichael admitted the great fairness with which Mr. Patel had stated his case—and said that as the discussions of the Finance Committee were informal—we italicise the word—he did not think 'it was fair to the committee to consider the whole of the expenditure for it was open to Mr. Patel to bring forward resolutions in the Council.' In the first place, we are bound to protest against this ill-considered remark. If Mr. Carmichael's dictum were to be accepted, we fail to see where the necessity lies of appointing a committee which cannot consider any proposal because it is open to the members thereof to bring up resolutions in the Council. In the second place we should like to know what the Honourable gentleman means by saying that the discussions of the Finance Committee are informal. If he wants us to understand it in the ordinary and only sense of the term, there cannot be a greater absurdity. The discussions are neither informal nor irregular as Mr. Carmichael would have us believe. The Finance Committee is a regularly constituted body under definite rules for a definite purpose.......... The Committee has specific powers and duties to discharge in respect of specific matters. Accordingly, Mr. Patel formulated some proposals, which he proceeded to lay before the committee. Without regard to the rules—and practices we add—the chairman ruled the proposals as out of order and denied the committee an opportunity of hearing the proposer's point of view. It was an extraordinary step that Mr. Carmichael took of gagging a colleague, maybe a powerless one. We are glad that Mr. Patel did not submissively pocket the unmerited insult to his intelligence and let the matter rest there.......... What is more astonishing still is the treatment meted out to Mr. Patel by the Legislative Department of the Secretariat. He wrote to the Secretary asking for copies of the notes which had been recorded in the minutes. Instead of a reply from Mr. Nissim, Mr. French wrote to him to say that 'the meetings of the Finance Committee were private and informal' and that copies of the proceedings could not be supplied to him; but if he chose he could go to the Secretariat and inspect the book. To say nothing of the practice in a court of law—because we know our Secretariat would scout the very idea of a comparison with a court of law—we should like to know if Mr. French's reply was not ridiculous, if not altogether silly. Mr. Patel was a member of the committee whose recorded proceedings he could inspect although they were private and informal and yet he might not take copies! For utter lack of a sense of proportion, we think Mr. French's statement is unexcelled. The official attitude displayed here is nothing but one of distrust of non-official members on the part of Government. Mr. Patel did well in emphasizing this point."

Comments on Government's reply to the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri's interpellation regarding the C. I. D.
Mahrátta (5), 18th Mar.

*29. "To the questions of the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri it was replied on behalf of the Bombay Government that C. I. D. people have the general orders of Government to enquire openly about the names and other particulars of the members of the Home Rule Leagues. When the Leagues are constituted for a lawful purpose and are working in legal ways it is strange that Government should try to frighten people away from the Leagues. The unnameable harassment which the police can, if they choose, inflict on any one is a supreme obstacle in the way of getting people to enlist as members of the Home Rule League. Many conscientiously desire the Reforms which the League proposes to secure for the country. But they are afraid of the police—or rather of Government whose hands and eyes the police are.......... This is not to be wondered at in this country which is emasculated to a deplorable extent. Poverty,—dire poverty—is at the root of the refusal of many to join the League. If Government knew of their membership and dispensed with their services—what could they do? That is the embarrassing question to a very large number. So the poverty which is sought to be remedied in the long run by the attainment of Home Rule—this same dire poverty comes in the way of the Home Rule propaganda."

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 16th Mar.

30. It has been a long-standing complaint that while Government do not mind starving other departments of the administration, they are always prepared to spend large amounts on the Police, and this grievance has recently been ventilated in almost all our Provincial Legislative Councils. It is not that the popular members do not understand the importance of this branch of the service, but they want Government to find out the causes which have rendered the Police unpopular and to remedy them. The Honourable Mr. Curtis the other day dwelt upon the necessity of strengthening the Police Department, but the fact seems to have been overlooked that all unnecessary increase in its personnel only results in the harassment of the innocent, as the Police are tempted to create new work to justify their existence. The Honourable Mr. Curtis did not deny the fact that the C. I. D. sometimes shadows respectable men of undoubted loyalty but appeared to hint that people should take the attentions paid to them by the C. I. D. as an honour rather than a matter for complaint. His ideas about the duties of the Police thus seem to be extraordinary. There is, therefore, nothing strange that the C. I. D. should be making regular inquiries about the members of Home Rule League. But is it not the duty of Government to see that such uncalled for inquiries do not come in the way of the legitimate political activities of the people? Why should Government complain if these operations of the C. I. D. give rise to suspicion in the minds of the people? Let the C. I. D. give up treating honoured popular leaders like suspected criminals, and then all grounds for complaint will disappear.

Mahratta (5), 18th Mar.

31. "Sir Reginald Craddock has made himself particularly famous by his recent utterance in the Imperial Council. While dealing with the jail administration, he said that he could not understand why the Press and people should constantly abuse their fellow-countrymen in the police. Such a statement on the part of the Home Member is ridiculous for the following reasons. He ought to know that the Press and people do not 'abuse' policemen, they make complaints against them, not constantly—but from time to time, as grounds for complaint arise. Again, the Home Member must know that the chief grounds of complaint that the people have against the police is that they receive from them more of oppression than of protection—which latter is the duty formally assigned to them.......... We know that some members of the police do show 'patience, zeal and courage', but these are often misdirected. Men of undoubted loyalty are shadowed from hour to hour and place to place. This is strongly resented and is a potent cause of the 'abuse' which the Home Member says he cannot understand. And do not the police show any qualities other than those praised by the Home Member? We know they do and hence our complaint against them. Sir Reginald Craddock in zealously pleading for the police, a mere fraction of the people, was apparently unconscious of the misplaced boldness he was showing. He pitted the police against the rest of the people—and found the latter wanting in some necessary qualities (judgment? truth? or?) the possession of which would have helped them to form the same opinion of the police which Sir Reginall Craddock held. This was misplaced boldness, we must repeat. The Press and people, all wrong—and the police all right! How supremely ridiculous this insinuation is!"

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Upasani's resolution against the appointment of a lecturer in Geography in the College of Commerce.

Message (6), 16th Mar.

32. Commenting on the discussion on the Honourable Mr. Upasani's resolution against the appointment of a lecturer in Geography in the College of Commerce, the Message says:—"Not content with this amusing defence of the professors, His Excellency made an insinuation that the Honourable Members who supported the resolution had 'at the back of their mind a certain personal incident with regard to a professorial appointment in the College and that is the main reason why this resolution has been brought forward.' We had been taught to think that imagination played but little part in the Government of the Presidency. We congratulate His Excellency on the fine feat of imagination he has performed in this matter. It goes without saying that the Honourable Members had nothing to do with it, assuming that it was present at the back of their minds, in the Council. We can see where His Excellency leads us to. We beg to point out in all humility that it was not quite consistent with the high prerogative of his office to make an insinuation of this kind knowing that the members could not reply. We venture to think that the reference to the personal incident was imported into his Excellency's speech with a view to lend colour to the belief that that appointment which the advisory board, the Finance Committee and the members who supported it had considered necessary was being opposed by other than altogether upright considerations. It is extremely painful to see that this insinuation should have been made by the head of the Local Government in his responsible capacity as President of the Council. His Excellency's observation, we respectfully submit, is as unfounded as it lacks in fairness."

Comments on the discussion in the United Provinces Legislative Council on the restrictions placed on the recruitment of certain castes for the Police force.

Young India (11), 14th Mar.

33. Commenting upon the discussion in the United Provinces Legislative Council on the restrictions placed on the recruitment of certain castes, especially the Brahmans, for the police force, Young India remarks:—"Mr. Marris admitted that caste characteristics were the ground work of the rules; in the language of the Honourable Mr. O'Donnell this would perhaps mean that the rules 'were simply based on the existence of different castes of varying aptitudes for different kinds of work'. Does Mr. O'Donnell mean that birth alone determines aptitude for different kinds of work, and that because one happens to be born a Brahman one becomes unfit for the police service? If it be so, we must say that our old-fashioned ideas about caste are getting support from most unsuspected quarters. And is Mr. O'Donnell prepared to apply these principles anywhere else except where Indians are concerned? As Mr. Chintamani remarked in his reply, these rules in the first place cast a stigma upon a particular caste; in the second place such a distinction, however well safeguarded, is undersiable from the point of view of public service itself because in seeking to exclude those who do not possess the requisite qualifications others who do possess them would be disqualified. Besides, regulations of this nature directly violate the sanctity of the pledges which have been held out to the people of this country by successive sovereigns and statesmen. And finally they accentuate caste and racial distinctions and thus perpetuate standing evils. The regulations are not in the interests of the police service, because they exclude from service some of the best material and they are not conducive to public contentment and satisfaction."

India's case for Home Rule stronger than that of Ireland.

Message (6), 13th Mar.

34. "Mr. Lloyd George says that Ireland must be given Home Rule because she 'clearly demands it'. In another place the reason given is that she 'unmistakably' demands it. A demand to be granted must be clear and unmistakable. Let Indian Home Rulers take note of the fact. Even during war-time Ireland thought it discreet to make her demand for Home Rule 'clear' and 'unmistakable' and Mr. Lloyd George's speech proves that she was justified in thinking so. Let India remember that England is ever ready to accede to clearly expressed demands and does not always take it ill that the demands are so expressed during war-time. Ireland, or rather a part of it, rebelled last year and thus in a way and to a certain extent forfeited her right to be granted Home Rule. But England, out of the abundance of her love for liberty all round, has forgiven, if not forgotten, the offence. India has refused to be drawn into the net which, we are told by Mr. Cleveland of the C. I. D., was spread for her by Germany. India was loyal before the war and continued, and will assuredly continue, to be loyal during the war. If loyalty counts for anything, when the fitness for granting Home Rule is considered, India's claim looks stronger than that of Ireland."

Sánj Vartamán (29), 12th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 10th Mar.

35. When people in India are being asked not to take part in any political movement strong political agitation is being carried on in the self-governing Colonies and even in Great Britain itself. Mr. Lloyd George's proposals with respect to the question of Irish Home Rule will greatly tend to create a split among the Irish people and that they, therefore, naturally refuse to accept them. There is no likelihood of the Irish question being satisfactorily settled at present. The ministers should, therefore, exert their influence to bring about a compromise between the people of Ulster and the Nationalists and to postpone the consideration of the question till the end of the war. We hope the question of giving Home Rule to India on Colonial lines will be considered along with the Irish Home Rule question after the war. It must be remembered that Indians do not want Home Rule all at once but that they only want a larger share in the administration of the country with a view to being able ultimately to govern themselves. [The Hindusthán urges the need of the question of Indian Home Rule being put before the people of England and the Parliament in in [illegible] perspective with a view to its early solution. It is of opinion that the satisfactory solution of the Irish question will tend to add to the strength of the Empire and, on the same analogy, it sees no reason why the question of giving political rights to Indians should be postponed.]

Comments on the agitation of Lancashire against the increase in the import duties on cotton goods.

Praja Mitra and Pârsi (24), 13th and 17th Mar.; Hindusthân (17), 16th Mar.; Jâm-e-Jamshed (20), 17th Mar.

36. The Praja Mitra and Pârsi expresses its disapprobation at the agitation carried on in England by the Lancashire manufacturers against the increase made in the new Indian Budget in the import duty on foreign piecegoods. It remarks that Mr. Runciman, who has shown himself so much in favour of giving protection to the British and Allied trade after the war by levying heavy import duties on foreign goods has only been influenced by prejudices in treating this increase in the import duty as a breach on the part of Government of the compact not to raise controversial matters during the continuance of the war. The paper declares that if this import duty is not increased it will only result in making foreign countries profit at India's expense without benefiting Manchester which is not likely to stand up against the competition of other countries in India after the war. It also supports the raising of the import duty on the ground of Imperial interests. [In the subsequent issue the paper expresses its joy at the failure of those who agitated in Parliament and elsewhere to secure the cancellation of the proposed increase in the duty above referred to. The Hindustân fears that the Lancashire people will not allow the increased import duty to continue after the termination of the war. It also remarks that Indian mills have been all these years patiently bearing the unjust burden of Excise duty which is crushing the Indian textile industry because India cannot effectively raise her voice in Partliament. It believes that the interests of Lancashire will be given precedence over Indian interests and Government will have to yield to the pressure from Lancashire so long as India does not secure financial autonomy. The Jâm-e-Jamshed remarks :—It is true that Lacashire will be somewhat adversely affected by the raising of the import duty on foreign piecegoods, but if merely on that account they refuse to help Government as enthusiastically as before in the prosecution of the war, loyalty and patriotism of these English mill-owners must be of a very flimsy character indeed. The present cry raised by Lancashire is interested and selfish and the Secretary of State for India has done very well in not giving any countenance to it. The two Indian representatives who have gone to England to act as the Secretary's advisers in the Imperial War Conference have rendered a valuable service to their mother country by effectively placing the case of India before the Lancashire deputation which waited upon the Secretary in this connection. We hope that better counsels will prevail with these Lancashire manufacturers and that they will give up their present antagonistic attitude at least out of regard for Imperial interests, if on no other ground. India is grateful to Mr. Chamberlain as well as Mr. Lloyd George for their firm attitude in connection with this matter and she hopes that both these statesmen will adhere to this just attitude of theirs to the last.]

Indian Social Reformer* (8), 18th Mar.; Message (6), 17th Mar.

37. "The unseemly discussion on the enhancement of the import duty on cotton goods, without a corresponding increase in the countervailing excise duty, in and out of Parliament, lends emphasis to our contention that the constitution of the Government of India is to a considerable extent obsolete. In consequence, the Secretary of State has to support a perfectly just measure by arguments which are palpably flimsy. Thus, Mr. Austen Chamberlain is reported to have told a deputation that not a single member, official or non-official, of the Indian Legislative Council would have voted for the enhancement of the excise duty.......... It may be that the members of the present Government of India had all intimated to the Secretary of State that they would resign if they were obliged to enhance the excise duty. Only such a representation could sustain his statement that not a single member of the Legislative Council would have voted for a proposal to enhance the excise duty. It would have been iniquitous to raise the excise duty which, even as it stands, is utterly unjustifiable. Instead of taking his stand on this plain ground the Secretary of State is obliged by the antiquated constitution of the Government of India to take refuge in the legal fiction of the right of the official majority in the Indian Legislative Council to vote according to its convictions on a measure which had been introduced under the orders of the Secretary of State." [The Message remarks:—"The opposition, which had been engineered by Lancashire, though temporarily defeated, will rouse itself again as soon as the time comes. Unless public opinion is prepared to 'shout loud enough to be heard in London', we are afraid when the time comes for reviewing the matter after the war, Indian opinion may be silently given the go-by under the immediate pressure of the Lancashire M. P.'s in the House of Commons and reactionary Tories in the House of Lords."]

Comments on the Punjáb Government's reply to Mr. Tilak's inquiry about the grounds of his exclusion from the Punjáb.

Mahrátta (5), 18th Mar.

38. Referring to the reply given by the Punjáb Government to Mr. Tilak's telegram asking for the grounds for his exclusion from the Punjáb, the Mahratta remarks:—"A leader of influence who has been urging the people to help Government with all their resources, who has been encouraging the youths to volunteer in spite of discouraging circumstances—to restrict the personal liberty of such a one is no matter to the Punjáb Government! Over three weeks have been allowed to pass and then comes a definite 'no' in answer to the request made by Mr. Tilak. We regret that there should be a law in the Indian Statute Book placing such an unrestricted power in the hands of the Executive officials. It does not help the growth of good feeling between Government and the people. The more unreasonable the powers the Executive officials are by Statute enabled to wield, the wider becomes the gulf between the Government and the people. And is this widening a desirable thing? We think not. Does Government think differently?"

Comments on the action of the police in prohibiting Mr. Khadilkar from delivering a lecture at Belgaum.

Message (6), 11th Mar; Kesari (95), 13th Mar.

39. "Mr. Khadilkar addressed recruiting meetings at Bombay and at Dhárwár and was going to address a meeting at Belgaum on the same subject. But at Belgaum he was served with a notice not to address any meeting. Why? Perhaps his lecture was thought as being 'likely to prejudice the public peace'. Was public peace prejudiced at Bombay or at Dhárwár? If so, why is Mr. Khadilkar not hauled up before the Court?......... It is an insult to the people of Belgaum to suppose that the words of Mr. Khadilkar—or any other man for the matter of that—would disturb their balance of mind. Unless the executive concerned do not care to have much sympathy in the matter from the public, it should either give the public an indication of the grounds which made it issue the notice or rescind the order, which the public, in the present circumstances, cannot but take as uncalled-for and unjust to the individual concerned as well as to the public, especially the public at Belgaum." [The Kesari remarks:—Like the Defence of India Act the Police Act gives arbitrary powers to the executive. The Police Act, however, is a more handy weapon in the hands of the authorities. Mr. Khadilkar recently addressed recruiting meetings at Bombay and Dhárwár with excellent results. On his arrival at Belgaum with the same object the District Magistrate gagged his mouth under the Police Act. Mr. Sale has made the wonderful discovery that peace is likely to be disturbed by exhorting young men to enlist in the Defence Force! Unless Government curb the zeal of officials of the type of Mr. Sale our object of giving them effective help at this crisis is likely to be frustrated.]

Comments on the exodus to the hills.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 15th Mar.

40. While referring to the question of exodus to the hills discussed in the Imperial Legislative Council the Jám-e-Jamshed writes:—We do not think that any one will consider the expenditure of public money and time involved in constant movements of the Government of Bombay twice to Mahableshwar and once to Poona [illegible] justifiable. A change to the hills may have some advantages to individuals but we refuse to accept the arguments advanced in favour of the exodus to the hills with all the official paraphernalia on grounds of public advantage. If the officials require a change they should go to the hills at their own expense and should not drag their entire offices behind them but should dispense with them as they do when they go on shooting excursions to Native States.

Comments on the Press Note on the substitution of Modi by Balbodh in Government Offices.

Message (6), 17th Mar.; Kesari (95), 13th Mar.

41. "A press communiqué says that the Modi script will be given up in favour of the Balbodh in certain districts in the Presidency. Those to whom Modi and Balbodh are Greek and Latin may be able to realise the significance of the change, if we explain to them that it is like insisting that English will be written in the Roman script only! Government have not positively prohibited the use of Modi, so far as non-Government work is concerned,—they have limited the scope of the change to work in the Government offices only. But that is only a thin end of the wedge, which will eventually banish Modi out of existence." [The Kesari expresses regret at the decision of Government and referring to the fact that the previous orders of Government regarding the exclusion of Modi have now been made applicable to the districts to which they were not hitherto applicable, declares that Government have now permanently banned Modi from Government offices on the strength of their authority. It also expresses its apprehension that some days hence an opportunity may be taken by Government to stop the use of Modi even in the case of petitions.]

The super-tax should also be levied on the profits made by the various Turf Clubs in India.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 15th Mar., Eng. cols.

42. Writing about the Super-Tax, the Jám-e-Jamshed remarks:—"This reminds us that the Bombay racing season is over and a good round sum—to the tune of a quarter of a million (Crore ?) of rupees—has changed hands. The Western India Turf Club appropriate to themselves ten per cent. of the total takings-in at the totalizators which means a clear profit of two lakhs of rupees. It is strange that in these strenuous times when every thousand rupees counts, the Government of India have not yet thought fit to tap this important source of revenue. A tax of three annas in the rupee might bring Government something like forty thousand rupees every year from Bombay alone, and from two to three lakhs from all the racing centres in India—a sum certainly not to be despised. The W. I. T. C. and the other turf clubs in India would be the last to object, especially during the continuance of the war, to these taxes which they can well afford to pay."

Comments on the Viceroy's reply to the deputation of the Indian Press Association.

Young India (11), 14th Mar.

43. Commenting upon His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's reply to the deputation of the Indian Press Association, Young India writes:—"Since he came to this country, Lord Chelmsford has made many speeches, but in none more than in the latest has he struck a more unsympathetic note. We do not think even Lord Curzon ever indulged in such an utterance on such an occasion. Perhaps it was to mark what he characterised as the unusualness of the occasion that his Excellency chose such an 'unusual' method......... We shall not deal here at length with the point raised by His Excellency, at the very beginning, that the time chosen by the Press Association was not opportune. All that need be said with reference to this matter is that there are certain grievances of the people that cannot wait for redress even in war-time; for they touch vital matters connected with the proper living of civic life; and the liberty of the press is one of these. Moreover, it was open to the Viceroy to choose any other moment. We feel, however, that Lord Chelmsford would have done well to spare the deputation the rebuke that they had not fully realised the gravity of the present crisis......... There were, at the time of the passing of the Act, assurances that the Act was a temporary measure, devised to meet particular conditions and that in its operation it would be worked with the utmost care and discrimination. Many have read in the speech of Sir Herbert Risley, made in the Council at the time, a definite promise to this effect. Lord Chelmsford cannot find such a promise in the speech. The words may not clearly indicate it; but if the speech is read in connection with the other speeches made, especially those of protest against the Act by non-official members, and if the general feeling in the country, as ventilated in the press, be taken note of, it would be found that Sir Herbert's words are not capable of any interpretation but the one put forth by the deputation in its address.......... The Viceroy holds that there has been no harshness or arbitrariness. He gives statistics to support his view. But the real grievance is that the Press is being rendered incapable of performing its duty by the atmosphere created by the Act. More than this, many presses and papers have been treated harshly: and the arbitrariness comes from the fact that the Anglo-Indian Press is left free to say whatever it likes about India and Indians, while retorts to its utterances from the Indian side are penalised. Again, reliance is placed mainly on the reports of the C. I. D. All this and much else of this nature, constitute the harshness and the arbitrariness complained of. While on this point, we are constrained to say that the line of argument used by His Excellency is not very wise or dignified. He has called into question the accuracy of the conclusions arrived at by Sir Lawrence Jenkins with regard to one point. He has rebuked Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim for certain observations of his in the Besant case. He has cited the opinion of Mr. Justice Ayling in the same case with approval, in such a way as to suggest the inference that that was conclusive when as a mater of fact, two other judges trying the same case came to a decidedly different conclusion. This is special pleading with a vengeance. Well might the Mahratta ask 'Does His Excellency want to muzzle the judges?' His pointed reference to New India and its proprietor was absolutely unfair and lacks, if we might say so, in chivalry. It may not be agreeable to the authorities concerned; but all the same, the fact is there that in virtue of the authority vested in them, the judges of the Madras High Court have held that the articles complained of in New India are not such as would constitute an infringement of the law of sedition. In the end, the Viceroy has dashed all reasonable hopes of the Press Association and the public to the ground, in a manner and in a tone which leave a disagreeable impression on the mind as regards the future of the Press and the policy of the Executive towards the discussion of public questions. Those who criticise executive action and policy have hard days in store for them. But for all that we must do our duty as we understand it."

Message (6), 13th Mar.

44. Referring to the remark of the Viceroy that there were comparatively few cases under the Press Act to justify the complaint made against its working, the Message writes:—"Apropos of this a facetious correspondent relates the story of a motor driver who driving his vehicle with great speed through a busy street, wounded some four or five persons and killed two or three others, and who, when asked to explain his precipitate driving exclaimed with an air of injured innocence, 'What, do you call this precipitate driving? I have taken my vehicle past thousands and lacs of men without injuring any one and when I happen to wound only four or five men and kill only two or three. you come to me with complaints, as if I have killed all humanity!'—Seriously, the analogy of the facetious correspondent is not quite exact, but he is essentially right in the contention, which he later on makes, as regards the untenability of the argument that only so few presses and newspapers have suffered. His Excellency asks us to believe in the honest intentions of the officials; we never questioned them. We only say that some of the officials are not quite angelic or infallible."

Kesari (95), 13th Mar.

45. His Excellency the Viceroy's reply to the deputatian from the Press Association was a painful surprise. His Excellency is only the mouthpiece of the Civil Service in India and as such is not responsible for his utterances. He is like a talking-machine which just reproduces whatever is spoken into it. We are not much concerned, however, with the question whether the Viceroy expressed his own views or those of the Civil Service. Some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries characterise the reply as firm and fearless. It is nothing of the kind. It is haughty, unsympathetic and boastful. The Viceroy in his reply quotes figures to show that the number of newspapers has actually increased since the passing of the Act and infers therefrom that, instead of hampering, the Act has conduced to the growth of the press. This is a childish argument. One might as well say that a married couple confined in prison has prospered because it has had progeny there. It is of little consequence if a few more worthless prints come into existence or some of those already existing disappear. It is the quality and not the quantity that counts. The legitimate function of the press is to educate public opinion on political matters without transgressing the limits of the law. The Penal Code adequately provides for dealing with offending journals and the Press Act is not only superfluous but decidedly harmful. The deputation urged it upon the notice of the Viceroy that the Press Act hinders the legitimate functions of the press, to which contention he does not seem to have given any satisfactory reply. In free countries like England the press is expected to exercise a wholesome check on the administration. The bureaucracy in India, however, are averse to submitting their decisions to popular scrutiny. They naturally do not relish the idea of a check on their power which they have been wielding so long without any outside interference. A free press is bound to come into sharp conflict with a tyrannical and irresponsible administration. This is why the authorities are hostile to newspapers which express independent views. It is misleading to say that the Press Act was enacted for the defence of the empire. We do not at all believe that the repeal of the Act will be followed by popular upheavals. The Viceroy in his reply to the deputation said that none of the prosecutions under the Press Act had failed, but that is no justification for the existence of the Press Act. The prosecutions did not fail because the courts had to administer the law as it stood without going into its merits. The Viceroy has plainly said in one place that the business of the judiciary is to administer the law as it stands without pronouncing any opinion on it. The authorities are, however, not satisfied with the powers conferred by the Press Act. They want more extensive powers to stifle the ambitions of the people. That is why they are abusing the provisions of the Defence of India Act. Our demand for self-government is not inconsistent with our attachment to the empire, but, from the tone of His Excellency the Viceroy's reply, the bureaucracy appears to be determined to arrest the political progress of the country. We wish His Excellency had refused to receive the deputation rather than give such a reply as this. Government can, if they like, continue the Press Act on the statute book. They should not, however, make themselves ridiculous by attempting to justify its existence.

Gujaráti (13), 11th Mar.; Shri Sayáji Vijaya (70), 15th Mar.

46. Commenting upon the reply given by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford to the deputation of the Press Association of India, the Gujaráti remarks that it does not know of such a serious breach of the principles of etiquette made in public by anyone after calling others to hear their grievances as, the paper maintains, has been committed by the Viceroy. It regrets to observe that while inflicting his sermon upon the deputation His Excellency had failed to realise who, and amidst whom, he was. It declares that Lord Curzon's utterances were full of egoism, and that Lord Chelmsford's present reply was also cast in a similar mould, and had a lot of "I's" in it. What a difference, observes the paper, between the sweet language of the adorable King-Emperor and the utterance of Lord Chelmsford, his representative! It compares the Viceroy's reply to a speech made by a counsel in a law court in defence of the Press Act. It holds forth His Excellency's remarks in support of the continuance of the Press Act for the present, on the grounds that statesmen like Lords Morley and Minto had given their sanction to it and that Lord Hardinge had not thought it fit to mitigate its severity, as a sample of Lord Chelmsford's sense of justice and of his powers to grasp the existing situation. The paper further remarks that the decisions of justices Sir Lawrence Jenkins and Abdur Rahim, in which they had criticised the harshness of the Press

Act, are betes noires to the official class who have availed themselves of the opportunity afforded by the present deputation to have their fling at them through Lord Chelmsford. It winds up with observing that the gist of His Excellency's reply comes to something like this:—The newspapers were bad before the Press Act was passed, and if they have improved it is due to the Act and so the Act should be continued, because, with the repeal of the Act the old condition would return. Only a few papers have been punished and so the Press Act is not bad. A few papers are bad and, therefore, the Act is necessary. [The Shri Saydji Vijaya expresses its regret at the Viceroy's reply which it declares to be harsh and disappointing. It observes:—There would have been no reason for the deputation to submit their representation if the executive officers had been as considerate towards the Indian journalists as they have been towards the Anglo-Indian papers. But the Viceroy has seen only one side of the shield and has not only disappointed but done injustice to the Press representation. The public would have been thankful to His Excellency if he had not received the deputation at all or had postponed doing so instead of making the petitioners of his, who had no right of reply, depart from him humiliated by his harsh and one-sided remarks.]

Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

47. "When it was announced last year that His Excellency had agreed to receive a deputation of the Press Association, the news was received with a certain amount of joy, and some hopes were aroused that the legitimate grievances of the Press in India, if not redressed, would at least receive a sympathetic hearing from the head of the Government. Those hopes have after all come to nought. The Viceroy's reply to the memorial of the Press Association may be rightly described as a snub. The tone of His Excellency is severe; a good many of his dicta are most unconvincing. The Indian press in general has criticised his reply with bitterness and branded it as discourteous. For our own part we cannot accept the criticism as altogether just. The reply was undoubtedly of an unusual character, rather pugnacious and vigorous. But the cause of this is to be found in the fact that the memorial itself was unduly pugnacious and vigorous. We cannot but say, though with regret, that the memorialists overshot the mark by trying to show that all along only Government have been in the wrong......... Instead of frankly recognising the difficulties of Government, the memorial seeks to ignore them. Under the circumstances it need cause no surprise if the Viceroy felt it his duty to defend the policy of his Government in as vigorous a manner as possible. The present times are not auspicious for such memorials and the memorial might have had a less unkind fate if it had not aimed so high as at the complete repeal of the Press Act, but contented itself with a demand for the reform of the Act. .... Any defence of the Press Act as it is would be bad enough. We can't say that matters have been at all improved by the undignified homily that His Excellency has thought it fit to read to those noble judges, who have criticised—or rather been forced to criticise—the actions of Government. .... It is admitted that at the time the Press Act of 1910 was passed, Government gave an assurance that there were in the Act adequate checks on the Executive. As a matter of fact there is now no room for any illusion on this score. It has been seen that these checks are absolutely non-existent. It is incredible that Government could have consciously given false assurances. Hence the only alternative remains that the Government of India have been using a power to which they have legal though not a moral right. It behoves them to modify the Act in a way that will harmonise with their original assurances."

Approval of the recent orders of the Government of India prohibiting labour emigration.

Message (6), 14th Mar.; Mahrdtta* (5), 18th Mar.

48. Referring to the orders of the Government of India prohibiting all labour emigration excepting that to Ceylon and the Malay States, the Message remarks:—"This is good news. The object of Government in taking such a step, which is done under the Defence of India Act is stated to be 'to conserve the man-power of India for the purposes of labour in connection with the war'. Though it is clearly not a concession to the warmth of feeling displayed by all classes of people against the proposed continuance of the indenture system, we welcome it as a step in the right direction.......... We should have been very glad if Government had gone the whole length and wholly prohibited emigration of labour at least during the period of the war. All other considerations might then have been leisurely adjusted having regard primarily to the feelings and sentiments of the people in this country. However, we heartily congratulate Government on the wise step they have decided to take." [The Mahrátta remarks :—" Whatever the future, we must express our whole-hearted satisfaction at the use to which the Defence of India Act has been put by Government. When the Act is named, no good visions gather before the mental eye of the listener. So unfortunate has been its career. But this one thing—the immediate stoppage of labour emigration to the majority of the colonies—is and will remain a bright incident in the otherwise gloomy history of the working of this measure."]

Sánj Vartamán (29), 13th Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 16th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 15th Mar.

49. The Sánj Vartamán expresses gratification at the recent order issued by Government prohibiting the emigration of labour from India for the duration of the war. It argues that if labour is necessary in India now for manufacturing munitions for war purposes it will be required for promoting various industries in India when peace is concluded and asks Government to respect public opinion by putting a stop to the emigration of indentured labour altogether. [The Jám-e-Jamshed also writes in a similar strain. The Praja Mitra and Pársi asks Government to make the prohibition applicable to Ceylon and the Malay States as well.]

Rást Goftár (28), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

50. " The order of the Government of India prohibiting labour emigration comes at an opportune moment when the question of indentured labour is being universally declaimed in this country.......... The one effect of the Order would be to stop all labour whether indentured or otherwise from leaving this country except for specified places. Under the latter category both Ceylon and the Malay States have been included. We do see no reason for their exemption from the Government edict in view of the fact that labourers from India are not being properly treated, no matter in what part of the Empire they serve outside their own country. The difficulty of maintaining the sex ratio is another reason why emigration of labour whether free or indentured should be laid under a strict ban with respect to those places where the labourers are ill treated."

Adverse comments on the work of the Indian Students Department in London.

Gujaráti (13), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

51. " Mr. Mallet, Secretary to the Indian Students Department in London, has, it is said, retired at his own request. Not much regret will be felt for this severance of his connection with the Department which is looked upon with no small suspicion by Indian students in England and against which a number of serious complaints have been made. Mr. J. W. Arnold has been appointed by Mr. Chamberlain as Mr. Mallet's successor. According to a well-informed writer in the Chronicle Mr. Arnold's headquarters are at 21, Cromwell Road, which are known among Indian students all over the United Kingdom as the 'Thana'. This designation savours of C. I. D. associations and shows in what light an institution which was meant for their assistance and guidance has come to be looked upon by them. Until this impression is removed, the Department cannot possibly be expected to fulfil the object for which it was brought into existance. The annual expenditure incurred by the Indian taxpayer for its maintenance is Rs. 90,000 and Indian parents are entitled to insist that the Department shall not be worked so as to arouse the suspicion and even the hostility of the Indian students. If political surveillance is deemed necessary, that function should be discharged by independent agencies and not by a department which was founded with a view to help, advise and guide Indian students in a genuinely friendly and sympathetic spirit and not in the way beloved of the C. I. D. Young Indians studying in England are most of them self-respecting youths and naturally resent being treated as suspects or considered worthy of any kind of surveillance. If there are any black sheep, the proper agency to keep a watch on them is not the Adviser of Indian Students or the Secretary of the Indian Students Department or its underlings. In that case the raison d' etre for the institution ceases to exist. It further appears that it has peristently sought to extend its kindly attentions to non-official bodies started by the Indian students and then either to absorb or crush them. If this is a true picture of its activities, the sooner such a meddlesome Department is abolished or thoroughly overhauled so as to be able to subserve honestly the purposes for which it was started, the better."

Comments on the appointment of Sir H. Butler and Sir R. Craddock as Lieutenant-Governors of the United Provinces and Burma respectively.

Young India (11), 14th Mar.

52. "The announcement regarding the appointment of Sir Harcourt Butler as the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces in succession to Sir James Meston and of Sir Reginald Craddock as the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma makes us pause with wonder as to what may be in store for the future. At a time when large schemes of reform are agitating the minds of the public, it is a remarkable fact, of which hardly any notice has been taken, that the Provincial Governments and administrations are fast drifting into the hands of persons admittedly opposed to such reforms like Lord Ronaldshay, Sir Harcourt Butler and Sir Reginald Craddock. The last two gentlemen are bureaucrats of the first water and they were the principal members of the minority which in Lord Hardinge's time, opposed the grant of an Executive Council to the United Provinces......... The appointment of Sir Harcourt Butler definitely postpones the attainment by the people of the United Provinces of their cherished aspiration for a Governor in Council.......... Neither the people of the United Provinces nor those of Burma have reason to be pleased with their new rulers. Both of them, as we have said above, represent the most obstinate type of bureaucracy in India, and it appears to us as if a policy of repression is coming after the war. The reply of the Viceroy to the Press deputation lends color to this belief."

Message (6), 13th Mar.

53. "Both these gentlemen are retired members of the Viceroy's Executive Council and have in their spheres exhibited some of the narrowest tendencies for which the Government is characterized in recent years. One has only to recall the mental attitude of Sir Harcourt Butler and Sir Reginald Craddock in connection with the proposal initiated by the late Viceroy and whole-heartedly supported by the then Secretary of State, Lord Crewe, for bestowing on the United Provinces a Lieutenant Governor in Council with an Indian member thereon. Their attitude was not then certainly consistent with progress and we have no reason to think that they have improved for the better since then. In the interval which has elapsed since the recommendation of the Government of India was rejected in the House of Lords, Sir Reginald Craddock has become more and more reactionary in tendency, notwithstanding the chastening influence which a system of collective government is supposed to exert on the individual members. We take leave to doubt in advance if his imposition on Burma will in any wise help to improve the state of things there. Our Central Provinces friends have some excellent experinence of the unmitigated form of one-man rule under Sir Reginald and we wonder if those experiences would not prove incomparable with those that are awaiting our Burma friends.

Comments on the Bombay High Court's decision in the Jain Vijaya Printing Press Security Case.

Young India (11), 14th Mar.

54. V. R. writes in Young India:—"It appears to be a curious irony of fate that almost just about the time His Excellency Lord Chelmsford was warmly defending the working of the Press Act, a special bench of the Bombay High Court consisting of Justices Batchelor, Macleod and Shah should have been called upon to pronounce their judgments in the Jain Vijaya Security Case.......... Their Lordships have unanimously held that the pamphlet as a whole offended against section 4 and the provisos thereunder. It is no wonder that they have done so. The terms of this section are, to quote the words of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the Comrade case, so 'very comprehensive and its language is as wide as human ingenuity could make it.'......... All the three judges have held that the pamphlet as a whole infringes the provisions of section 4 of the Act, and for the reason indicated in the extract from Sir Lawrence Jenkin's judgment, we accept their Lordship's conclusion as substantially correct. But throughout the proceedings not a tittle of evidence has been adduced to prove that the keeper of the Press had either been disloyal or dishonest in his intentions and knowing the nature of the contents of the pamphlet to be of the character attributed to it by Justices Batchelor and Macleod, he deliberately printed it at his press. In a matter of this nature, that is the most important consideration which has always to be borne in mind before launching upon any action directed against the unfortunate keeper of a press. That consideration was wholly ignored, in this case. The fact that the pamphlet as a whole was of the description given by Mr. Justice Batchelor was held to be enough to condemn the poor keeper of the press in a sum of Rs. 500. In his reply to the Press deputation, His Excellency Lord Chelmsford declared that the Local Governments had not used the sweepingly wide powers which the Act put into their hands with anything like harshness or indiscretion. He further repeated that 'it is not the wish of the Government that the Act should be administered with harshness or without discrimination and they have issued definite instructions to that effect.' After contemplating the result in the present case, we are tempted to inquire if the action of the Local Government is to be taken as a proof of the intention of Government to deal very liberally with the keepers of printing presses. It has not been shown that a warning administered through the District Magistrate of Surat would not have produced the desired deterrent effect on the applicant. It does not appear that he was warned at any time before and that he had disregarded such warning as to make the present order of forfeiture a pressing necessity on the part of the Local Government. We have felt constrained to lay emphasis on this case because of the needlessly harsh tenor of His Excellency's reply to the deputation."

Comments on the Bombay High Court's decision in the case in connection with powers of the Municipality under the Weights and Measures Act.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 16th Mar.

55. Referring to a recent decision of the Bombay High Court in which it held that the Bombay Municipality was under the existing law not legally entitled to enforce upon those carrying on business outside municipal markets the use of particular weights and measures and that the application of a bye-law to that effect to markets other than municipal ones was ultra vires, the Praja Mitra and Pársi says that the decision, though in keeping with the present law, will be detrimental to the interests of the small section of traders who are doing business within the precincts of the municipal markets inasmuch as the municipal bye-law will, according to the High Court decision, be held applicable to them only. It remarks that the decision will only result in creating confusion in the minds of ignorant buyers and the object of fixing the prices of foodstuffs by the Food Committee under the Defence of India Act will be frustrated by the continuance of such a dual system. The paper, therefore, wishes that, regard being had to the high prices of foodstuffs that prevail at present, Government should intervene in the matter and, in the exercise of the powers vested in them under the Defence of India Act, declare that the abovementioned municipal bye-law should be legally held applicable to all tradesmen irrespective of their place of business till six months after the close of the war.

Suggestion for manufacture of cashew spirit in the Ratnágiri District.

Bakul (83), 11th Mar.

56. It has now been almost settled that toddy liquor is to be permanently displaced by mhowra liquor in the Ratnágiri District. As the latter is not distilled in this district, the money spent on it will necessarily go out of it and the men engaged in distilling toddy spirit will be thrown out of employment. Such unemployment is most undesirable specially in these days of scarcity. We would suggest, therefore, that arrangements may be made for distilling liquor from cashew fruit which is plentiful in this district. If our suggestion is accepted people will naturally devote more attention to cultivation of this fruit. We trust Government will consider this suggestion favourably.

Comments on an Abkari prosecution in the Thana District.

Rást Goftar (28), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

*57. "An obscure individual by name Vajia Sirod Kothia who, so far as our information goes, was never engaged in any sort of illicit trade in liquor, was arrested on a charge of transporting two bottles of country liquor from Dahanu to Sirod village. He was convicted and sentenced to one month's full and rigorous imprisonment. Such vagaries of justice baffle the imagination and seriously detract from the praise which we always offer to the hard worked magistracy. Such being the case, it is to be hoped that no time will be lost by the District Magistrate in calling for the papers and in taking such legal action as might be necessary for the reversal of the sentence. This action is all the more necessary as we are afraid the accused belongs to a class which is hardly aware of its own rights in such matters. We also wish the Excise Commissioner to take prompt notice of such prosecutions. The purposes of justice demand but the confiscation of the liquor and a warning to the offender."

Complaint about European lads going about shooting pigeons and other birds in Sukkur (Sind).

Sind Advocate (8), 1st Mar.

58. "We have received more than one complaint regarding the young European lads carrying on their shooting excursions in the town and aiming at pigeons and other birds. This seems very odious and repugnant to the Hindu-Muhammadan feelings and we are afraid this will lead to serious results ensuing from the injuries that young boys and other passers by might receive at their hands. Cannot the authorities take note of this?"

LEGISLATION.

Comments on the Local Boards Act Amendment Bill.

Gujaráti* (13), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.; Mahrátta* (5), 18th Mar.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 17th Mar.

59. "A Committee was appointed by the Bombay Government to report on the question of extension of local self-government. The local government, instead of giving effect to the recommendations as a whole, have introduced a Bill which will in practice affect only four district boards but will confer on the executive unliminited discretion in the matter of determining the proportion of elected to nominated members and other incidental questions. The Bill leaves untouched the constitution of 215 Taluka Boards. It provides merely for a bare majority of the elected members, though not less than 292 witnesses examined by the Committee appointed by Government to consider the question were in favour of granting a two-thirds elective majority. The Bombay Government have all along taken up an unsympathetic attitude in the matter of local self-government since Lord Ripon's time. Even Assam has got a two-thirds majority of elected members on its local boards and the Bombay Government want the people of this presidency to believe that they are more backward and incompetent than the inhabitants of Assam! If a measure incorporating this official view is not an 'insult to the people', we do not know in what other light one can regard it. If the whole question of local self-government is under investigation by a special officer, there was no particular reason why a Bill with a very limited scope was at all introduced in Council. His Excellency charged the Honourable Mr. Patel with wasting the time of the Council. That was a serious and not very courteous thing even for a Governor to say about his colleagues in the Legislative Council. But really speaking, if any body was responsible for the waste of public time involved in the discussion of a Bill with such a narrow scope, it was those who were responsible for its introduction and not the Honourable Mr. Patel The Honourable Mr. Curtis and His Excellency Lord Willingdon could not understand the opposition the Bill had aroused. That simply shows that they are not quite familiar with the history of local self-government in [illegible] are not fully conscious of the fact that the people of this [illegible] hitherto never been satisfied with the illiberal and even [illegible] which the Bombay Government have exhibited towards Lord [illegible] policy. The present Bill itself shows that they are not ready to [illegible] the recommendations of the Committee appointed by themselves." [The Mahratta makes similar remarks and concludes:—"The debate made it clear that Government are in no hurry to trust people. They will proceed at a snail's pace unless the people can somehow bring an irresistible pressure to bear on them." The Dnyán Prakásh also expresses its dissatisfaction with the Bill and declares that some of the Honourable Members were right in saying that there was every likelihood of the provisions of the Bill, as they stand, being abused. It is, however, satisfied to see that Messers. Sathe, Patel, Desai and Garud have been included in the Select Committee which is to consider the measure.]

Message (6), 17th Mar.

60. "Mr. Patel stated at the very outset that 'he was thoroughly convinced that the interests of local self-government demanded that this motion should not be placed before the Council.' This remark was the signal for a flutter in the official dovecots and a counter-attack was led by His Excellency the President. But that it was not a strong one based on stern logic or sound reasoning was at once evident from the fact that his Excellency showed a little perturbance of mind and by interrupting the speaker too frequently would not allow him time to state his reasons. Instead of carrying on an unseemly wrangle with Mr. Patel, to the great amusement of the other members, visitors and reporters at the press table, His Excellency the President would have done well to rule out Mr. Patel's motion straight off. We have gone through Mr. Curtis' explanation very carefully once, twice and thrice. Yet we are unable to make out where the urgency was for giving partial effect to the recommendations of the Lawrence Committee.......... The non-officials are opposed to the measure tooth and nail and the public does not care for it because of its reactionary and retrograde character. It seems to us clear that the Bill is merely throwing a bone of contention in the midst of the public, as between Hindus and Muhammadans, as between the landholders and non-landholders.......... We do not mind at all if more of our Muhammadan friends get more seats on these bodies. On the other hand, we should heartily welcome their presence in larger numbers. But the manner in which this end is proposed to be attained is certainly open to grave objections. Separate representation may be good in certain circumstances. But to introduce it deliberately where it does not exist—may be with the utmost honest intentions, as appears to be the case in this Bill—is highly mischievous and it should not have been resorted to, least of all by Lord Willingdon's Government."

EDUCATION.

How students' minds are being trained in the Central Provinces.

Sandesh (103), 13th Mar.

61. A Yeotmal (Berar) correspondent writes to the Sandesh:—You already know that orders on the lines of the Risley Circular are about to be promulgated for the discipline of the students of the Central Provinces, but before that is actually done, the ground is evidently being prepared for their reception. Recently the authorities set a number of questions for being answered by students. On asking one of these students I found that he had given the following answers:—'A student must always obey his parents and be loyal. The worst thing for a student to do is to be seditious. Chapman Saheb is the greatest of men as he loves students while Tilak is the worst as he is opposed to Government. My ideal is to become a Police Sub-Inspector. A gentleman is one who wears a necktie and speaks with the authorities. If I am given five rupees I would give them to the War Fund.' On asking the student why he called Tilak the worst of men, he told me that he had been taught to say so while he was attending a school in the Bombay Presidency some three years back. A second student had answered that he loved his country most, that he respected Mr. Tilak beyond all others, that he was going to devote the rest of his life to the service of his country and that if he had five rupees he would hand them over to Mr. Tilak to assist him in his cause. I told the student what would be the result of his answers, but he told me that he was about to leave school altogether to take up his father's calling. Some of the above answers show what rotten things are being taught to our rising generation.

Muhammadans and compulsory primary education in Bombay.
Mufid-e-Rozgár (122), 14th Mar.

62. Referring to the apprehension expressed by the Muslim Herald that a riot would take place in Bombay if the daughters of Musalmans were forcibly dragged to school in the event of primary education being made compulsory, the Mufid-e-Rozgár reminds its contemporary of the religious obligation laid on the Muhammadans to educate their daughters, and it ridicules the idea of a riot ever occurring over this matter. It points out that the All-India Moslem League has declared itself in favour of compulsory primary education, and vehemently attacks those whose views the Muslim Herald is supposed to have expressed. [Elsewhere the paper draws a pitiable contrast between the incomes of teachers employed in Municipal primary schools in Bombay and those of the domestic servants of wealthy citizens of Bombay. It strongly urges an immediate increase in their salary.]

Comments on the concession made to Muhammadans in Educational institutions in the Bengal Presidency in the matter of reciting Jumma prayers.
Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 15th Mar.

63. The Akhbár-e-Islám expresses its high sense of gratification at the circular issued by Mr. W. W. Hornell, Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, wherein it is declared that in order to accord Moslem students facilities for offering Jumma prayers, work will be suspended in Government schools and colleges in the Bengal Presidency on Fridays for one hour in the noon. It remarks that Bengal Muhammadans should not be slow to thank this kind "Topiwala" for thus respecting the religious feelings of the Muhammadans by issuing the abovementioned circular. It wishes that this circular be given effect to not only in Government schools and colleges but in educational institutions in the Presidency receiving grants-in-aid from Government. The paper also exhorts Mumhammadans in other Presidencies to hold public meetings with a view to inducing other Directors of Public Instruction to follow the example set by Mr. Hornell in this matter.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

What constitutes the first step towards true patriotism.
Vivechak (72) for Feb.

1. The February number of the Vivechak quotes the following passage from "Swami Vivekanand, Part III" on its title page:—Oh ye reformers, ye patriots of the future, have strong hearts. Learn to cherish true feelings and regard. Offer up the pure love of your hearts at the feet of your mother country. Do you feel for her? Are your hearts affected at the sight of hundreds of the children of your adorable personages and Rishis of old that have become like beasts and are leading the degraded life of beasts? Are not your hearts aggrieved at the spectacle of the present starvation of hundreds of thousands of the beloved children of the soil and of hundreds that have been starving for years past? Does the Cimmerian darkness of ignorance that has, like swarthy clouds, swept over the country engender any feelings in your hearts? Does this pitiful sight make you uneasy? Have you ever banished your sleep at this thought and has it ever awakened you up? Has this thought mixed itself up with your blood and commenced to course along your veins? Have your hearts beaten at any time with true feelings for the country? Has this thought ever maddened you? Has the thought of the sorry plight (of the country) made an abode in your hearts and ever made you forget everything else? Have you ever lost the consciousness of your names, business, residence, wives, children, property, your persons and even of this world under the intoxicating influence of this thought? Have you ever had any such experience? It is the first, the very first, step towards becoming a patriot. [Elsewhere the paper publishes a contribution from one Bhánusing wherein the writer has dilated on the evil effects of Western "modes" of living that have assimilated themselves in the life of the Indian people. Dwelling on the poverty of India he remarks that the average daily income of an Indian is one pice; that one or other of the Indian provinces is every year overtaken with famine; that thousands of her children do not daily get sufficient food for their maintenance; that crores of people die of starvation in India during every ten years. He observes that Indians cannot afford blindly to imitate the fashions of Europe and America which are opulent, which supply their own wants, where the average daily income of an individual is 15 rupees, where the scourge of famine does not ever make its appearance as in India and where millions of lives are not sacrificed, as in India, during the course of every ten years at the altar of starvation. The writer maintains that the result of the Indians trying to become Europeanised is that they have lost their sense of self-respect and patriotism, have made India the breeding ground of a number of new diseases and have compelled their starving brethren to forsake even their religion which is as dear to them as life itself.]

Exhortations to Indians to awake and realise the sorry plight of their country.
Vivechak (72) for Jan.

2. The Vivechak reproduces Hindi verses from the Satya Yuga, some of which run thus:—O Indians! give up sloth, wake up and protect your own interests. Your indifference is responsible for much harm. Why is India fallen into such a sorry plight? Surely it has been stabbed by some one. Shame upon us who have been wallowing in luxury and indulging in mutual enmities and laziness. Be awakened to a sense of your duty; unite and move forward and never and never take a retrograde step. It is better to die with honour than to live and suffer insults. Those who exist by living upon the favours of others should be considered as dogs. What have the rich men and members of Legislative Councils done for the welfare of the country? The Honourable members indulge in loud talk but are afraid of speaking out plainly. Do not be mere lip reformers but do some good to your country by your thoughts, words and deeds.

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's reply to the Lancashire Deputation.
Message (6), 24th Mar.;
Kesari (9[illegible]), 20th Mar.;
Mahrátta* (5), 25th Mar.

3. "The degree of warmth with which Mr. Chamberlain spoke upholding the new impost has been really astonishing to us, as it is opposed to his usually cold and sedate temperament at the India Office. It is extremely flattering to think that on occasions when he is spurred to action, our Secretary of State can put up a stout fight on behalf of this country.

Mr. Chamberlain did not only denounce the craven counsels of selfishness and ignorance which had actuated the deputation but he also upheld the policy of the very small degree of indirect protection which the impost of the duty has afforded. Mr. Chamberlain did not speak like a demagogue. He spoke as one who had and felt his great responsibilities. Though the speech is not free from the usual absurdities, Mr. Chamberlain has on the whole shown in this, his best oratorical effort since he came to the India Office, that like some of his predecessors he can also be fair-minded and absolutely impartial.......... Mr. Chamberlain vigorously affirmed on this occasion the one great and guiding principle of British Rule in India. After quoting with approval Sir Henry Fowler, one of his predecessors, about the necessity of counteracting the impression that 'our financial policy in India is dictated by selfish considerations,' he addeed that it was a great libel if anyone were to say so and that neither of the great political parties would for the sake of appeasing advantage deny to the people of India the fair play which they expect. We trust Mr. Chamberlain will soon recognize that those who are pleading with untiring reiteration for economic protection are only asking for fair play and that he will endeavour his best to obtain for India that fair play." [The Kesari writes:—If the enhancement of the duty had not been accompanied by the gift of a million pounds the Lancashire delegates would have made short work of it. But as it is, the acceptance of Mr. Asquith's addendum to consider it afresh after the war and a similar promise by Mr. Chamberlain appear to us ominous. We maintain as a matter of right that the excise duty should be removed and that the duty on foreign cotton goods should be increased. It would be disastrous if Lancashire were to be allowed to dominate the situation again after the war. Mr. Chamberlain admitted the injustice of the excise duty, but where lies the necessity of reconsideration after the war of a thing that is unjust? What is unjust during the time of war is not likely to be just during peace times. Whenever officials find that public opinion is in accord with their views they attach importance to it. Mr. Chamberlain made much of the support of our representatives in his reply to the Lancashire deputation, but these very men are decried as not being real representatives so far as their views on post-war reforms are concerned. The Mahrátta quotes Lord Lansdowne's protest against the cotton excise duties and says:—"These words were uttered twenty years ago when the countervailing excise duty on cotton-goods was first instituted. Lord Lansdowne's words carried no weight then, and they do not carry any weight now. In fact they are not expected to influence 'fiscal politics' to any appreciable extent. That with all our agitation for fair treatment for a good many years past we have been treated unfairly for the sake of Lancashire, is a solid proof of the fact that it is not for us that Lancashire has now been treated to a modicum of justice. It is because England wanted all the money that India could possibly give that the change in the angle of vision is temporarily sanctioned.......... There is one thing that Mr. Chamberlain must be thanked for having done in a thorough manner. He exposed the unfairness of Lancashire's claims in scathing terms and with unanswerable argument."].

Bombay Samáchár (55), 23rd Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 20th Mar.; Gujaráti (13), 18th Mar.

4. The Bombay Samáchár writes in an appreciative tone about the reply given by Mr. Chamberlain to the Lancashire deputation and believes that this reply will add to the satisfaction given to the Indians by this just act of raising the import duty on cotton piece-goods without increasing the excise duty. It wishes and hopes that when the whole fiscal policy of the Empire comes to be considered after the war, full justice will be done to India by completely abolishing the present excise duty on indigenous cotton goods. It remarks that Mr. Chamberlain has done a further service to India by exposing the hollowness of the contention of Lancashire that the present increase in the cotton duty will afford protection to the cotton industry in India. The paper declares that the path of the industrial advancement of India will not be quite free from obstacles as long as the present excise duty is not completely abolished. [The Sánj Vartamán expresses the belief that if Lancashire had scored a success in their present agitation against the increase of the import duty it would have spread great dissatisfaction in this country. It is gratified to note that Government have recognised the justice of the demand made by the Indian public for the abolition of the excise duty, and wishes that in view of the vast help rendered by India to the Empire in the war it had been done away with in this very year. According to the paper the Indian public feels grateful to the Indian Secretary for the bold stand he has made on the present occasion and for his fighting for the rights of India. The Gujaráti does not endorse the belief that justice has been done to India by the raising of the import duty on foreign cotton goods. It is rather inclined to believe that the duty has been raised for the purpose of preventing Japan and America from establishing, by the time the war comes to a close, a firm footing in India in this trade. It declares that England has adopted the policy of killing two birds with one stone by thus preventing the above two countries from unduly profiting from the present situation while at the same time enabling India to render help to the Empire. It observes that England is in a position to help Lancashire by means of a preferential tariff if after the war it is found that Indian mills can seriously compete with Lancashire. The paper believes that justice can be said to be done to the Indian mills only if the excise duty on goods manufactured in them were to be completely abolished.]

Indian Social Reformer (3), 25th Mar.

*5. "We were wrong in assuming on the strength of a telegraphic summary that Mr. Austin Chamberlain based his refusal to raise the excise duty on Indian mill-made cloth, solely on the ground that no member of the Indian Legislative Council would vote for such increase. The Government of India have published the full text of Mr. Chamberlain's reply to the depution from Lancashire.......... So far from resting the case for not raising the duty on a constitutional fiction, as the telegraphic summary led us to think, Mr. Chamberlain took the entire responsibility on himself. The speech reveals him to be a highly conscientious administrator who can warm up, when the occassion justifies it, in defence of Indian interests. We need hardly say that his manly stand for India in this matter has enormously added to the confidence felt in this country in the Government of India. It was a happy idea of Mr. Chamberlain's to associate with himself the Indian delegates to the Imperial War Cabinet in receiving the Lancashire deputation."

The Honourable Sir A. Birkmyre on the Home Rule movement.
Message (6), 22nd Mar.

6. Commenting on the Honourable Sir A. Birkmyre's references to the Home Rule movement in his recent speech at Calcutta, the Message remarks :—" It is no wonder that when the responsible head of a Provincial Government can lay aside, may be for the moment, the dignity of his high position to play to the gallery, the Gunnybag politician of Calcutta should try to pull both ways. As if it was not enough, he tried to make a bad case worse by trying to assert that 'the welfare of India and Indians is indissolubly bound up with our own commercial interests". There would have certainly been more truth if he had reversed the case. There can be no doubt that the commercial prosperity of England and Englishmen is indissolubly bound up with the commercial interests of India; but the best method of securing that prosperity is not by attempting to hold perpetually India down in the scale of commercial nations, as a producer of raw materials to supply the European markets. An economically weak India can never be a strength to the Empire as much as it can otherwise be.......... The 'capitalist imperialism' of a certain class of people may run riot in this land for a time still; but there must be an end to it some day. At one time, it might have only too well succeeded. But the day is now long past recall and the advocate of 'Capitalist Imperialism', in which the masses are governed not in their own interest nor in that of their rulers, but in that of the European capitalist adventurers, must now either definitely make up his mind to sink or swim with the people or quit the country sooner or later. He cannot both stay here and exploit the country in his own interest. It may succeed for a time still as it has succeeded in the past. But if the fair name of the 'Mother Country', to borrow an expression of Sir Dorab Tata, is now (not ?) to be dragged into the mire, Englishmen will have soon to purge them-

[illegible] unholy views and contradictions in life and adhere strictly to the doctrine of equal liberty and equal opportunities for all, whether one is coloured or another is colourless. However obscured for the moment may be the policy of Government by considerations not strictly or logically impartial, the aim of British rule whether it is in India, Egypt or in the lesser colonies, is one and one alone and that is ultimately to govern in the interests of the masses. This aim has not always been kept in view—it was of course inevitable. But now impartial Englishmen have fairly come to see that it is no longer possible to rule the country in the interests of the capitalist adventurers from Europe or America."

Comments on the reply of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb to Mr. Tilak about his exclusion from that Province.

Message (6), 21st Mar.

7. "We read in our Allahabad contemporary of the Leader that a certain Arya Samajist preacher and worker, Mr. Laik Ram, was arrested by our C. I. D. friends and taken to Benares where he was detained in jail for over three months, 'without any charge', as a correspondent says. It took the C. I. D. three months and more to discover that their 'reasonable grounds for the belief in question' could not be supported, try as they might, and after being detained in hajut for three months Mr. Laik Ram is let off! That is one thing. In this case, however, the Lieutenant-Governor, too, had his reasonable grounds for believing that Mr. Tilak intended to visit the Punjáb and there act as a fuse to ignite the heap of dynamite on which Sir Michael O'Dwyer is so uncomfortably seated by an unkind superior Government and thereby endanger the 'public safety', whatever that may mean. The intention ascribed to Mr. Tilak is forthwith denied, and the course for his Honor was all plain sailing. He should have either accepted Mr. Tilak's statement or stated his reason for non-acceptance.......... Considering, however, the time that has elapsed between Mr. Tilak's request and the Lieutenant-Governor's reply, we feel sure that His Honor must have made further inquiries. If His Honor had found any substantial ground of justification for his hasty and ill-conceived action we are quite sure it would have been forthcoming. But as it is the reply is neither a refutation of Mr. Tilak's statement nor a justification of the step. That being so, we are left (sic) by His Honor's own account that he has no grounds which can bear the light of day to support his action and the formula is repeated to cover his precipitate retreat from a hastily taken up position."

Alleged high-handedness of Mr. Hood, Assistant Collector, Kolába.

Kesari (95), 20th Mar.

8. A correspondent writes to the Kesári:—The Assistant Collector, S. D., Kolaba, Mr. Hood, while removing his camp from Tale, Taluka Mangaon, impressed carts through his servants and went about himself and removed the wheel-pins of the carts he came across. Though Mr. Sadashiv Abaji Bhat consented to give him one cart he demanded another and in spite of the owner's protests removed the wheel-pins of both. How can people obtain justice if the Magistrates themselves do such things?

The enforcement of the Defence of India Act is creating dissatisfaction among the people.

Gujaráti (13), 25th Mar., Eng. cols.

*9. Referring to the exclusion of Mr. Tilak and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal from the Punjáb and Delhi, the Gujaráti writes:—"We thought that high-placed English officers were more courageous and brave than they have shown themselves to be. But they do not know the strength of British rule as much as we do nor do they understand the people. They are unjust to themselves and to the British Government in aimlessly firing off prohibitive orders with such nervous fear. They are unjust to the people in administering the Act with such lack of judgment and will do well to consider if they are not unconsciously adding to the strength of the dissatisfaction which they are so anxious to prevent. The beloved 'Chitpawan Brahmin' of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb has shown himself more courageous than the heroic warden of the North-West frontier. No less than three provincial administrations have striven with one another with incomparable zeal to elevate him even to a higher pedestal than the one from which he is supposed to imperil public safety and from which they would, therefore, like to see him dethroned. We congratulate them on their wisdom, the soundness of their judgment and their unerring foresight, and also the authors of the Defence of India Act on their marvellous workmanship in the domain of legislation. At the same time we cannot conceal from ourselves the fact that these extraordinary exhibitions of official zeal would have been impossible under the règime of that great, righteous and courageous Viceroy who knew how to bear himself with unsurpassed nobility and intrepidity even at the moment of supreme peril to his own priceless life."

Appeal to Government to check the evil of betting on the Mahaluxmi race-course, Bombay.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 20th Mar.

10. The Jám-e-Jamshed expatiates on the evil effects produced among the middle and poorer classes of the people as a result of gambling on the totalizator at the Mahalaxmi race-course and inquires when this vice which brings ruin upon the poor and innocent classes of the people of this city will be put a stop to. It refers to the opinion expressed by men experienced in this matter that the present system of 'Tote' which has supplanted the old bookmakers has only resulted in drawing to the race-course a very large section of poor peeple who were hitherto quite innocent of the vice of gambling on the turf. The paper emphatically declares that if the authorities neglect to take timely and effective measure to check this evil, it will lead to fearful and disastrous results as far as the people of this city are concerned.

How merchants are making undue profits through taxes imposed by Government on particular commodities.

Sind Observer (10), 2nd Mar.

11. Referring to the Times of India's remarks about the action of the petrol firms in raising the price of the commodity as soon as they got wind of Government's intention to levy a tax upon it, the Sind Observer writes as follows about similar action on the part of wine merchants:—"As soon as the liquor dealers got wind of the tax, and for at least three months before Government announced the fact, up went the prices. Stocks piled up in godowns were augmented by drawing supplies out of bond and the public were obliged to buy at a higher rate goods on which the merchant had not paid an extra pie of duty. All this money, which according to the theory of the financial pundits of Government was to swell the public purse in fact went to the banking account of our loyal traders. Naturally it was some time before the stocks held and thus sold were exhausted and before the enhanced duty began to roll into the Government treasuries. Again a rumour has been started that a further increase in the duty on liquor is to be charged and, taking time by the forelock, our alert dealers have already raised their prices. The public are being squeezed by the capitalists who are astute fellows! They are lending the money thus obtained to Government at a thumping rate of interest in the War Loan and posing as patriots. But the same public will have to pay the interest and the principal, and it will be many long years before the account is cleared. We have taken liquor as an example, but there are other articles about which we could say the same. This chuckle-headed method of finance may look very attractive in theory, but, we know by sad experience, that neither Government nor the consumers profit by it. It is useless to expect the British Government to see the folly of carrying on the administration in this unbusinesslike manner, and we must submit to be mulct by the traders and pay heavily for the war to boot."

Comments on the progress of the war.

Hindusthán (17), 22nd Mar.

12. Commenting upon the British advance in the West, the Hindusthán writes:—We must congratulate the British Commander on the advance he has made without the expenditure of munitions and the sacrifice of men. It seems, however, from German papers that the retreat has been planned and the orderliness and absence of any kind of losses with which the German retirement has been effected lends colour to the opinion that the retreat was premeditated. It is believed in certain quarters that the shortening of the battle front will enable Germany to despatch fresh troops to the Russian zone. In the West the Allies will be engaged in the task of consolidating their gains, and the Germans, in the meanwhile, might be able to deal a blow to Russia. Events in the next few weeks will help us to know the true situation

Gujarâti (13), 18th Mar.

13. Commenting upon the progress of the war, the Gujarâti writes:— If the Russians make headway in the direction of Mosul, the British are sure to carry their advance far ahead of Baghdad. The Turks have lost Mesopotamia and Armenia. The British have occupied the Sinai peninsula and are advancing towards Jerusalem. It does not, therefore, seem likely that the Turks will be able to make a stand for a long time. The Allied offensive in the West is proving effective and the Germans are beating a retreat and we shall not be surprised if the contending armies meet in the open field. The German dreams of invading India have been completely shattered. We do not think that Baghdad will ever be given back. German submarinism has not proved very effective and Germany's zeppelins also have achieved little this year. China has also broken off its relations with Germany, who seems to be intent upon protracting the war with a view to securing favourable terms of peace.

Caution against under-estimating the capacity of the Turks to rally after the fall of Bagdad.

Sind Observer (10), 16th Mar.

14. In the course of its comments on the fall of Bagdad and the general situation in Mesopotamia, the Sind Observer remarks —"We are not of those who believe, nor do we wish it to be believed, that the Turkish army before General Maude has been destroyed and that the remnants are a negligible quantity. The facts are against such a presumption. The small number of prisoners we have taken, about 8,000 in all, indicate that the Turkish commander was able to withdraw his main army and, although he abandoned many guns and much material on the way, these can be replaced and it will be Germany's object to replace them if she hopes to retain the friendship of the Turk, which must be rudely shaken by this defeat. The Turks also requisitioned and removed from Bagdad great quantities of stores, all which point to plans for a rally at Samara which is the place to which the enemy have fled. So long as our commander and the officers under him do not allow themselves to be deluded into false security by contempt for a beaten enemy there is no fear that the Turks will recover the lost ground from the gallant and superbly munitioned British army now holding the country around Bagdad."

Alleged harm done by Government press communiqués intended to dissipate wild rumours in connection with the war.

Sind Observer (10), 2nd Mar.

15. Referring to the press communiqué issued by the Government of Madras in connection with the sinking of the Worcestershire, the Sind Observer remarks:—"We quite agree that some steps should be taken to combat rumours, but it is too much to expect Government to attend to every stupid story. We should like to point out, however, that communiqués issued by Provincial Governments with the object of disposing of idle rumours sometimes do more harm than good. They are published with regard to local circumstances, but when circulated outside the province in which issued, causes a further crop of rumours. For instance take the communiqué about the sinking of the Worcestershire. The Government of Madras state therein that there is no reason to suppose that any enemy craft has found its way into the Bay of Bengal. Now Karâchi had not thought of the Bay of Bengal, believing that part of the sea quite safe. Immediately rumour filled the Bay of Bengal with German submarines and the wildest stories of their doings there and elsewhere became current. A communiqué on such matters should, we think, be published by the Government of India after due consideration. Every sensible person must know that precautions are necessary whenever a German vessel is reported to be operating even hundreds of miles from the coast of India, and that in making announcements to dissipate rumours the military and naval authorities must be extremely careful not to provide the enemy with useful information. On the other hand it is true that the most carefully worded communiqué is often taken to pieces by panicky people and rumours created from the scraps. We regret to say that members of the European public are adepts at this game."

Comments on the revolution in Russia.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 21st Mar.; Sánj Vartáman (29), 17th and 19th Mar.; Prája Mitra and Pársi (24), 18th Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 19th Mar.; Shri Sayáji Vijaya (70), 22nd Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 19th Mar.

16. Writing at length on the revolution in Russia the Bombay Samáchár remarks:—The revolution is mostly due to the fact that the protagonists of absolutism waged the war in an indifferent manner and brought the people on the verge of starvation with a view to bringing the war to a close and thus maintaining their own supremacy. The revolution has given independence to the Russians and has furnished an opportunity to them to prosecute the war with vigour to a successful termination. The eyes of the world are now turned to Russia to see what use the Russian people make of their present opportunities. [The Sánj Vartáman writes:—The revolution means a new birth of the Russian nation with the end of the tyranny of the Czar and those who used him as their tool. An enlightened form of Government will take the place of ignorance and disorder. Other States in Europe, particularly Greece, are likely to be greatly affected by this revolution. We feel sure that the new Government will prosecute the war with vigour. The Kaiser should take a lesson from the fate of the Czar or else the German people will put an end to the Prussian Militarism by an open revolt. In a subsequent issue the paper writes:—We now see that it is the representatives of the people and not socialists or anarchists that have taken the administration of Russia into their own hands. The new Government will try to correct the mistakes of the old one. The added strength the nation has received by the popular success will go a great way in bringing about peace with victory. The revolution has strengthened the position of the Allies and weakened the enemy. The Jám-e-Jamshed adds:—Tyranny is at an end in Russia and the Russian people will be ruled by a responsible and a representative government. Russia will now be ranked with other civilised and popular governments. Let us wish success to the new democratic government in Russia. The Prája Mitra and Pársi writes:—We would congratulate the Russian people on the new form of government they have secured and wish them success. The Akhbár-e-Islám remarks:—The awakening in the Russian people and the abdication of the Czar may be taken as clear signs of the impending fall of Germany. The Shri Sayáji Vijaya writes:—A backward nation like Russia has taken the Government in its own hands with a view to vigorous prosecution of the war. It is believed that the British Government will recognise the new government without any hesitation. What surprises has time in store for us! The Hindusthán says:—All the German calculations seem to have been upset by the turn the Russian revolution has taken. The revolution has clearly shown that the people are anxious to prosecute the war.]

Gujaráti (13), 18th Mar.; Indian Social Reformer* (3), 25th Mar.

17. Commenting upon the revolution in Russia, the Gujaráti writes:—The Czar has abdicated but we do not know anything as to his whereabouts. It is to be regretted that the news of the revolution should come at a time when the enemy is on the point of being defeated. Mr. Bonar Law says that it is not peace but the vigorous prosecution of the war, that is the object of the revolution and so the progress of the war will not be adversely affected thereby. The messages that have been exchanged between the Czar and the Duma lead us to the belief that the Czar is with the army. The Czar is in the danger of losing of his sovereign power at a time when he is conducting an expedition for the capturing of Constantinople. [The Indian Social Reformer remarks:—"Russia is fortunate at this grave crisis in her history in having for her ally the one and only nation which has proved its capacity to accomplish political revolutions with the minimum

[illegible] to the established order of things.......... The most striking feature of the Revolution in Russia has been the ferocity of the mob towards the Police, especially the secret or detective Police. The bureaucracy with the help of the secret Police had made life a burden to the people, and no wonder that the first outbreak of the Revolution should be signalised by the destruction of the offices which were the head-quarters of this detested organisation."]

Kesari (95), 20th Mar.

18. The Kesari thinks there are not sufficient grounds to believe that the revolution was brought about to counteract pro-German influences in the administration. If the theory of German intrigue were true, what becomes, it asks, of the bold front which Russia has shown against Germany since the beginning of the war? It rather believes that the revolution was directed against the oppressive bureaucracy which was ruling the country and that the movement which was going on in that country for nearly a century has now borne visible fruit. It declares that the revolution has taught the lesson that bureaucracy in every part of the world must in the end be prepared to give up its powers and place them in the hands of the people. It points out that though the Duma hitherto held a position similar to that of the Indian Legislative Councils as its deliberations could be utterly disregarded by the Czar or his advisers, the scales are now completely turned and the Russian Royal House is itself in danger. It feels confident that the new Government will add to the glory of Russia.

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

*19. "The forces of absolutism, whether autocratic or bureaucratic, cannot but give way before a well-organised people who know their own minds and have the will to rule themselves. The American Revolution proved this proposition. The revolutions in France have proved it. The Turkish, the Chinese and now the Russian Revolution have illustrated it anew. The world is progressing from Darkness to Light. But this progress is neither smooth nor rapid. The dark forces have a self-love, equally with the forces of light. And the former by reason of their self-love struggle to perpetuate their hold on the world. This struggle, though futile in the long run, results in much suffering while it is going on. Those who are ranged on the side of Light have to suffer immensely. Through suffering lies the road to salvation.......... The young men and women of Russia, ever since the wave of the New Spirit took possession of them in the sixties of the last century, have been toiling continuously amongst their ignorant brethren with the single purpose of making true men and women of them. So must we work for as long as may be necessary if we are really desirous of giving to India the place she deserves in the Empire. Home Rule is not to be easily got. We have no Mikados to look up to. We have a hardened bureaucracy to fight against and we have to fight without the usual weapons of warfare. Very imperious, therefore, is the necessity for a sustained effort on our part to enlighten and organise our brethren for the constitutional and spiritual resistance which we shall have to offer in case our just demands are treated with scant courtesy by the men in power. Russia has solved her problem in one way. We mean to solve ours quite in another. Russia has used the bomb, the revolver and what not. We mean to use nothing of the sort. But this our pious resolution necessitates all the more effort on our part. Let us take note of this and work accordingly. Vande Mataram!"

Comments on the publication of the Dardanelles Commission's report.

Sind Observer (10), 16th Mar.

20. "The publication of the Dardanelles Commission's report and the withholding of the evidence on which the report is based smacks of an attempt to discredit the late Government in the eyes of the public. It is difficult to see what good it has done to place such a document before the people at the present time of stress when every effort should be directed at an avoidance of contention and recrimination.......... Public men who were in power when the operations were initiated and the Commission was appointed are no longer in the Ministry, and one of them died for the country while proceeding to give his advice to our Allies, the Russians. Whether the expedition was or was not muddled, or whether it was or was not muddled in the manner and by the men the Commission saddles with the blame, makes absolutely no difference at this stage when we need unity and not acrimoneus discussion in the presence of the representatives of the Dominions who have arrived for the War Conference. It is as miserable a spectacle as the unfortunate manner in which the Prime Minister has handled the Irish Home Rule question. We are afraid that neither the one nor the other will impress the Dominions, our Allies or neutrals in favour of the Government over which Mr. Lloyd George presides."

The Imperial War Conference and the Secretary of State for India.
Message (6), 23rd Mar.

21. "When the 'Push and go' Premier resolved to take the Dominion representatives—mark, you! not 'assistants'—into active council in 'Imperial' matters the last nail was hit in the coffin of precedent. There is no doubt that Mr. Lloyd George would have carried his 'push and go' policy to its legitimate conclusion, if the reactionary forces working at the India Office had not interposed themselves in his path. A war cabinet without the Secretary of State for India in it! It was incomprehensible at Whitehall, and Mr. Chamberlain said that he would be India's representative and so he is. We do not doubt that considerations of 'prestige' that have for half a century blocked the path of progress weighed against India being directly represented. 'Oh, what would India think to-morrow if her elected representatives sat in the cabinet by their own right!' The permanent officials must have whispered in the ears of a quiescent secretary: 'It would make it impossible for us to govern India, unless you put a brake upon the break-neck speed of the precedent-breaking Premier and induce him to accept you as India's representative.' Otherwise, Mr. Chamberlain, as the honourable man he is who has all these years fought his principles, and has sunk all political differences on behalf of national unity and concord, would have certainly welcomed the Premier's desire to take the representatives of the 'Indian' people into the inner councils of the Empire. We are strengthened in this belief by his vigorous defence of the principle and practice too—of justice as between Indian and Lancashire mill industry. He knows and he feels like an 'Imperial' Englishman that justice and righteousness alone are the sure foundations of a glorious and lasting Empire. We wish Mr. Chamberlain could have risen in this matter to the full height of his conception of true and lasting 'Imperialism'. It is not too late to mend the wrong that is done to India. There are already two Indians, one drawn from the ranks of the people and the other from the aristocracy of India. Though they are the nominees of the Indian Government, the wrong could be somewhat righted by treating them as the full-fledged representatives of India, entitled to as much voice as the Dominion representatives are accorded. But 'will the Imperial Government do it'? That is a question for Mr. Lloyd George to answer."

The Indian Defence Force.
Gujaráti (13), 18th Mar.; Káthiáwár Times (22), 18th Mar.

22. People naturally ask why no meetings are held by the officials to ask people to enlist in the Defence Force as is being done in the case of the War Loan. Why is no meeting held under the presidentship of His Excellency Lord Willingdon for enlistment in the Defence Force? Are not Indians needed for the protection of the Empire? In our opinion both men and money are needed for the prosecution of the war and any delay in issuing an appeal for men is harmful. The impression that Government want money and not men from India must not be allowed to gain ground. The Indian section of the Defence Force will be governed by the Army Act with only this difference that it will not be sent outside India. But Indians serving in the Defence Force will have to labour under the same disabilities in the matter of Commissions as the men in the regular army. The discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council makes it clear that while European British subjects will be eligible for the King's Commissions the [illegible] will not be open to Indians. Indians have gained a small opening for becoming Volunteers but the law does not make it clear that they will be treated on an equal footing with European British subjects in the matter of receiving commissions. [The Káthiáwár Times makes an appeal to the young men studying in schools and colleges to readily come forward to join the Indian Defence Force. It holds forth the example of the Japanese who came forward to serve on the ships that were sure to be sunk and some of whom had written out their offers of service in their own blood, and asks Indian youths to fully avail themselves of the opportunity offered to them by the Defence of India Force Act of serving the country and the Empire.]

Kesari (95), 20th Mar.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 22nd Mar.

23. All are unanimous in holding that it would be better for our youths to undergo military training for a couple of years, and we earnestly request our young men to register their names as soon as Government publish the rules. It is unfortunate that Government are silent on the point of higher military training. But what is gained is not little and, as Dr. Mackichan has said, officers are produced from the ranks and we expect hundreds, nay, thousands will join the colours and astonish the people and Government. There are, however, some people who are our enemies in the guise of friends. Capital has remarked that Chitpawans should not at all be admitted to the force and that Home Rulers would be like Grattan's volunteers, if admitted. The military authorities had entertained a similar distrust and denied admission to educated Indians so long. If Indians had been given military training freely they would have gone in lakhs to Europe and defended the Empire. But the short-sighted Anglo-Indians could see nothing else than their own interest and the Empire was denied the advantage. Whatever the Anglo-Indian papers may say, it is not possible that the old unstatesmanlike, absurd and short-sighted policy would continue hereafter or the British statesmen would allow it to continue. It is necessary in the interests of the Empire itself that India should be given the rights of swarájya and that Indians should be admitted into the Army. This should be borne in mind while calling upon the educated classes to join the army. Sons of millionaires like the Honourable Mr. Manmohandas Ramji are not joining the Army to accept slavery for life on Rs. 15 or 20. Many rich youths joined the Territorials considering it to be an honour to defend the country and the Empire. If such an army is to be raised in India it can only be raised on the principle of trust. Government have noted it and they are attempting to raise an army of educated classes, slowly though it might be. [The Dnyán Prakásh expresses disappointment at the inadequacy of the pay admissible to Indian recruits of the Defence Force. It remarks that Government should have laid down a higher scale of pay as the Force is to be recruited from a better class of people. It regards the distinction between Europeans and Indians in the matter of commissions as most annoying. It, however, exhorts young men not to let these considerations come in the way of their determination to enlist in the army.]

The Honourable Mr. G. M. Bhurgri's appeal to the young men of Sind to join the Indian Defence Force.

Al-Haq (42), 10th Mar.

24. "We heartily endorse the lofty ideal which the Honourable Mr. G. M. Bhurgri of Hyderabad, Sind, has set in his important appeal which he has recently addressed to the young men in Sind on the subject of enlistment for the purpose of Indian Defence. We have published the appeal in our correspondence columns to-day. Our young men will find that the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri has offered himself for enlistment and he wants those who intend to enrol themselves to communicate with him. Our young men in Sind should know that similar appeals have also been issued by Mrs. Annie Besant in Madras, Babu Surrendranath Bannerjee in Bengal and Mr. B. G. Tilak in Bombay. We hope our young men here will seize the opportunity that has now been presented to them and thus prove themselves fit for getting self-government."

Comments on the rules for the voluntary recruits of the Indian Defence Force.

Message (6), 21st Mar.

25. "It will be noticed that one of the questions to be put to the intending recruit is vaguely worded and is liable to misconstruction. The question runs thus:—Are you willing to allow no caste usages to interfere with your duty? Now, one may be quite willing 'to allow no caste usages to interfere with one's military duty'; but what exactly is a caste usage? For instance, is refusal to eat mutton or beef a matter of 'caste usage' only, or is it not? We think that the authorities would clear up the matter by stating what 'caste usage' exactly means. We can understand the difficulties of such definition, but it ought not to be above the capabilities of Government. It must be clearly understood that we do not want to insist on strict caste rules being observed in military camps, but there must be some sort of understanding as to how far we will have to break the caste rules. For instance, most of the volunteers will be prepared to give up, while in the field or in the barracks, the rigour of the rules as regards touching this person and not touching that person, but few will be perpared to give up the 'usage' against flesh-eating."

Hindusthán (17), 23rd Mar.

26. The bright hopes and pleasant dreams we entertained about the Indian Defence Force are one by one coming to naught and we get fresh proofs of the continued and unshakable existence of caste and colour prejudice. Our youths have been and still are anxious to join the Defence Force, but it is to be regretted that sufficient care is not taken to respect their feelings. The rules under the Indian Defence Force Act have lately been issued and they have greatly tended to damp the enthusiasm of the Indian youth. Apart from the question of enlistment being compulsory for European British subjects and voluntary for Indians, the rules embody certain unwarranted and unjust distinctions that are greatly to be deplored and it is feared they will eccentuate the discontent prevalent among the people. Is it not unjust that the age limit for enlistment of Indians has been fixed between 18 and 30 when European British subjects are to be enlisted upto the age of 41? We are constrained to ask why such a galling distinction has been made in the rules. A person of good character will not be able to enlist in the Defence Force merely on the score that he belongs to the criminal tribes or the menial classes! In the matter of commissions, as is evident from the interpellations in the Imperial Legislative Council, the disabilities Indians already suffer in this respect will be continued in the Defence Force. It is said that those who enlist in the Force will be treated as regulars and full time servants and sent to any part of India This means that business men will not be able to join the Force as they expected to do by drilling for some time every day. Now only students and fresh graduates will be able to join the Force. Moreover, flogging, which has been abolished in British Army is still resorted to in the case of the Indian Army and so a graduate must be prepared to subject himself to such a disgraceful form of punishment by joining the Force. Should flogging be continued in the army, very few Indian youths will come forward to join the force voluntarily. However, we hope Indian youths will not fail to avail themselves of the concessions given to them. It would, no doubt, have been in the fitness of things if Government had shown broadmindedness and liberality of spirit in framing the rules.

Grant of Commissions to Indians in the army.

Message (6), 22nd Mar.

27. Referring to the statement made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding grant of Commissions to Indians, the Message remarks:—"On the whole, the Commander-in-Chief's reply has left us under the impression that nothing will be done in respect of granting Commissions to Indians, even to those who have already joined the ranks of existing forces and distinguished themselves in the field.......... As regards the publication of the correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State, the Commander-in-Chief repeated the well-worn formula that it would not be 'in the interest of the public services.' If so controversial a documents as the Dardanelles Commission Report could be published, one is tempted to speculate what might be there in this correspondence which makes it inexpedient for publication. Is the public to infer from it that the correspondence is most unfavourable to the cherished hopes of Indians?"

Comments on the statement that Europeans in Bombay are feeling uneasy that Indian Home Rulers will be enrolled as volunteers.

Message (6), 18th Mar.

28. Referring to the statement of the Bombay correspondent of a Calcutta Anglo-Indian paper that the European population of the city was feeling "growing anxiety" at "the bold attempt of the Indian Home Rule party to turn to their account the Government's concession of volunteering for Indians", the Message remarks:—"That the 'European population' should view with 'growing anxiety' the patriotic and loyal move of Mr. Tilak is natural, in view of the fact that that population is taught to think of him as an incorrigible seditionist and the further fact that one does not like to see that the opinion one held about a man was wrong. That the Bombay correspondent who expressed the more 'growing anxiety' of the Europeans should also like to know how many of the 500 young volunteers were Chitpavans is also quite natural in view of the fact, among others that the Punjab Government has unduly emphasised Mr. Tilak's Chitpavan parentage. What is natural, however, is not always just, nor is it necessarily very wise. It is natural for asses to bray and though the braying may not be very pleasant to hear one sometimes comes across it and has to bear it much in the same way as the effusion of the 'Bombay correspondent'."

Comments on the proposed formation of a Labour Corps in India for service in Europe.

Praja Mitra and Parsi (24), 19th Mar.

29. We would take this opportunity of thanking the Government of His Majesty the King Emperor and the Government of India for the opportunity they have given our labourers of serving the Empire by the proposed formation of a Labour Corps. We share the hope of the Government of India that the provincial governments will find no difficulty in securing the required number of men. Let us hope our popular leaders will think it a part of their duty to use their influence to enable Government to secure an adequate number of people to serve in the Labour Corps. The employment of Indian labour in Europe will go a great way in removing the misunderstanding that now exists in the west about the Indian people and in teaching new labour saving methods to our people.

Comments on the appeal addressed to the people by the Chairman of the Bombay Citizens' War Loan Execution Committee.

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 17th Mar., Eng. cols.

30. "The appeal addressed to the citizens of Bombay by Mr. T. W Birkett, Chairman of the Bombay Citizens' Executive Committee does not err on the side of over zealousness. In the first place an unnecessarily large part of the space devoted to the appeal is taken up by instructions to the public as to what and how to buy things with which they are supposed to be familiar by this time. Too much stress is laid on the fact that the capital invested is safe, too little on the cardinal points that the safety of the whole Empire is at stake and that on the amount tendered depends the prestige of the whole of India. Even at this stage it is certainly not too late to vary the wording of the appeal and we sincerely hope this will be done as early as possible."

Her Excellency Lady Willingdon and the War Loan.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 20th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 24th Mar.

31. The Bombay Samáchár expresses gratification at the steps taken by Her Excellency Lady Willingdon to open a branch office for the War Loan in connection with the Women's Branch of the War Relief Fund and thus giving an opportunity to Indian women to contribute their share towards the successful prosecution of the war. It is of opinion that the Bearer Bonds will specially be suitable for well-to-do Indian women who cannot sign or are averse to signing their own names. It appeals to rich and well-to-do Indian women to invest their Stri Dhan or their personal property in the war loan and asks all Indian women to effect economies in the matter of their dress and other comforts and purchase the post office cash certificates month by month. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi dwells on the various philanthropic movements undertaken by Her Excellency Lady Willingdon and thanks her for the opportunity she has afforded to the women of this Presidency to serve the Empire by contributing to the War Loan.]

Muhammadan activity in Bombay for entertaining wounded soldiers.
Islámic Mail (4), 11th Mar.

32. "There was a complaint, not quite groundless, that the Muhammadans of Bombay did not evince the same enthusiasm in co-operating with the Relief workers as they showed in other public matters. The fact is that Muhammadans in Bombay are mostly men of business, too engrossed in their trades to think of anything else, but when an appeal is made to them they rise to the occasion and display their large heartedness. The officials of the relief work have made a mistake in not including the Muhammadans in their committees. When Sir Claude Hill was here and was a chairman of the Hospitals Committee, he always took some Muhammadans to work with him and the late Mr. Chinoy was a member and an active member of all such Committees as did relief work. After his death no Muhammadan has been allowed to take his place. The Muhammadans are eager to do something for the wounded but they are too bashful to push themselves forward and this shyness is mistaken for indifference of which Bai Dilshad Bai complained in one of her speeches. Mr. Mohamed Kadir Shaikh, Oriental Translator, who has been taking a deep interest in the affairs of his community and trying to promote a better understanding between Government and Muhammadans, called up a meeting of prominent Muhammadans last week, and impressed upon them the duty they owed not only to Government but also to their co-religionists and countrymen who were fighting for the Empire and upholding the honour of the country and of their own community in a glorious way. Those present cheerfully agreed to do their best to encourage the wounded soldiers and make them feel that it was something for them to fight for the Empire. The Honourable Mr. Salehboy and Sirdar Suleman Mitha avowed themselves to do all in their power and are arranging magnificent entertainments for the wounded soldiers in Bombay. We are indebted to Mr. Shaikh for his patriotic and loyal action, and hope that Sirdar Suleman Mitha and Mr. Salehboy's action will serve as an incentive for leaders of other communities and the Muhammadans will show that they are second to none in their appreciation of the loyal services of those who are laying down their lives for their beloved sovereign."

Comments on Government's reply to the Maharaja of Cossimbazar's interpellation in the Imperial Legislative Council about Indians in the Telegraph Department.
Message (6), 22nd Mar.

33. "In reply to a question by the Maharaja of Cossimbazar regarding the appointment of Indians to the Telegraph Department, Sir George Barnes said that Indians have been practically excluded from direct appointment to the General Scale, as the result of a decision of the Government of India that the majority of the telegraph operators should be non-Indians. The decision was, he added, in accord with reasons of State, though he failed to state those reasons. There can only be one reason for the exclusion of 'Indian' Indians and that is a distrust of them. But Sir George Barnes said that the majority of the Telegraph operators were non-Indians. Unless it can be explained on the score of confusion of terms, it is difficult to understand what the Commerce Member meant. For all that we know, there are many Eurasians and Indian Christians working as operators in the Telegraph Department, and are these people, most of whom are classified in the census list as belonging to the Indian nationality, to be considered as 'non-Indians' for purposes of meeting the demands of the department? Is religion, then, synonymous to 'nationality'? It would be interesting to know, as otherwise Sir George Barnes' statement would lead one to think that foreigners were very largely employed in the Department."

Comments on the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding the recommendations of the Public Service Commission.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 22nd Mar.

34. The Sánj Vartamán endorses the arguments advanced by the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in support of his resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council urging Government not to take action on the recommendations contained in the report of the Public Services Commission and adds:—We would go a step further and ask Government not to give any consideration whatsoever to the recommendations till the duration of the war. The report is full of contentious and controversial matters and public interests require the postponement of its consideration. We are gratified at the assurance Government have given to allow members of the Imperial Legislative Council to bring forward resolutions on the recommendations of the Commission. We hope the Council will move resolutions on the subject and urge Government to give an adequate number of posts to Indians in all branches of the public service with a view to allaying public discontent.

The resolution about free and compulsory primary education in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Dnyán Prakásh (34), 21st Mar.

35. The policy of the Government of India governing primary education is most disappointing. Recent experience shows that they oppose each and every proposal of the non-official members of the Legislative Council regarding education on very flimsy grounds. The attitude of Sir Sankaran Nair is particularly to be deplored. We wonder whether Government service has a tendency to adversely affect one's mind. The Honourable Mr. Sarma moved that steps be taken to make primary education free and compulsory within a period of fifteen years. This is a perfectly reasonable request. Sir Sankaran Nair, however, opposed it on the ground that there was no universal demand for compulsory education. Why should Government wait until there is a 'universal' demand? The educated classes are in favour of compulsion and that, in our opinion, ought to suffice. If the whole population desired compulsory primary education there would be no need no resort to compulsion. Government do not make primary education free and compulsory nor do they take steps to impart it on an extensive scale. They trotted out the familiar plea of want of funds even when the exchequer was full during peace time. It is useless, therefore, to expect a liberal grant for primary education during the progress of the war. It may be convenient always to plead financial stringency but it is not just.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Patel's resolution in the Bombay Legislative Council on the subject of elective majorities in Municipalities.

Bombay Samáchár (55), 20th Mar.; Kesari (95), 20th Mar.

36. In view of the progress local self-government has made in other parts of India, the Bombay Samáchár regrets that the Honourable Mr. Patel felt himself compelled to withdraw the first part of the resolution brought by him in the Bombay Legislative Council wherein he recommended that the number of elective members on all Municipalities constituted under the Bombay District Municipal Act should be not less than two-thirds of the total number of members. It remarks that the disappointment of the 57 municipalities in the Presidency that will yet remain debarred from the abovesaid right will be enhanced by the arguments advanced by the official members in the Council who opposed Mr. Patel's resolution. In the face of the wave of nationalism that has swept over the country, it is regrettable, observes the paper, to doubt the capacity of particular municipalities before granting them the necessary rights. It then goes on to maintain that though the public will rejoice at the passing of the latter part of the Honourable Mr. Patel's resolution for allowing those municipalities that have already got the right of electing their own presidents to have a two-thirds majority of elected members, in view of the manner in which the officials opposed the resolution it remains to be seen how far it will be carried into effect. The paper attributes this partial success of Mr. Patel to the sympathy and solicitude of Lord Willingdon's Government for the people. It wishes that when the Bill for the reconsti tution of district municipalities comes before the Council, the expectations cherished by the public may be realised in much the same way as they have been realised to some extent on the present occasion. [The Kesari congratulates the Honourable Mr. Patel on getting his resolution conferring on some of the municipalities the right of electing two-thirds of the total number of members in the board and says that it is a sign of great conceit on the part of Government to propose that the right would be granted if all such municipalities would accept a Government official as Executive Officer. It adds :—The local bureaucracy does not want to give the people any rights but at the same time it makes a show so that it may not be termed backward in comparison with other Governments. The Honourable Mr. Patel brought to light such an instance. It was proved in the course of the evidence recorded by the Decentralisation Commission that Bombay lagged behind all other provinces in the matter of granting local self-government rights. The Bombay Government, anticipating adverse remarks, issued a resolution hurriedly in 1908 conferring the right of electing two-thirds of the councillors but limited it to municipalities having a population of 15,000. Nearly 70 municipalities were thus denied the privilege. In the new Local Board Bill the right is not conferred clearly and definitely and it rests with the Commissioners to recommend a Board for this privilege. But these tactics are known to the people and we hope the members of the Select Committee would see that a definite clause is introduced instead of a vague one, bearing in mind the old bitter experience.]

Young India (11), 21st Mar.

37. "His Excellency Lord Willingdon seemed to resent somewhat strongly the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel's remarks concerning the reactionary and retrograde policy of his Government in regard to local self-government. It is an open secret that notwithstanding all his professions of deep sympathy with the aspirations of the people, Lord Willingdon has failed to exert his personal influence over the administration and left it too much in the hands of his bureaucratic advisers. His administration has suffered by his reposing too much trust in the wisdom of 'the men on the spot'; and if His Excellency has found himself occasionally in awkward positions it cannot at all be surprising. The defeat of Government on Mr. Patel's resolution regarding the elective franchise in municipalities at the last session of the Council, in spite of the very strong opposition, which, at first, the official members and subsequently His Excellency himself presented, carries its own lesson, and if Lord Willingdon is sincerely desirous of proving his sympathy with popular aspirations he cannot do better than profit by that lesson. We should certainly like to see a changed angle of vision on the part of His Excellency, if not on that of the members of his Government, for this latter, we think, is obviously impossible, and that changed angle given more and more free play in the administration for the rest of His Excellency's term of office."

Interpellations in the Bombay Legislative Council.

Gujaráti Punch (15), 18th Mar.

38. Referring to the interpellations made in the recent session of the local Legislative Council, the Gujaráti Punch expresses its disapproval of the question put by the Honourable Mr. Belvi as to whether the Local Board of the Belgaum District contained a single Jain or Muhammadan member. It maintains the view that neither the elections for nor the nominations to the District and Local Boards should be influenced by communal considerations, but the question should rest simply on the merits of individuals. The paper then refers to the Government reply to the interpellation put by the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri in connection with the Preventive Service of the Customs Department, Karáchi, and regrets that out of 22 posts of officers in the service 20 are filled by Europeans or Anglo-Indians and only one post is filled by an Indian. It wishes that Government would give their consideration to this question. With reference to the Government reply to the question of the Honourable Khan Bahadur Pirbux on the subject of frequent changes in school text-books, the paper expresses the wish, from considerations among others of economy, that the English text-books prescribed in High and Anglo-Vernacular schools should not be changed every year. It also refers to the smallness of the number of women taking medical education in the Bombay Presidency and hopes that efforts will be made by Government to attract females in a larger numbers to this sort of training.

Kesari (95), 20th Mar.

39. Commenting upon the interpellation and reply in the Bombay Legislative Council regarding the Sudhakar security case (Pen, district Kolába), the Kesari says:—If Government had mentioned the grounds that led the District Magistrate to demand the security the public could have judged for themselves the correctness of the reply. Our Government is a wise one and it has maintained silence on this point. But the District Magistrate himself seems to have entertained some doubt regarding the demand of a security heavier than the price of the press and while Government are maintaining that the demand was a proper one he has intimated to the owner that a security of Rs. 500 would be sufficient. But the chief ground of complaint is not the exact amount of the security but the needlessness of the demand for it. Just as the District Magistrate saw the unreasonableness of the demand of a security heavier than the price of the press any reasonable man would see that it is not proper to demand a security when the change in the declaration was in the name of the rightful heir of the former owner, whatever be the opinion of the District Magistrate of Kolába and other officials.

An incident at the last meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council.
Message (6), 20th Mar.

40. "During the session of the Bombay Legislative Council, which concluded on Friday, an amusing incident took place in connection with one of Mr. Patel's many speeches. In one of his speeches, we believe, apropos of Government's appointment of a special officer to inquire into the many problems connected with the development of taluka boards and panchayats, Mr. Patel had to refer to the special officer by name frequently and perhaps inadvertently, he once referred to the officer's named without using the formal term "Mr". Mr. G. S. Curtis was at once seen to be on his legs protesting against Mr. Patel's omission to speak of 'Mr. so and so' for the hundreth and first time. We think the omission could not have been either intentional or deliberate, having regard to the fact that Mr. Patel had frequently referred to 'Mr. so and so', and when his attention was drawn to the omission he was very glad to correct himself and say 'Mr. so and so'. There was nothing especial in it for Mr. Curtis to be so fastidious about forms and rise to a point of order, inasmuch as in official speeches references are made to non-officials even when they are present or alive, sometimes in language which does not quite become the dignity of the Council chamber or those who utter it. Non-official members do not generally take notice of such omissions and commissions on the part of their official colleages, as not being worth any powder and shot.......... To turn, however, from this somewhat prosaic speculation to an actual fact, we should like to draw the attention of our readers to an even more interesting incident. It was, we believe, Mr. Chaubal who referred to Mr. Mazumdar, late of the Sydenham College, as the 'late Mr. Mazumdar'. It must have no doubt been a perfectly inadvertent mistake and remembering that Mr. Chaubal had been called upon to defend the indefensible, we do not wonder if he had lost his presence of mind and made an utterance of this sort.......... We should have ourselves attached no importance to Mr. Chaubal's inadvertence, were it not for Mr. Curtis' exception to Mr. Patel's omission. We have noticed in the Council debates that references are very often made to Indian members of the service without the prefix of 'Mr.' or suffix of 'esquire' and yet official members of Government do not seem to have been chivalrous enough to take exception to it."

The Bombay Budget.
Hindusthán (17), 18th Mar., Eng. cols.

41. Commenting upon the discussion in the Bombay Legislative Council over the Local Budget, the Hindusthán writes:—"The Honourable Mr. Patel's adjournment proposal came as a shock and created a flutter in the official dovecotes, for the Finance Statement should be presented on the 13th March and cannot be postponed. The solution was found out of the difficulty by His Excellency the President ruling the proposal out of order. It is an easy way of silencing criticism but neither dignified nor calculated to convince non-official members of their importance in Legislative Councils. It is significant that almost at the same time strong protests have been lodged by non-official members in the Imperial, Bombay and Madras Councils against the policy of distrust shown by Government and the way in which even their most reasonable requests are flouted. We hear much about Minto-Morley reforms. If they have to achieve any result even at this stage when far broader vistas have opened before the public gaze, greater consideration needs be shown to demands and suggestions of the representatives of the people. The Budget is otherwise a quiet affair though we are glad that there is an increase in expenditure on education proposed therein.......... It was in connection with this increase in expenditure on education that the Honourable Mr. Upasani brought forward his ill-advised proposal that the provision made for the appointment of a lecturer on Geography for the Sydenham College of Commerce be omitted.......... It is greatly disconcerting that while on the one hand we are asking for increased grants for education, on the other we raise up protests against steps calculated to increase the progress of an important branch of education like commercial education. A visit on the part of these outside critics to this institution will serve greatly to clear the atmosphere for them. They will then be able to judge whether a specialist in statistics can lecture on commercial geography or whether a lecturer on public affairs can teach accountancy."

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

42. Commenting on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Patel to postpone the Bombay Budget, the Mahrátta remarks:—"The President found something to throw in the face of Mr. Patel and ruled his proposition out of order. The point of it all is that the Finance Committee is a mere show, inasmuch as its nominated majority makes it almost impossible for an elected non-official to secure a majority in favour of any proposal of his. Next, this proposal, even if it passes, goes in the form of a recommendation to the Executive Government which is not at all bound to accept that recommendation. Similar is the case with any non-official resolution that may be carried in the Council. It has no binding force. It is this root-grievance—this our inability to control even to a small extent the expenditure of the money that we pay into the Government treasury—it is this grievance that is most galling. And the demand for Swarájya has become insistent because of such grave disabilities under which the people are labouring."

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

43. "Mr. Curtis, for want of anything solid to offer in the way of reply determined to amuse himself. The movements of His Excellency were also shadowed by the police and Honourable Members must after all remember that they were distinguished persons. Thus spoke Mr. Curtis after giving an assurance to Mr. Parekh that he personally would be exempted in future from the attentions which were annoying to him. We cannot understand how an official of a high standing can bring himself to speak in a light and sarcastic vein on such an occasion as the above. An ordinary man with a modicum of courtesy in him would be ashamed to make an attempt to raise a laugh in this wise.......... The question of the attentions of the C. I. D. was raised in the Madras Council also. Honourable Mr. A. S. Krishnarao moved that the expenditure on C. I. D. should be reduced by 50,000. Honourable Mr. Ramchandrarao in supporting this resolution said that it was within the personal knowledge of several men who were doing public work in the Madras Presidency that they were subjected to unnecessary suspicion and unnecessary watching as if they were suspicious characters. He gave instances of respectable men who were given certain numbers by the C. I. D. by which they were referred to in correspondence. He pleaded that the C. I. D. annoyance caused unnecessary friction and should therefore be removed. Mr. Gillman replied that the Government recognised the trouble to which respectable people were at times unnecessarily put and promised that endeavour would be made for this annoyance to be obviated as much as possible. The difference between the reply of Mr. Curtis and that of Mr. Gillman will not fail to be observed. Mr. Gillman is dignified in tone—and Mr. Curtis not so."

Will Mr. Curtis believe that Honourable Members expect a certain amount of courtesy from officials?"

Young India (11), 21st Mar.

44. Commenting upon the order issued by the Government of India under the Defence of India Act prohibiting the emigation of labour, Young India remarks:—"We welcome the present decision of Government, conditional as it is, to prohibit the emigation of labour from this country save to the minimum extent to the Federated Malay States and Ceylon. We should have been very much pleased if this decision had been made applicable to all parts alike without exception. The prohibition holds good in the first instance during the continuance of the war and is made to appear as dictated by the needs of the war. But we are sure that it is the thin end of the wedge. When the war is over and the many questions which are awaiting solution come up for settlement in the calm and dispassionate atmosphere which would then prevail, the system will, we feel sure, be put an end to. We welcome the decision of Government as a reasonable concession to public opinion and sentiment; and in that sense, we congratulate Government on the wise step. It would no doubt have been more graceful, if Government had acknowledged openly the fact that, in deference to the unanimous public opinion displayed in this country, it had taken the step. Whether it was an undue sense of 'prestige' or whether it was the fear of opposition from the interested Colonies, that has prompted Government to pursue an indirect method where a direct method would have produced a tremendous reaction in its favour, is more than we can think of. But we believe that both the reasons must have weighed strongly with Government. All is well that ends well."

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.; Gujaráti (13), 25th Mar., Eng. cols.

*45. "Last time we gave the news that Government of India had prohibited all emigration of labour to the colonies for the time being. The reason for this unexpected move is now before us. We are now told that at the request of the Home Government, the Government of India propose to raise a labour corps in various provinces of India for service in Europe. So the necessities of Europe have come in the way of the Colonial employers of Indian labour.......... We have no doubt that care will be taken by Government to see that the Indian labourers are well looked after wherever their lot may be cast. But an independent Indian Committee to protect Indian labour interests will still be a useful body. In our opinion, there is also the necessity of a non-official Indian Committee in each province in which recruits are to be raised for the labour corps. The Committee should be given facilities to ascertain that every recruit has understood the terms and is willing to take advantage of them. But what are the terms? We hope that Government will publish them for the information of the general public." [The Gujaráti remarks:—"It appears that the object is to conserve the man-power of India for the purposes of labour in connection with the war. But the restriction does not go far enough, because labour emigration will, according to the Chronicle, be allowed to the extent of supplying the minimum requirement of Ceylon and the Federated Malaya States. The Ceylon planters and those in the Malay States can surely take care of themselves and their plantations by availing themselves of local labour on payment. it may be, of higher wages. We are sorry any exception should have been made by Government in their favour."]

Kesari (95), 20th Mar.; Dnyán Prakásh (84), 18th Mar.; Gujaráti (13), 18th Mar.

*46. Though we are glad that Government have stopped emigration to the Fiji Islands under the Defence of India Act the prohibition does not appear to be as straightforward as it ought to be. It is not also quite unselfish considering that it is proposed to raise a labour corps for England. The said Act appears to be like the Tree in paradise able to give Government anything they ask for, and a very curious use has been made of it in prohibiting emigration. We think the Emigration Act itself should have been amended and emigration to the Fiji Islands should have been permanently stopped. It is a question of principle, and why should we be so evasive? If Indian labour is needed for the war, why is emigration allowed to Ceylon and the Malay States? If Government are afraid of the Colonials and if they have prohibited emigration under the cover of war, cannot the Colonials see through it? We are not yet free from doubt as to whether after the war we shall have to suffer again from this evil. [The Dnyán Prakásh says:—So long Government used to tell us they could not abolish the indentured system till it was replaced by some other system. But as the agitation began to grow in strength they thought it necessary to end it. It only shows that once Government make up their mind to do something they can do it one way or the other. It is very creditable that the popular agitation had such an effect and the whole credit is due to Messrs. Andrews, Polak and Gandhi.] [The Gujaráti writes:—We do not know whether we should rejoice at the prohibition of indentured labour. It is clear at the very outset that the step has been taken as a war measure to enable Government to secure an adequate number of labourers for service in Mesopotamia and other war zones. Besides, no prohibition will be laid on emigration under section 11 of the Emigration Act! We do not know what this section says. The prohibition is no doubt a temporary gain. We, however, should not go into ecstasies over the matter. It looks ridiculous on the face of it to congratulate Government for making a temporary concession.]

47. The prohibition of the emigration of labour from India under the Defence of India Act will put an end to the disgraceful system of indentured labour for the time being during the continuance of the war and we feel sure the measure will be welcomed in all parts of India. While safeguarding Indian labour against the disgrace of indenture, the prohibition will give sufficient time to Government to give the fullest consideration to the question. We have every hope that Government will eventually put an end to the system of indentured labour. Let us hope that the deputation of Indian ladies that will shortly wait upon His Excellency Lord Chelmsford will, by their gentle pleading, induce Government to change their attitude towards the demand made by the Indian people for putting an end to indentured labour. [The Gujaráti Punch wishes that Government had put an end to the system of indenture altogether. The Hindusthán writes:—"This is indeed a triumph of public opinion which has been striving its best to press upon the attention of the Government of India the necessity of stopping all indentured emigration. Unfortunately attempts have been made in certain quarters to whittle the importance of the declaration by representing it as being due to the desire of the Government to conserve Indian labour for India during the war period. Would it not have appeared more graceful if the Government had acknowledged the force of public opinion and attributed the temporary suspension to their strong distaste for the system"? The Indian Social Reformer remarks:—"We rejoice that the indentured system is thus practically at an end. The abolition of it will be associated with the names of Mr. Gandhi, the late Mr. Gokhale, and, last but not least, Mr. Andrews who concentrated on the moral issue and thus dealt the deathblow to the heartless system. The Government and the people of India have now to make up their minds as to what they are going to do for those whose indentures are yet running. Some of these have just started their five-year term of semi-slavery—we heard that only a few weeks ago a shipload left for Fiji—and surely something has to be done to make their condition tolerable if, indeed, there is no chance of procuring their liberation by paying compensation to their employers."]

His Excellency the Governor's advice to Indian politicians not to carry on political agitation at the present juncture.

Message (6), 18th Mar.

48. Referring to the advice given by His Excellency Lord Willingdon in the course of his War Loan speech at the Town Hall to Indian politicians to give up strong political agitation in the country at the present juncture, the Message, after stating that "a highly esteemed private gentleman plainly intimated to His Excellency that so long as Government was wedded to a policy of silence in regard to the after war status of this country people would go on agitating in this [illegible] remarks:—"We believe His Excellency did himself entertain the opinion that Government ought to give a definite assurance in advance to the people as to their real position in the Empire in the post-war re-adjustments which are bound to take place.......... We also believe that Lord Willingdon had addressed to the authorities higher than himself a note to the effect mentioned above. It is not clear in what light it was received in the quarters to which the note was directed. But it seems as if he, too, met with a snub courteous, if we may say so, and His Excellency thereafter changed his mind. We may be right; we may be wrong in this respect. We write this subject to correction. But considering the vast change that has come over in the views of a professedly 'Liberal' English gentleman, our inference appears to us to be perfectly justified.......... It is justifiable to expect people to think more of war than of other things. But to ask them to give up everything else is asking, we do not say for the moon, but obviously for the impossible. Nobody has ventured to suggest to the Self-Governing Dominions anything of the nature suggested to the 'one other class of public in this presidency' by Lord Willingdon. To say nothing of the Dominions or of the United Kingdom, is it possible to expect people to standstill when 'the Governments are indulging in unnecessary law making and unnecessarily irritating the people by uncalled-for orders and prosecutions and so forth?' If the Government in this country want political agitation to cease forthwith, the best talisman for it is for the authorities here to make and for the Imperial authorities to confirm, in unequivocal language the declaration of policy as regards the future political status of India within the Empire and give proper assurance that when the time comes for it, they will both adhere to that policy in letter as well as spirit."

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 24th Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 24th Mar.

49. Referring to the speech made by His Excellency Lord Willingdon at the recent annual meeting of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, the Jám-e-Jamshed, while appreciating His Excellency's observations pointing to the necessity of making suitable provision for the growing expansion of the city as a result of the present prosperity of its trade and commerce, remarks that the Bombay public will be anxious to know what reasons influenced His Excellency's mind in changing his former views which were opposed to the Back Bay Reclamation scheme. It doubts if the development of Bombay on the proper lines would be helped by the undertaking of such a costly scheme. It believes that the development of Bombay could be better effected by first improving the slum areas of the city. The paper then goes on to express its approval of the recommendation made by Lord Willingdon to the employers of labour to raise a permanent class of workers in decent homes and healthy surroundings and advises the latter promptly to put this suggestion into practice in order to effectually meet the steadily increasing want of skilled as well as unskilled labour. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi writes about the speech in a similar strain and attaches greater importance to the development of the northern parts of the town, specially Salsette, at the present juncture rather than to the taking in hand of the Back Bay Reclamation scheme.]

Comments on the Bombay High Court's decision in the case in connection with the powers of the Bombay Municipality under the Weights and Measures Act.
Bombay Samáchár (55), 20th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 20th Mar.

50. The Bombay Samáchár refers to a recent decision of the Bombay High Court in which it was held that the Bombay Municipality could not legally enforce the use of measures fixed by it upon those who are doing business outside municipal markets and, dwelling upon the necessity of avoiding confusion which the simultaneous use of the two rival measures the Mapli and Paili, creates in the city among the retail purchasers of grain, urges the municipality to move in the matter of obtaining powers from Government authorising it to enforce the use of uniform weights and measures to be fixed by it upon all merchants irrespective of the place in which they carry on their business. [The Hindusthán considers it harmful to public interests that merchants should have the liberty of foisting upon the buyers any measures that suit their convenience. It, therefore, emphasises the necessity on the part of the Bombay Municipality, of getting the present law altered with a view to putting an end to the anomaly. It remarks that arrangements should be made to ensure that the same measures are used for business purposes throughout the whole of the Bombay City.]

51. Commenting upon the rejection by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court of Mrs. Besant's application for permission to appeal to the Privy Council in the New India Security case, Young India remarks:—"This is very unfortunate, as a decision by the Privy Council on the various points raised by Mrs. Besant would have been of the greatest value at this juncture when the Viceroy himself has entered the aren for reviewing judicial decisions and the condu of judges in judicial proceedings. We are sur Mrs. Besant will still find a way. But the cost and the worry of it!"

Comments on the rejection by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court of Mrs. Besant's application for permission to appeal to the Privy Council in the New India Security case.

Young India (11), 21st Mar.

*52. "Our readers will be glad to learn that Mrs. Besant does not intend to take the decision of the Madras High Court lying down. The Special Bench has refused her leave to appeal to the Privy Council against the forfeiture decision of the Bench. But she can still appeal to the Sovereign and it appears that she is going to do it.......... The utter badness of the Press Law has been the theme of many an article in the press and many a speech from the platform.......... Still the unexpected decision of the Madras High Court deserves a word of comment. As our readers know, two judges on the special Bench held that they had no power to grant leave, while the third differed. Now if the majority decision in this case may be taken to represent respectable judicial opinion on the intention and potency of the Press Act, then we cannot get away from the conclusion that the special Bench and trial are a mere farce. What power has the High Court? It has been brought out in the Besant case that the High Court can pronounce an action of the Executive to be illegal, but, as New India puts it, it is powerless to prevent the Executive from trampling on the law and can extend no protection to the victim of the broken law. Again, it now appears that the High Court cannot grant leave to appeal against its decision though very grave issues may be involved. Thus the much-boomed remedy has been proved to be inutile. Add to this the admission of nearly all eminent judges who have had to try cases under the Press Law that any criticism howsoever innocent can be brought within the all-embracing section 4. Add to these counts the further one that the power vested in the Magistrate to demand security works havoc in numberless ways, as the Press Deputation explained so clearly. And when these few counts are put together, what can we think of the Press Law? What except that 'it is naked tyranny'—to once more use the happy phraseology of New India?"

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

53. The Indu Prakásh expresses dissatisfaction at the increasing annual expenditure on the Police Department. There is no corresponding increse in crime, it says, to justify this additional expenditure. It remarks that Government spend lavishly on the C. I. D. and employ detectives to dog the footsteps of men like the Honourable Mr. Parekh. It urges Government to abandon the policy of distrust and observes that as Indians are loyal to the core the increasing expenditure on the Police is mere waste of money.

Government is needlessly spending money on the C. I. D.

Indu Prakásh (36), 16th Mar.

54. The Káthiáwár Samáchár dwells upon the imperative necessity of the continuance of the Press Act in view of the present situation and characterises the reply given by the Viceroy to the deputation of the Press Association as proper and seasonable. It remarks that it is a matter for shame if the representatives of the press should have failed, as they have done in the present case, to realise what should be regarded as the proper time for making a movement like the present. It maintains that it is no use for the Indian journalists to style themselves honest and well-meaning as long as the authorities hold a different opinion about them. The paper advises them to purge themselves of their uncleanness before they can expect Government to place confidence in them. It asks the members of the deputation how they mean to explain the persistence with which seditious writings continue to appear in the press in spite of the severity of the Press Act, complained of by them. It declares that the journalists have, by taking the rash action of sending the present deputation, failed to secure the confidence of Government.

Comments on the Report of the Public Services Commission.

Islámic Mail (4), 11th Mar., and (121), 5th Mar.

55. "British diplomacy in India has been of late guilty of many eggregious blunders but nothing will exceed the folly of publishing a highly controversial report at a time when public feeling is strained, to the breaking point, unless it be to make it the prelude of very far-reaching and liberal concessions in order to show to the people in India how far the angle of vision has changed during the war.......... In all probability the object in placing the Report before the public is to show the angle of vision that was before the war and then to follow it with liberal concessions in order to show their appreciation of the loyal services rendered by this country during the war. Unless this view is correct we find ourselves at a loss to appreciate the advisability of so-to-say throwing a bomb upon the people, for the report is nothing short of a bomb. It has caused tremendous consternation eveywhere.......... But it is the general belief that a large measure of self-government will be granted to enable the Indians to take a large share in the government of their country.......... When the Commission was holding its sittings, and evidence was being collected, it was feared from the drift of the proceedings that the Commission's labour could not be in any way fruitful. Subsequently when the publishing of the report was withheld by Government these suspicions were confirmed.......... As we have just said it has caused satisfaction to no one. From one corner of the country to the other has gone up one emphatic protest, extremists and moderates both joining their voices against it. Even the lawyers whom the Report endeavours to conciliate by providing greater and large posts in the judiciary are far from being satisfied, rather are they more vehement in their denunciation.......... The colour bar which is so offensive to every Indian has not been removed and no real authority has been delegated to the Indians. These were the objects for which the public were agitating and not one of them has been achieved. But it is not only the non-official class which is dissatisfied. The Provincial Civil Service which is the backbone of the public services in India has very little cause for thankfulness.......... A European may rise to the highest eminence, he may become a Lieutenant Governor, but the Indian Deputy Collector cannot expect for anything more than a Deputy Collectorship unless by some fluke of kismat he may get one of the two Collectorships open to the members of the Provincial Service. We were talking the other day with a Deputy Collector in the United Provinces. He is a distinguished officer and has been given the title of Khan Bahadur in recognition of his meritorious services. He was greatly depressed by the Commission's Report. He said, they (the members of the Provincial Service) thought that at least four appointments of Collectorships will be thrown open to the Provincial Service; but not only had they been disappointed in this respect, but also their starting pay had been so reduced that it would be impossible for a junior Deputy Collector to maintain his position. Even now we find it hard to make both ends meet and there are various disgraceful cases of bribery and corruption coming to light in every province resulting in the conviction of the persons concerned which impairs the prestige of the Provincial Service in the eyes of the people, but in future when a Junior Deputy Collector will hardly get more than a Tahsildar's emoluments it will be impossible for him to maintain his position and dignity. That the report is opposed to the Indian feeling is apparent from the fact that the Indian members of the Commission have dissented from it. Gokhale was not a man given to foolish talk or extravagant demands. He was the most reasonable and sober-minded Indian politician and so is Justice Abdul Rahim. When they both differed from it we think Government will be well advised to take the Indian objections to the Commission's recommendations into their consideration. We would be failing in our duty if we refrain from joining our voice to the appeal so emphatically made to Government to reconsider the whole matter from the new angle of vision, and from what we have seen of Lord Chelmsford's sympathy and public-spiritedness we feel confident that India's appeal will not go in vain. [The Islámic Mail, Urdu Edition, writes in the same strain.]

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

*56. "A Traveller" writes to the Mahrátta :—"Those who have travelled by the Khamatki Ghat en route to Mahábleshwar or Sátára, know that there is a spot about the middle of the Ghat where water is obtainable from a cave.......... The water is a very welcome boon to foot passengers and animals in the hot season. When and by whom the cave was excavated is not known. Nearly half of it was demolished by the Public Works Department to make room for the road that now exists. This mutilation however did not wholly impair the usefulness of the tank. There was a resting place built in front of the cave. It was built by the Rastay family of Wái, when under the Peshawa's Government the old road was built.......... The rest house stood on its place for over a century. It was recently destroyed by the action of the Public Works Department. Soon after the establisment of the motor traffic between Poona and Mahableshwar the necessity arose of improving Ghat road by widening it at some places and by clearing it of boulders and large stones that stood loose on the hill over the road, menacing danger to the taffic. There were lots of such stones on the top of the cave which contained the water. They were removed from their places and hurled down the slope of the hill-side. They came with tremendous velocity and force on the shed and crushed it entirely. The foundation and plinth on which it stood remain to speak of the effect of the action of the Public Works Department. In this way the comfort and protection received by weary wayfarers was lost. It is some years since this took place but the benevolent department never thought of replacing the shed. The reason of this seems to be the fact that this watering spot and shed were not useful to Europeans or to rich travellers who do the journey by motors. It is the poor class of travellers who suffers. ....I hope this communication will attract the attention of the authorities concerned and the public grievance will be removed at an early date."

Comments on the proposal to confer the degree of Doctor of Laws on His Excellency Lord Chelmsford by the Punjab University.
Message (6), 24th Mar.

57. Referring to the proposal to confer the honorary Degree of Doctor of Laws on His Excellency Lord Chelmsford by the Punjab University, the Message remarks :—"We are led to speculate somewhat whether this is the best time for showing public approbation of Lord Chelmsford's Viceroyalty. In the normal course of things His Excellency's term has yet to run four more summers and the best time for publicly recognizing his work in this country is when he lays down the reins of office. That was what was done in the case of so popular a Viceroy as Lord Hardinge. Why the Puniab University could not have waited till that time passes our comprehension. It is a mistaken policy to publicly honour men holding high offices, when they are still in office.......... If it is true that coming events cast their shadows before, we have little reason to think that Lord Chelmsford's Viceroyalty will be a liberal one. The prelude to the play does not argue a very happy ending of the drama,—from a popular point of view, of course— any more than that of the late Indian autocrat who is now installed in the Imperial War Cabinet. It is possible no doubt that Lord Chelmsford may have in store for us a great surprise and though he has not begun quite well, he may still end his administration very agreeably. Therefore we say that the best time for showing our appreciation of his work is when the drama is over."

Comments on the inquiry into corrupt practices in the Abkari Department of the Thana District.

Rást Goftár (28), 18th Mar.

58. Referring to the inquiry conducted by Mr. S. R. Arthur, Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Ábkari, assisted by Mr. Bharucha, Collector of Thana, into the alleged corrupt practices of the Abkari servants of the Thana District which has thus far resulted in the dismissal and suspension of certain officers, the Rást Goftár wishes that the inquiry may be persisted in and that the task of bringing the offenders to book should not be left half done from the erroneous consideration that such a course might reveal a state of things which would injure the prestige of Government. The paper is inclined to attribute the present condition of things to the policy of the late Excise Commissioner Mr. Quin of dealing lightly with Europeans in the department who were found guilty of corrupt practices while he severely punished the Indians similarly circumstanced. While praising the action taken by Mr. Arthur in instituting the present inquiry, it warns the Commissioner and the Collector of Thana against what it considers to be the danger of employing the zamindars of Umbergaon for giving them the information necessary for the conduct of the inquiry on account of the Hindus being at logger-heads with the Parsis and on account of inimical relations subsisting among the Parsis themselves. In view of the likelihood of even big officers like Assistant Collectors being involved in the present muddle, the paper begs His Excellency to appoint, in the place of the two officers now conducting the inquiry, a commission composed of experienced and impartial officers like Mr. Baker, the late Collector of Násik, Mr. Anderson, Mr. J. K. N. Kabraji and Mr. J. L. Rieu, to investigate into the question of the existance of corruption in the Department as a whole.

LEGISLATION.

Comments on the Bombay Local Boards Act Amendment Bill introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council.

Young India (11), 21st Mar.

59. "One of the characteristics of the Government in this country is the favour shown to piecemeal Legislation. It appears from various recent enactments that the genius of the present race of British rulers in India is not fitted for any comprehensive or magnificient achievements. The way in which they are proceeding to make laws reminds us of the story of a famous Indian humorist who, when entrusted with the decoration of a palace, proceeded to paint a figure with the head in one place, the nose in another and the eyes in a third. The District Boards Law Amendment Bill, which the Honourable Mr. Curtis introduced in the Bombay Council the other day, reminds us of the story....... That the representatives of the people did not feel the need for this absurd piece of legislation is shown by Mr. Patel's motion that the Bill should be held in abeyance. But no! Government would not hear of it.......... That the Bill is a reactionary and highly mischievous one there can be no doubt. It seeks in the first place to introduce caste and communal differences which never existed before and to which Indian opinion is practically wholly opposed. Secondly, it introduces into the composition of these bodies an overwhelming element of weakness in the shape of title-holders and honorary magistrates, who, Mr. Patel rightly described, were at the mercy of Government. The Bill further seeks to leave the conferring of elected majorities to the discretion of the Executive instead of being embodied in the Bill itself. Having regard to the arbitrary manner in which the executive is exercising the vast amount of discretion already vested in it, there is no wonder that the elected non-official members of the Council fought shy of Government's move. The whole tendency of Government legislation in recent years has been to make the executive supreme and make everything dependent on its sweet will and pleasure.......... It is a striking proof of the extremely retrograde character of the proposed measure that even members with decidedly pro-bureaucratic tendencies felt constrained to give expression to their disapproval of it."

Mahrátta (5), 25th Mar.

*60. "The debate on the first reading of the Local Boards Bill showed clearly that Mr. Patel was in the right and Government were in the wrong. The retrograde character of the measure came out so clearly in the course of the discussion that Mr. Patel, in our opinion, deserves to be thanked for opposing its very introduction. Such an opposition shows the keen perception on the part of the opposer of the defective and injurious character of the measure concerned. It is wasting time to bring forward such measures and mislead people. It is not wasting time, but putting it to the best use possible, when a conscientious member tries to save the people from the burdensome 'gift' which Government in their 'liberality' seek to thrust upon them with a view to make real progress an affair of wearisome delay!"

Bombay Samáchár (55), 19th Mar.

61. Commenting upon the Bill brought before the Bombay Legislative Council to provide for increasing the number of elective members on district local boards, the Bombay Samáchár expresses its disapproval of the reflections made by the Honourable Mr. Patel on the policy and attitude of the present Government towards the subject of local self-government. It views with disfavour the opposition raised by him against the first reading of the Bill and remarks that since there are opportunities for giving a proper shape to a Bill in the Select Committee, all opposition to the reading of a Bill which is not based on a question of principle is unprofitable. The paper maintains that the reasons adduced by Mr. Patel in support of his opposition are untenable and that His Excellency was right in exhorting him to urge all his objections at the first reading of the Bill. The paper then dwells on the advisability of fixing by law the proportion of the popular majority in the local boards and hopes that the elected members of the Council will make their best endeavours in the Select Committee to fix that proportion at 66 per cent. It supports the suggestion made by some of the Muhammadan members of the Council for making a provision for fixing the number of Moslem representatives on the Local Boards and declares that, in view of the fact that such a course has been approved both by the Indian National Congress and the Moslem League, there is no probability of its being opposed by the public if its adoption in particular parts of the Presidency be found expedient by Government.

Comments on the Muhammadan agitation against a certain line in the Third Gujarati Reader.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 21st Mar.; Akhbár-e-Islám (52), 21st, 23rd and 29th Mar.

62. In the course of a letter addressed to the Praja Mitra and Pársi "Momin" dwells upon the futility of the protest made by the Anjuman-e-Islám, Rander, against the retention of a line in the eighth lesson of Book Third of the Gujarati Reading Series (vide paragraph 53 of Weekly Report No. 9 of 1917), and observes that he cannot comprehend how any bad impression can be created upon the minds of young Moslem children by teaching them the line in which God is described as being one's "mother and father". He asks the abovementioned Anjuman if God does not maintain the whole world much in the same way as parents maintain their children. He is of opinion that the Rander Muhammadans have not been able to understand the drift of the line taken exception to and supports himself by questioning if the application of the term "mother and father" by a servant to his master should be taken to mean that he expects to be regarded as his master's son and to get an inheritance from him under such a claim. [The Akhbár-e-Islám publishes a letter on this subject from Moulvi Abdul Raufkhan, Secretary of the Anjuman-e-Zia-ul-Islam, Bombay, wherein the writer condemns the action of the Rander Anjuman in raising their protest and sarcastically observes that if the Honourable Saiyed Ali El Edrus puts an interpellation in this connection in the local Legislative Council, non-Moslem members of the Council will simply envy his religious zeal in his attempt at saving the Muhammadan children from the sin of Shirk! He also respectfully requests the Rander Anjuman, if they detect Shrik in the abovementioned lines in the Third Gujarati Reader, to get expunged from the hundreds of books that are read by Moslem children attending missionary schools the Christain doctrine of the Trinity. He also urges them to get stopped the promulgation of the whole Arya Samaj literature which contains criticism against holy Islam as also the books on sufism, poems, and odes in praise of God. The writer very much regrets the lack of even ordinary commonsense among the present day Muhammadans which does not enable them to distinguish between spiritual and temporal writings. In its leading article in the subsequent issue the paper ridicules the protest made by the Rander Anjuman and the interpellation of the Honourable Saiyed Zain El Edrus and remarking that such agitation is calculated to cause bad blood between the Hindus and the Muhammadans opines that such agitators should be either hauled up before courts of law or should be called to account in some other way. The paper then goes on to refer to a passage on page 89 of of a book entitled Bhárat Itihás (History of Bhárat) published by Messrs. P. Mukhopadya and Sons and taught in Bengal, wherein in reply to King Allanddin's question as to what sort of treatment the Hindus deserved, a Kazi is represented to have said that the ordanation of prophet Muhammad was that the Hindus should be massacred, robbed or taken prisoners and that of other Moslem Olmas (learned men) was that they should be converted into Muhammadans or should be killed. The paper regards this passage as one constituting a libel on Islam and the Muhammadans and hopes that Mr. Hornell, Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, will see that the above passage is expunged from the book. It is also of opinion that writers of such passages create bitterness of feelings between the Hindu and Muhammadan communities and that they should be proceeded against under section 153-A of the Indian Penal Code. It remarks that the writer of the "Bhárat Itihás" is ignorant of Prophet Muhammad's admonition to Moslems not to interfere with the happiness even of those who are alien to the faith of Islam. The paper concludes with observing that the Honourable Saiyid Zain El Edrus will serve the Moslems much better in the Legislative Council by drawing the attention of Government to the abovementioned passage in the "Bhárat Itihás". In the issue of the 29th instant the paper remarks that neither the Rander Anjuman nor the Honourable Saiyed Ali El Edrus seem to have carefully gone through the whole of the Third Gujarati Reader as well as other books of the Gujarati Reading Series; for otherwise it wonders why no exception was taken to the 4th line of the last quatrain in the 7th lesson of the Third Book which, rendered into English means, "The father of the universe knows all our imaginings", as also to the line in one of the readers in another series which says "Oh Lord our mighty father", as they have done with regard to the 5th line in the 8th lesson of the Third Book.]

The scope of the Calcutta University Commission should be enlarged to include secondary education.

Indian Social Reformer (3), 25th Mar.

63. "His Excellency the Viceroy has announced the acceptance by Dr. Michael Sadler, the Vice-Chancellor of the Leads University, of the Presidentship of the Calcutta University Commission. Dr. Sadler is undoubtedly an authority on education whose advice cannot but be of immense assistance to us in shaping our policy .... We, therefore, welcome the announcement that he has agreed to preside over the Commission with sincere satisfaction. But we would once again ask Government to reconsider their decision to confine the scope of the Commission to the affairs of the Calcutta University. We ask them to consider the advisability of extending it so as to include not only the other territorial Universities, but also so as to include our system of secondary education....... As it happens, Dr. Sadler is an even greater authority on secondary than on University education, and it will be throwing away a great opportunity not to avail ourselves of his services in regard to our system of secondary education, the weakest link in the educational chain. His Excellency the Viceroy and the Honourable the Education Member have shown themselves so reasonably amenable to the influence of public opinion that we do not despair of their reconsidering their decision as to the scope of the Sadler Commission."

RAILWAYS.

Zoolum on third class passengers on Railways in India can be ended only by doing away with Company management.
Young India (11), 21st Mar.

64. In the course of a letter on the subject of Company versus State management of Railways in India contributed to Young India, one signing himself "Dinshaw, R.," remarks :—"The one and only cause of the zoolum on third class passengers is the Companies' insatiable greed for gold and the insane economy which is always inseparable from the greed—a greed and an economy which, Government can never control. In short, company management means insane economy and insane economy means zoolum. No power on earth or in heaven can end the zoolum without ending Company management. The Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel says :—'The only way to end the innumerable grievances of third class passengers is to put the railways under State Management.' And this is the opinion held by everyone who has not sold his conscience to the Companies. 'That the railways in the United States and the United Kingdom are managed by Companies to the perfect satisfaction of the public is a sufficient proof of the superiority of Company management over State Management.' This is a falsehood. The truth is that a persistent campaign against Company management is being conducted in both the countries."

MUNICIPALITIES.

Alleged incompetance of the Poona Municipality.
Message (6), 22nd Mar.

65. "At a meeting of the General Body of the Poona Municipality, the Chief Officer reported that he was without any cash to pay the bills due from the Municipality and that ways and means should be found to supply him with the necessary funds. We agree with Professor Bhagwat who, at that meeting, pointed out the gross negligence and culpability of the management in not making the General Body acquainted with the financial condition of the Municipality earlier than was done. A way out of the financil impasse was found by sanctioning the sale of Deposit Receipts at a discount. We do not mean to suggest that the Poona Municipality is on the verge of bankruptcy, but we feel that that management is grossly incompetent which allows such a thing to happen as that which came before the General Body on the 16th instant."

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the Viceroy's closing speech at the last Delhi session of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Message (6), 25th Mar.

1. Commenting upon His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the close of the Delhi session of the Imperial Legislative Council the Message says:—" 'We are all members,' said his Excellency, 'one of another and in the great task which is set before us we can only succeed if we work together in closest co-operation.' This is no doubt an excellent sentiment; but will the same sentiment pervade the minds of those of whom you expect co-operation, if you tell them at the same time: You are non-officials and are therefore not members of Government. We can trust only those who are members of Government.......... We have been insistently asking Government to give us a mere indication, a mere assurance about their policy. But have not Government resolutely wedded themselves to silence? And why? Are the people of India so stupid that they will not listen to any reasonable proposals? If the Tsar who has now abdicated the throne of Russia could definitely promise within a fortnight after the outbreak of war internal autonomy to the Poles, could not the British Government and the Government of India jointly find their way to advise our gracious sovereign to issue to his loyal and devoted Indian subjects a proclamation to the effect that India would be raised to the status of the self-governing dominions and with that end in view, when the war was over the reforms jointly proposed by the Hindus and Muhammadans, Parsis and Christians of India would be conceded to them? We are told the Government of India have addressed a despatch to the Secretary of State and yet the people of India who stand to be deeply affected by them for good or evil may not know what the nature of that despatch is. 'It is not in the public interests,' this is practically what the non-official members are told on every conceivable subject on which the feelings and sentiments of the people are not in accord with those of Government."

Mahrátta* (5), 1st Apl.; Kesari (95), 27th Mar.; Dnyán Prakásh (34), 27th Mar.

2. " 'We are all members, one of another, and in the great task which is set before us we can only succeed if we work together in the closest co-operation.' This sentiment of H. E. the Viceroy is most laudable. But how is the closest co-operation possible between men who wield 'irresponsible' power and men who possess none, unless the latter place themselves unconditionally in the hands of the former? The Honourable Members of Council have, notwithstanding the disabilities they labour under, given all co-operation possible. Their resolutions are seldom accepted, yet they bring them forward. .... Despite discourteous treatment at the hands of members of Government (Mr. Curtis' rejoinder to Mr. Parekh in the Local Council may be cited as a recent instance), Honourable representatives are never tired of placing before Government facts and principles which need to be so placed for the enlightenment of Government. What is true of the elected members of Council is truer still of those whom they represent, viz., the people. Co-operation is exactly what is desired by the people. But Government are not over enthusiastic about working hand in hand with the people. The people ask for certain rights, which will enable them to give considerable co-operation in solving the military problem. And what have Government to say?......... 'Do not let the present scheme of the Indian Defence Force be marred on the ground that it does not contain all that you would desire.' Leaders have of course made up their minds about the scheme. Whatever the defects in the scheme they have advised and are advising young men belonging to the 'classes' to join the Force. This is an indication of generous foresight on the part of the leaders. But what does the grudging attitude tell us respecting Government? Their insistent cry for co-operation—when co-operation has always been given and is given even under irritating circumstances—does it not strike rather as a formal mantra to be repeated on occasions of a certain nature? When will things change? When will there be mutual trust?" [The Kesari terms the Viceroy's closing speech as unsatisfactory and says that the only happy feature in it was his declaration that the indenture system would not be revived in any form. It adds:—The Viceroy referred to Mr. Lloyd George's message to India. In a message to Russia the Prime Minister says that the present war is a struggle for popular government equally with liberty. Why should not unfortunate India which has helped the Allies to carry on the fight, receive the benefit of this doctrine? Though controversial questions are to be avoided during the war, Government themselves have raised the question of Home Rule for Ireland. What objection is there to give India a similar assurance? If the British Parliament gives a plain assurance India is likely to be helpful in this war many times more than Ireland. We hope that the British Ministry will bear this in mind and that they will not postpone the question. The Dnyán Prakásh says that the attempt of the Viceroy to justify the promise of Government to pay England £100 millions, without consulting the Legislative Council, is vain. It thinks that the only way to reward justly the self-sacrifice of India is to take up the question of reforming the system of administration from the top to the bottom. It adds :—If Government place the administration under the control of the Indian people then only can we say that they have realised the value of the assistance of India. It is pleasing to note that the Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy took the opportunity of declaring that India would never allow the Colonies to have control over it. We are hopeful about the position of Indians in the Indian Defence Force after the war, but we do not think that the Viceroy could not have followed a courageous policy regarding the appointment of Indians as commissioned officers and the equal treatment of Indians and Europeans now.]

Sánj Vartamán (29), 24th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 26th Mar.

3. The appeal made by Lord Chelmsford for co-operation on the part of the people in the scheme of the Indian Defence Force, though it does not satisfy all their desires, is not a very proper one for the Viceroy to make, still we hope that the people will respond to it. It may be said to be a triumph of public opinion that the doors of volunteering have been opened for Indians. The next question that requires to be solved is that of granting commissions to Indians. This is a matter which mostly depends upon the future policy of Government and should be solved without much delay. Sympathy, imagination, statesmanship and wisdom will be required in determining the future policy of Government. Should commissions be opened to Indians, thousands will enlist in the Defence Force, but the absence of this privilege should not deter young Indians from joining the Force as a part of their duty. A time will come when Government will be forced by circumstances to give commissions to Indians. It seems the Government of India are favourably disposed towards Indian aspirations in this respect and that they want time to consider the question. Indians will not grumble if reasonable time is taken, but undue delay would mean want of statesmanship. The Indian public will feel thankful to His Excellency for the assurance he has given for not reviving the system of indentured labour. We heave a sigh of relief at the abolition of the cruel system and hope that its evils will not be allowed to reappear under any other guise [The Hindusthán writes :—We are thankful to His Excellency for the assurance he has given, but would like to point out that the final decision in the matter will greatly depend upon the firm stand that the Government of India are disposed to take. The Colonial planters possess great influence in Parliament and we cannot say for certain what turn the question will take in future. Besides, our apprehensions receive support from the fact that the system has been prohibited only temporarily under the Defence of India Act. The Indian public should not rest content till the system is put an end to for all time.]

Comments on the acceptance by Government of the resolution regarding the Boy Scout Movement introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Young India (11), 28th Mar.

4. "The acceptance by the Government of India of Mr. B. N. Sarma's resolution regarding the urgent desirability of encouraging the Boy Scout movement among Indian students is a matter for some gratification. We are not quite sure if we can take it as an indication that Government did not any longer consider that 'education was not making for loyalty'.......... But we may fairly assume that the readiness with which the resolution was accepted will tend to promote a keener interest among the well-wishers of the Indian youth and encourage the formation of Scout organisations in all important towns and cities. We realise that the ultimate success of the movement depends to a considerable extent on the attitude of officials in the mofussil. If they are not disposed to lend active support to the movement, they should at least remain neutral. Any interference on their part will only result in hampering those who undertake the work and effectually set back a movement which, if carried out in a broad and liberal spirit, will be one of the best means of promoting harmony and better mutual understanding among the coming generations, and also help effectively in doing away with the evils of caste which divides Indians and Europeans into water tight compartments."

Comments on the Indian Budget.
Mahrátta (5), 1st Apl.

5. "The gloomy fact that these Budget days brought out, not for the first time, is the utter helplessness of elected representatives to influence in any appreciable measure the raising or disposal of public money. We now know the story of the war gift. The Council was not consulted before the gift was made.......... Officials can think what they please and do what they please from their high places—but the elected representatives have a duty to discharge and they did well in emphasising the illegality and bad policy of the procedure adopted by Government in putting a heavy burden on our shoulders without taking the Legislative Council into confidence, as law and custom required. The reform Despatch of Lord Morley promised great results. 'I anticipate valuable results from the knowledge which your Government will acquire in these debates (financial) of the views of those whom the proposed measures will chiefly and directly affect, and which it will be able to utilise in shaping its final financial proposals for the year.' And what are these valuable results? The Chronicle has drawn up a table of financial resolutions introduced in the various councils during the Budget month just closed. [Here the paper quotes the table.] Who will think of waxing eloquent over the 'Reforms' when he finds that not one of the 109 resolutions was accepted by the Governments concerned? The Imperial Budget is presented to the Council as an unalterable document. Discussion is of course allowed, but it is only to be treasured up by the members of Government for future use—but we wonder if it is ever utilised. The Provincial budget goes before a Finance Committee, but this latter is dominated by nominated members and as Honourable Mr. Patel proved by his recent experiences related in the local Council, the powers of non-official members to shape provincial finances are merely illusory."

Indu Prakásh (36), 24th Mar., Eng cols.

6. "We sincerely congratulate Sir William Meyer on rising to the occasion during the present world crisis and framing a budget which embodies in a large measure the healthy principles of Lloyd-Georgian economics. The call is not for text-book theorists, nor for 'sophisticators, economists and calculators' of the usual familiar type, not for the selfish upholders of vested interests, but for Lloyd-Georges and Sir William Meyers who have the courage to grapple with the extraordinary economic situation of modern times characterised by general poverty and the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few.......... All honour to Sir William Meyer for displaying rare economic insight and vision in framing his budgets."

Comments on His Excellency the Governor's advice to Indian politicians to give up political agitation during the war.
Shetkari (38), 25th Mar.

7. The Shetkari waxes sarcastic over the advice of His Excellency the Governor to suspend the Home Rule movement during the progress of the war and remarks:—We are indeed a very lucky people. We are given the prievilege of sacrificing blood and treasure freely in this war. We are now offered yet another and a far more valuable right, viz., that of sacrificing the demand for Home Rule. His Excellency the Governor told his hearers at the Town Hall meeting that the present is not the time to agitate for Home Rule. We wish His Excellency had made it clear how the Home Rule movement comes in the way of the successful prosecution of the war. No one can seriously argue that the money which really ought to be invested in the War Loan is unnecessarily being diverted to the Home Rule propaganda as every member of the Home Rule League has to pay only a rupee whereas the minimum contribution to the War Loan is

Rs. 7-12-0. Moreover, while everyone has the fullest liberty and every inducement to contribute as much money as possible to the War Loan, one has to be very careful indeed before one pays his rupee and becomes a Home Ruler! We understand Government are about to tap another source of income. Some fertile brains have seriously suggested that the required amount of the loan can very easily be made up if every land-holder is made to contribute as much as or preferably twice the amount of his land assessment. Our Indian princes are noted for their traditional liberality. Since Government gave them the opportunity of contributing towards the war expenditure they are displaying a simply marvellous amount of zeal in that direction! We were denied so long the privilege of parting with our money, but kind-hearted England has now removed that disability. Recent events in Russia, Poland and Ireland show that the war has not prevented the peoples of Europe from agitating for popular government. But we are a coloured people. Therefore, in the eyes of our rulers, what is right in the case of Europeans is not necessarily so in our case. We earnestly wish we shall not be asked to make the sacrifice of abandoning the principle of Home Rule. We are, however, an obliging people and will give it up if the authorities insist on it.

Comments on the alleged treatment received by Mr. Jackson of the Canada-India League at the hands of British Police at Hongkong.

Mahratta (5), 1st Apl.

*8. "We have given elsewhere an extract from New India giving the 'adventures' of Mr. Jackson of the Canada-India League—an institution founded in Toronto in 1915 with the object of promoting a better understanding between the Canadian and Indian peoples. The treatment which Mr. Jackson received at Hongkong is indicative of the attitude which British officials seem to be apt to take in regard to Indian affairs. 'Why do you meddle in these things when there are Governments and authorities to look after them (Indians) and you know nothing about them?' Bravo! Mr. Marris of the Curtis group has a brother police official in the British service who seems to hold views the very opposite of those of Mr. Marris. Mr. Marris believes in people who 'know nothing about India' meddling with Indian affairs. Mr. Curtis differed not a whit from Mr. Jackson in this matter of knowing nothing. If anything, we should be prepared to credit Mr. Jackson with more knowledge of 'things' Indian than Mr. Curtis could possibly be credited with. But Mr. Curtis received whole-hearted welcome and liberal hospitality at the hands of the Police official Mr. Marris and officials higher-placed still. Poor Mr. Jackson met with a different type of man! But—we must not be too sure. Mr. Marris would probably have treated Mr Jackson with the same courtesy which he actually received at the hands of another. For there is a difference between Mr. Curtis and Mr. Jackson. The latter strove to promote a better understanding between colonials of his nationality (Canadians) and the Indian people, while Mr. Curtis was the emissary of a group apparently bent upon foisting colonial domination on India, never having a thought to the idea of a better or worse understanding between Indians and the people of the colonies. This difference in 'missions'—and not the fact of the Superintendent at Hongkong being an A. B. C.—is very probably responsible for the difference in treatment!"

Comments on the working of the Defence of India Act.

Young India (11), 28th Mar.

9. In the course of a very lengthy article contributed to Young India, in which he deals with the Defence of India Act and Lord Carmichael's recent pronouncements on its working in Bengal, "V. R." writes:—"The Honourable Mr. Dadabhoy of the Central Provinces is not a member who would to our mind, do anything likely to embarrass the Government.......... When he moved the resolution, we feel certain that he had himself felt that some such safeguard as he proposed was urgently called for. Sir Reginald Craddock on this occasion expressed considerable chagrin that the public had failed to take the officials at their word.......... If as he said in his speech, it is the executive Government alone that has to decide upon the information before it as to who should be deprived of their liberty and as to how many should be condemned without even the mockery of a trial, would it not be too much to expect that 'no member of (the Imperial) Council, no educated person throughout this country and no one who has any influence should leave anything undone to check the growth of this conspiracy?' If really public co-operation is required, it must be sought on only one ground, namely, by their responsible association with the Government officials. Failing that and so long as the executive Government continues to labour under the notion that with it, first and last, rests the responsibility for maintaining 'public safety' and for suppressing conspiracies, no self-respecting person would ever venture to pledge his whole-hearted support to the wholesale and indiscriminate coercion of the innocent as well as the guilty. If, as Sir Reginald claimed, 'the responsibility is theirs and they cannot delegate any of their powers to outside persons, whether lawyers or laymen,' the consequences also must be theirs and they have no right to expect either the members of the Council or any educated persons to share with them in the odium and unpleasantness which their arbitrary proceeding will provoke.......... Apart from the internments of persons suspected or supposed to be suspected, there is another class of persons, the political leaders, for whose coercion the powers conferred by the Act have been freely availed of, in other words 'used for purposes of civil administration and for purposes that are not connected with the war'. Can any one who has followed in their logical sequence the orders of various Local Governments against Mrs. Besant, Mr. Tilak, Mr. Pal and a host of others less known to fame including a number of Arya Samajist preachers, say that the executive Government have used the powers vested in them for anything but a legitimate purpose—In none of these cases has it been shown that the persons named here were dangerous 'to public safety,' and yet neither Lord Hardinge nor Lord Carmichael ever ventured to defend these acts......... It is this which has given point to the dissatisfaction of the people. It is a pity that so good and so wise a ruler among his generation as Lord Carmichael should have allowed himself to lend his support to a measure which, if he were a free man, he was least likely to countenance. The plea of Sir Reginald that 'to confine' a man without trial is repugnant to British instincts and that Government officers do not lose their British instincts merely because their lives have been spent in India is too specious to escape notice. However honest and high-minded the British officers in India, it is too much to think that they are more scrupulous in respecting individual liberty in this land than their confrères are in England. If with all the checks and counterchecks of criticism and control over its bureaucracy, the British public has not deemed it expedient to give its executive unlimited power, what reason is there that in India they should enjoy this unheard of power over the person and property of the subject? The circumstances in which the British officers find themselves in this country are the least conducive to the continued maintenance of their British instincts, which soon become warped owing to the absence of all known safeguards, which confine their confrères in England strictly within their bounds, under dread of public criticism and censure."

Comments on the Secretary of State's reply to the Lancashire deputation on the subject of the cotton duties.

Gujaráti (13), 25th Mar.; Kalpataru (93), 25th Mar.

10. The Gujaráti writes in terms of great praise about the reply Mr. Chamberlain gave to the deputation that waited upon him to represent the interests of the Lancashire manufacturers. It refers to the fact of the willingness of the representatives of Lancashire to support in the House of Commons the resolution for allowing India to make a gift of £ 100 millions for war purposes only on the condition that the excise duty on cotton goods may be raised in India from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and remarks that purblind selfishness could go no further. The paper also refers to the unwillingness expressed by Mr. Chamberlain before the deputation to disregard Indian opinion particularly in matters like the imposition of an additional excise duty in which it found support from every Englishman in India and observes that this sentiment of the Secretary of State for India indicates in what direction Indians should agitate if they expect to achieve victory in the

and. The paper cordially wishes that time may soon bring about harmony between Indians and the Englishmen residing in India. [The Kalpataru expresses its apprehension that the cotton duty will be lowered soon after the war in deference to the clamour of the Lancashire mill-owners.]

Complaint that women and children in Belgaum are frightened at the sight of English soldiers aimlessly wandering in the streets.
Belgaum Samáchár (84), 26th Mar.

11. The Belgaum Samáchár states that several men of the Territorials stationed at Belgaum aimlessly wander about the town, and complains that although there has yet been no report of their having molested anyone, women and children are frightened to see them loitering in the streets or standing in the vicinity of temples. It, therefore, suggests that they should be prohibited from going outside the limits of the cantonment.

Complaint that the people of Bhingar (Ahmednagar) are put to hardships owing to the inclusion of the place in cantonment limits.
Shetkari (38), 25th Mar.

12. The Shetkari complains that the people of Bhingar (Ahmednagar) are put to unnecessary hardships since its inclusion in the Ahmednagar cantonment limits. It says that it is customary with the Hindus to devote, before retiring to bed, a little time to bhajan, kirtan, etc., which is accompanied with music and is particularly relished by the people. The cantonment rules, however, disallow these to continue after 10 o'clock at night. The paper considers this a real grievance and requests the authorities to redress it.

The Imperial War Conference and the position of Indian delegates.
Message (6), 29th Mar.

13. Referring to Reuter's account of the warm reception given to the Indian delegates at the Imperial War Conference in recognition of the great part played by India in the war, the Message writes:—"We welcome this authoritative announcement as tending to remove much of the misunderstanding which had resulted from the needless secrecy of the India Office. What we would, however, like to know is as regards the voting power of these delegates in respect of the questions that may come up for decision. The London Times which in matters like this seems to be usually inspired says that the representatives of India at the Conference have a status identical with that of the Dominion Members. This identity of status seems to hold good only so far as the voting is concerned. The voting is by states—not by members and each state has one vote when any resolution is put to the vote. What we are unable to understand is how it enhances the prestige of the Indian representatives—it would be more accurate to say the representatives of the Government of India. The original admission of the Secretary of State, 'I shall be India's representative at the Conference,' remains yet unrepudiated, for all that we know. That Indians who were hitherto strangers to the charmed circle of Imperial cum Dominion deliberations should have been admitted to the Conference and allowed equal liberty of speech is itself a distinct gain, and the people of India who have all these years remained content with small mercies have not much reason to be dissatisfied so far as this concession goes. The voting will be looked after by Mr. Chamberlain as the representative of India.......... If like the Dominion Ministers the Secretary of State for India had possessed the confidence of the country on whose behalf he is expected to vote, we should not have demurred to it. As it is, he is the nominee of the Imperial Government and his position as a member of that Government utterly disqualifies him for playing the self-assumed rôle of India's representative. In giving his vote, he may be guided by the views of those who have been sent from here to assist him; but he is not bound in any way by those views, which may be disregarded at his will. We have ventured to reiterate what we have stated more than once, as we do not wish that our countrymen should delude themselves into a fond belief that they have scored a 'big' success."

Indian Social Reformer (3), 1st Apl.

*14. "The academic difficulties raised by constitution-mongers to the reception of Indian delegates in the Imperial Conference, would seem to have been completely ignored by those responsible for the organisation of the Conference. The Secretary of State for India has informed the Viceroy that the Indian delegates have been admitted as full members on terms of absolute equality with the Colonial representatives who welcomed their Indian colleagues.......... We may now safely take it that the position of India in the Empire has been officially recognised by all the sister Dominions as well as by the United Kingdom as one of equal status. This is a great step forward, and we are grateful to His Majesty's Government for the tact and firmness with which they have brought about this result."

Bombay Samáchár (55), 26th Mar.; Sánj Vartamán (29), 28th Mar.; Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 31st Mar.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (24), 28th and 30th Mar.

15. The meeting of the Conference is a landmark in the history of the British Empire. Its deliberations will lead to strengthen the Empire. The hearts of the Indian people will be delighted to learn that His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner was given an opportunity to make a speech in reply to the opening address of the Premier. We feel sure His Highness must have given an assurance on behalf of India that her people are ready to sacrifice everything for the sake of achieving victory. This Conference will surely lead to the unification of the Empire and thus acclerate the progress of India. [The Sanj Vartaman writes:—The fears entertained about a right status not being given to the representatives of India in the Imperial Conference have all been allayed by the report of the meeting of the Conference which is to the effect that they were given a place on a footing of equality with other members and were given an opportunity of expressing their views. The position the representatives of India secured in the Conference is due to the part played by India in the war and the rapid progress she is making in all directions. We feel sure India will be given an increasing share in the administration of her internal affairs in order to be able to share the responsibility as a component part of the Empire. The Jám-e-Jamshed is also gratified at the news that Indian representatives have been given a place of equality with other representatives and have been granted the freedom of the city of London. It expresses hope that India will soon be given a form of Government like that of the Colonies. The Praja Mitra and Pársi considers the position accorded to Indian representatives in the conference as a clear indication that India will be given political rights that will lead to swarájya. In the subsequent issue the paper expresses its gratification at the granting of the freedom of the city of London by the Corporation of London to the Indian representatives. The Hindusthán expresses hope that India's representation on the Conference will lead to justice being done to the claims of India in all matters.]

Comments on the Rules under the Defence of India Force Act.

Young India (11), 28th Mar.

16. "The rules regarding the Indian Defence Force which were published sometime ago leave much to be desired. The second part of these rules which relates to the voluntary enlistment of Indians is more or less of a negative character. Beyond setting forth as to who may not volunteer it does not give any idea as to the numerical strength, pay, prospects and other conditions of service. It appears to us that the progress from the Act to the Rules is one from Tweedledum to Tweedledee. Apart from the paucity of information, the most discouraging feature is the attitude of the Government officials. These gentlemen seem to view the movement with considerable disfavour if they have not also interposed practical difficulties in the way of the success of recruitment. It had naturally been expected that His Excellency Lord Chelmsford would throw some light on the various aspects of the question in his closing speech at the Delhi session of the Imperial Council. His reference to the Indian Defence Force has suffered from extreme brevity. Without unnecessarily reiterating that the Act is confessedly a war measure, he might have enlightened the public as to how many people they were going to accept and whether the conditions of service would or would not materially differ from what the public had been told to expect. It appears from all accounts that in the rules the authorities have gone back on their original intentions, which in themselves were not very liberally conceived. These rules lend emphasis to the view that it is unwise to leave things undetermined in the Statute itself. In this particular instance, the rules were framed at the Indian Army head-quarters with the assistance of a committee in which were included the present volunteer officers, and in the illiberal conception which underlies the rules are fully reflected the little minds which were called upon to advice and suggest to the military authorities. At first, great hopes were roused in us that at last a grudging measure of long delayed justice was being dealt out to us. But since the passing of the Act, the substance has disappeared and we are left to grapple with the shadow.......... If Government are really anxious to avoid controversy and criticism, the best way of doing it would be to tell the public something more than what you and I and everybody also know."

Máhratta (5), 1st Apl.

17. "Whatever the disabilities, Indians will do well to take advantage of the opportunity offered. We hope that 'the exigencies of war' will not come in the way of increasing the number of units to a decent number before long, also that at the headquarters of each unit arrangements will be made for the training of more than one company at a time. The volunteers will do well to bear in mind that if they desire training they must prepare themselves to bear a certain measure of inconsiderate treatment that they may possibly receive at the hands of their instructors and officers. Even 'select' British officers may, some of them, show a suprising want of consideration for the feelings of the volunteers. It is well to be mentally prepared for a great deal of worry, though of course there is a limit beyond which patience is both unwise and immoral. We hope that instructors and officers will be able to establish the best possible relations between themselves and the new volunteers, for they will require nothing beyond a little tact and moderation to achieve this result."

Message (6), 30th Mar.

18. "It is with a sigh of relief that we have now received definite particulars regarding the recruitment of volunteers from among Indians. These particulars are satisfactory in so far as they enable us to see how we stand. The only consideration which must induce people now is a high sense of patriotism and nothing else. Even then by the lowering of the age limit from 41 to 30, the doors of admission are 'banged, barred and bolted' in the face of many patriotic sons of the Motherland, who are willing and can afford to volunteer. They may possess a wonderful physical fitness; yet they may not join because they are above 30 years of age. Next, the area of recruitment and training has been considerably circumscribed. It is intended by the authorities to form Indian territorial units 'all over India,' only with their 'head-quarters at convenient centres.'......... To complete the training of one unit consisting of 1,000 men it will take up about a whole year and by that time—assuming that the war will last during that time—no more than six units will have been trained, 6,000 to 60 millions—a magnificient proportion indeed! It seems to us that on the whole Government are not so anxious to mobilise Indian man-power as they are in regard to her money power. The pay and prospects are not very alluring, though the fact that after the period of training people will be allowed to return to their civil avocations, should be an inducement to many people to join the force. One has only to look upon this period of training as a period of holiday, though without its amenities and away from their homes and hearths. Those who have the means can conveniently make a little sacrifice and enrol in the unit."

Kesari (95), 27th Mar.

19. Referring to the rules under the Indian Defence Force Act, the Kesari says they are not quite up to the mark, but it advises people not to delay any longer and wait for further explanations. It requests them to correspond with the District Magistrates and join the force. It is of opinion that a man cannot join the force while serving elsewhere and that he should either resign his former appointment or take leave. It also asks them not to be terrified by the rule regarding religious restrictions and says that the daily routine of the sepoys in no way interferes with their religious observances. It finally exhorts patriotic people not to bring forward any excuse and requests them to enjoy the right of defending the mother country which was being demanded from Government so long.

Aryavart (82), 24th Mar.

20. The Aryavart says that Government do not display the same zeal for collecting recruits for the Defence of India Force as they do for collecting contributions to the War Loan, and points out that while meetings are being held at several places under the auspices of Government officials to collect subscriptions, no steps have been taken to encourage volunteering among Indians. It remarks that India is ready to supply both men and money, but if Government want only the latter and do not care much about recruits they need not have taken the trouble of passing the Defence of India Force Act.

Comments on the paragraph in the Capital of Calcutta about the activities of the Indian Home Rule party in Bombay with regard to the Indian Defence Force.

Young India (11), 28th Mar.

21. Young India reproduces from the Capital, newspaper of Calcutta, the paragraph contributed to it by its Bombay correspondent in which he dwells on "the growing anxiety of the Europeans at the bold attempt of the Indian Home Rule party to turn to their own account the Government's concession for volunteering for Indians", and remarks:—"If the paragraph which we have reproduced above had appeared in the columns of an Indian journal, it would have exposed itself to the terrors of the obnoxious Press Act. It is quite over a fortnight since the mischievous paragraph, undoubtedly designed to provoke class hatred, appeared in the Capital and yet no notice seems to have been taken of it by the ever vigilant and scrupulous authorities. The insinuation of the correspondent that if Government accepts Mr. Tilak's recruits it would soon find itself 'in a mess very much similar to that in which the Irish Parliament fell when confronted with the muskets of Grattan's volunteers', cannot but be keenly resented and must certainly tend to destroy the good feelings that exist between the two communities in Bombay and elsewhere. One thing, however, that stands out in bold relief is that the Chitpavan Brahmin has become a red rag to the Anglo-Indian bull. It is a pity that in these days when Cabinet Ministers and statesmen feel the necessity for conciliation and co-operation, the Government of India should tolerate the existence of journalistic Bohemians of this type in this country. Will Government tolerate these dirty and mean sentiments simply because they have found place in the columns of an Anglo-Indian journal?"

Reflections on the Revolution in Russia.

Kesari (95), 27th Mar.

22. Lord Sydenham writing in the Nineteenth Century on "The Danger in India" has compared the Russian and Indian educated classes in order to abuse the latter. But the present Russian Revolution is in every way the victory of the educated classes in Russia. The new system of education was begun in that country in 1860. Since then there were very few of the educated classes who did not join the Revolutionary party. The Russian educated classes went to villages and taught the villagers. They bridged the gulf between the classes and the masses and spread revolutionary doctrines along with education amongst the people. Government looked upon all of them with suspicion. Though they were revolutionaries they did not commit outrages. In fact if anybody has committed outrages it is the Russian Government which has persecuted the educated classes for these forty years. These classes were not foolish enough to suppose that they would be successful by proclaiming an open fight with Government. They wanted to educate the nation and make it liberty-loving and prepare the ground from within. The Royal power arrogantly treading such a ground was swallowed up by it. Two weeks ago the Emperor's unjust word was able to trample the nation under foot. Now the same Emperor plaintively says that he is willing to be taken wherever the people wished. The credit of all this must be given to the educated classes only. As soon as education begins to spread the bureaucracy should wisely realise that its days are numbered. Once the fight between tyrannical tendencies born of long enjoyment of bureaucratic powers and ideas of independence that owe their birth to education, begins, it will end only in one way, in the victory of the latter. Many are the historical examples testifying to this principle. The Russian Revolution has given us but one more proof of its truth.

Gujaráti (13), 21st Mar.; Arya Prakásh (12), 25th Mar.

23. What will be the effect of the Russian revolution on Germany and Austria? It is believed that if Germany and Austria are defeated their forms of government will be changed on the lines followed by Russia, that is to say, these countries will get republican forms of government. But will that lead to the ambitions of the people being damped or altered? France has not forgotten its former possession of Alsace and Lorraine as also of Monacca and wants to regain possession of them. Will a change in the form of government lead to Germany giving up all ideas of commercial supremacy and a colonial empire? Will not Russia now think of getting Constantinople and other open ports? Will it not try to extend its sphere of political influence in Turkey and Persia? In spite of the war political movements are undertaken in Russia and Ireland. But in India the Provincial Governments do not even dream of introducing any political reform at such a time. The British Parliament has recognised the new Government of Russia. Should not the officials issue a proclamation instructing Indians as to what attitude they should adopt towards the Russian revolution? [The Arya Prakásh writes :—Russia deserves the praises of the rest of the world for the firmness and tact with which it has achieved the change in its form of government. All join in wishing success to the new Government.]

What lesson Indian Muhammadans should learn from the fall of Baghdad.

Arya Prakásh (12), 25th Mar.

24. Referring to the fall of Baghdad, the Arya Prakásh remarks :—The Moslems of India venerate the Sultan of Turkey as their Caliph. They are also the co-religionists of the Turks and, therefore, it is but natural that the Indian Muhammadans may, in spite of their perfect loyalty towards the English, wish that Turkey may remain independent. It is, however, a question, regard being had to a number of circumstances, whether the conquered territory will be restored to Turkey after the conclusion of peace. It would, therefore, be advisable if the Muhammadans in India were to learn to love their fellow-countrymen though of an alien religion, at least as much, if not more, as they love their co-religionists in a foreign country and to cherish as much enthusiasm for their country as for their religion. Our Moslem brethren entertain greater solicitude for their co-religionists residing in foreign countries than for their fellow countrymen professing an alien faith and it is for this reason that they cannot achieve their salvation in the way they should. The present event has dealt a severe blow to the doctrine of Pan-Islamism. The Muhammadans should now wake up from their dreams and looking upon India as their own country for all time to come should try to work out their own advancement along with communities professing other faiths under the protection of British rule.

Reflections on the progress of the war.

Islámic Mail, Urdu edition (121), 26th Mar.

25. Reviewing the progress of the war in all theatres, the Islámic Mail lays stress on the fact that the Allies have repulsed the enemy in France and Moldavia, as well as in the region of Monastir and Lake Urumia. It holds that the day is not far off when German militarism will collapse like a pack of cards, and it refers to history which tells how every nation in the past, has either triumphed or fallen according as it embraced a righteous cause or the reverse. Referring to the capture of Baghdad it remarks that judging from the astonishing speed with which General Maude is driving the Turks before him, and the enthusiasm with which the Russians have assumed the offensive and have inflicted defeat on the Turks near Kirman, the hearts of the people are buoyed up with hopes and even the most pessimistic among them have now come round to entertaining a firm conviction regarding the eventual success of Britain and her Allies. It concludes by referring to the fact that the Arabs and Egyptians sympathise with the Allies, and it exhorts all concerned to help Government according to their means.

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's reply to Mr. Rees' question as to whether the Dominion authorities will be given a voice in deciding questions about India.
Message (6), 29th Mar.

26. "Mr. Chamberlain's reply to Sir John D. Rees that Government did not contemplate any action which would give the Dominion representatives authority to decide Indian questions appears to us to be somewhat ambiguous. In view of the persistent attempt which is being made by a small but influentially represented section of people in England to obtain for the Dominions a decent share in the administration of India, it is encouraging to be told authoritatively that the Dominion representatives will not be given any authority to 'decide exclusively Indian questions.' But it is not so satisfactory to know that Mr. Chamberlain made an implication, which if it should prove correct will give rise to considerable misgiving about the real intention of the Imperial Government. From the second part of his statement, it naturally follows that in exclusively Indian questions, they will be allowed to exercise the same influence as the representatives of India. It is not clear whether this inconsistency is merely apparent. It is there, however, and unless we are assured in plain unequivocal terms that the Dominions will have no authority to decide Indian questions nor exercise any influence over any decision touching them, we cannot but continue to view the matter with great apprehension."

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's reply in the House of Commons regarding the abkari policy of Government.
Mahrátta (5), 1st Apl.

*27. Referring to the statements of Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons that Government did not consider restrictions on drink traffic in India necessary as they would tend to encourage illicit production and compulsion, the Mahrátta remarks:—"This confession of the Indian Government excites pity as well as indignation. Russia, France, Great Britain have all 'restricted' the drink traffic in their several territories and their experience as reported now and then in the papers has been reassuring. Is India a country so different in its soil-constitution that what helped Russia and others to take a forward step on the path of progress will work like a reactionary measure in this country? Not in the soil, but in the ruler-class which dominates the soil and the people lies the root of such an anomalous result if, as the Indian Government pitifully puts it, increased restriction would tend to encourage illicit production and consumption and would not increase the supply of raw material or supply and efficiency of labour.......... Does our Government mean to say that it is powerless to track out illicit production and punish it! We cannot believe it. What it is powerless to do is to bring itself to cooperate with the people in removing the drink evil from their midst. The resolve to cooperate is wanting and not the means to carry out the resolve if it be once taken."

The working of the Press Act.
Mahrátta (5), 1st Apl.

*28. "From the returns in connection with the working of the Press Act placed upon the table of the Imperial Council, now published with the Government of India Gazette, we learn that the Act has been responsible for a great deal of harm. The amount of the deposits forfeited and unforfeited taken from printing presses as security for good behaviour amounts to Rs. 3,25,400. That of deposits taken from newspapers amounts to Rs. 1,21,000. 200 presses which were asked to find initial security failed to find it and therefore never came into existence. 105 newspapers had a similar fate. These figures may seem large or small, terrible or insignificant according to the view-point of the observer. The Viceroy in his reply to the Press deputation seemed to look upon the Press Act as an innocent measure, striking only those who were 'not honest'. Did the Viceroy know the full details which are now before the public? Does he still think that the Act is a beneficent measure? The fact that a number of presses and papers—not at all a small number—failed to come into existence because of the initial security clause is proof enough of the oppressive nature of the Act. It is not a measure that can commend itself to partisans of ordered progress. It is a diabolical instrument of tyranny which in a land less peaceful and easy-going than ours would have been sufficient to give a strong impetus to revolutionary activity. Combined with its elder brother the Defence of India Act, this Press Law is undoubtedly responsible even here in peaceful India for a number of disconsolate and angry hearts which are no longer capable of wishing well to British rule."

Indian Social Reformer (8), 1st Apl.

29. Referring to the list of newspapers dealt with under the Press Act published in the Gazette of India, the Indian Social Reformer remarks :—"The list includes the names of newspapers which no one would have thought of in association with the Press Act, and what is more, some of these newspapers would seem to have learned for the first time from their inclusion in the list, that they had been dealt with under the Act. Some of them, which appear in the list as having been warned, declared that they are at a loss to know what the warning consisted in and how it was conveyed. It may be that memory might have played them false. A conclusion which will be widely drawn from this long list, is that it may fall to the most careful of newspapers in India, to be warned under the Press Act, and that, therefore, there is no special demerit attaching to a journalist in being so warned. At the same time it behoves the authorities to consider if by overdoing their warning, they do not place themselves in the predicament of the pastoral lad who cried 'wolf' when there was no wolf."

Sánj Vartamán (29), 27th Mar.; Hitechhu (61), 18th Mar.; Political Bhomiyo (New), 30th Mar.

30. Quoting figures from the statistics about the working of the Press Act published by the Government of India in the Gazette of India of the 24th March 1917, the Sánj Vartamán declares that it does not agree with the view expressed by the Viceroy in the course of the reply he gave to the deputation of the Indian Press Association to the effect that the Press Act was not being administered in a harsh manner as was represented by the deputation. It remarks that the increase of 500 and 131 in the number of presses and newspapers respectively in the course of five years in a country of the size and population of India, which is more a continent than a country, is quite insignificant and it goes only to establish the harsh character of the Act. It also inquires if the closure during the period from 1910 to 1915 of 201 presses and 129 journals as a result of their not being able to furnish the security demanded from them under the Press Act does not mean the withholding from the country of so many media for the spread of knowledge and education. [The Hitechhu remarks that journalists cannot swallow the Viceroy's statement belittling the rigorous nature of the Press Act, in the face of the opinions expressed to that effect by legal tribunals. It regards the power the Press Act vests in the Executive, uncontrolled by the Judiciary, as a sort of poison in the law governing the Press and as a blot on the British ideal of liberty. The Political Bhomiyo considers the present agitation against the Press Act to be ill-timed and, dwelling upon the propriety of the Viceroy's reply to the deputation, expresses itself in favour of the continuance of the Act at least for the period of the war.]

Comments on His Excellency the Viceroy's reply to the Indian Ladies' Deputation on the subject of indentured labour.

Sánj Vartamán (29), 26th Mar.; Bombay Samáchár (55), 2[illegible]th Mar.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (21), 1st Apl., Eng. cols.; Gujaráti (13), 25th Mar.

31. The sympathetic reply given by His Excellency Lord Chelmsord to the Indian Ladies' Deputation may be said to be the last word on the subject of indentured labour. Now that a definite assurance has been given that the system of indentured labour will not be revived, steps should be taken to remove the Emigration Act from the statute book at the earliest opportunity. We are thankful to His Excellency for the assurance he has given, but we hope he will take care to see that the evils of indentured labour are not reintroduced by the sanctioning of any other form of labour emigration from India. [The Bombay Samáchár expresses gratification at the reply given by His Excellency the Viceroy to the Ladies' Deputation and expresses hope that in view of the fact that labourers will be required in large numbers for the development of Indian industries after the war, Government will be pleased to put a stop to indentured labour altogether. The Kaiser-i-Hind points out that "these ladies had not waited upon the head of the British administration in India to ventilate their own grievances but to plead at the bar of British statesmanship the cause of womanhood, woman's honour and woman's self-respect." It then continues :—"Are these matters, important as they are, to be brought to the notice of the Viceroy by others? Are they not plain and simple and degrading and disgraceful enough to have already drawn Governments's attention? However, we welcome the sympathetic promise Lord Chelmsford has been pleased to make and we trust when the time comes this matter will have its due place in the thought and care which have been promised to it." The Gujaráti writes :—People naturally ask how the system of indentured labour has now been stopped with one stroke of the pen. We are inclined to think that it is due to popular agitation of Indians, Anglo-Indians and officials on the question. Should these classes continue to be unanimous in all matters, we have every hope that India will secure Swarajya and acquire the highest position among all the countries of Asia.]

Comments on the appointment of an English Barrister as Advocate-General of Bengal.
Message (6), 30th Mar.

32. "The importation of a barrister from England to fill the Advocate-Generalship of Bengal is thoroughly in keeping with the India Office traditions under the benevolent regimé of Mr. Chamberlain. .... Though the present Viceroy has been described as a neutral in politics, events during the past twelve months have shown that he is no less staunch in his adhesion to Conservatism than the Parliamentarian who presides at Withehall. Mr. Chamberlain gave Bengal to Lord Romaldshay, another Conservative, and if he continues long enough in office, we have no doubt he will similarly bless Bombay and Madras with Conservative statesmen. Lord Chelmsford has faithfully reproduced Mr. Chamberlain's methods by conferring the Lieutenant-Governorships of Burma and the United Provinces on two typically reactionary members of the Government of India. The appointment of a Conservative candidate as the Advocate-General of Bengal belongs to the same category. The question is not whether there are competent Indians in the Calcutta Bar to step into the shoes of Sir S. P. Sinha. It is really whether the ranks of the Conservative party have become exhausted. So long as there are men left on whom Mr. Chamberlain's choice may fall, the Calcutta bar need not feel disappointed if the loaves and fishes of office, limitted as they are, are denied to them."

Comments on the appointment of Mr. Aftab Ahmed Khan as a member of the India Council.
Islámic Mail, Urdu edition (121), 26th Mar.

33. Commenting on the news that Mr. Aftab Ahmed Khan, Bar.-at-Law of Aligarh, has been appointed to be a member of the India Council in succession to Mirza Abbas Ali Baig, the Islámic Mail takes the occasion to congratulate Government on the selection of one who is fully conversant with the needs and aspirations of the Indian Musalmans, and who is, moreover, a practical, unostentatious, and sincere worker in the sphere of education and social reform. It characterises him as the moving spirit of the Aligarh College and the Muhammadan Educational Conference, and it expresses concern as to what their condition will be after the guiding hand of the Sahibzada is removed from them. It is convinced that the appointment in question will prove useful both to the rulers and the ruled.

Protest against the Bombay Chronicle's criticism of Sir Shamsul Huda's appointment as Judge of the Calcutta High Court.
Islámic Mail (4), 24th Mar., Eng. cols.

34. "Our contemporary of the Chronicle which poses as a Hindu and Muhammadan leader and professes to be an advocate of Nationalism (whatever that may mean) is very wroth with the Governor of Bengal for Justice Digamber Chatterjea's place in the High Court of Fort William being given to Nawab Sir Shamsul Huda, at whom our friend has made a passing hit which would contrast discordantly with the encomiums bestowed upon the Nawab by other Congress organs in Bengal. So far as we can understand, beyond the fact of the Nawab being a Mussalman, there is no other thing which would discredit his appointment to the High Court. He may not see eye to eye with the advanced politician of the Home Rule School, but he is a progressive Moderate and has taken no mean part in the development of local self-government in Bengal. When his name was mentioned in connection with the vacancy in the Madras Executive Council, our local contemporary did indeed fret at the name of a Muhammadan being mentioned and made no secret of his feelings, but the Bengal papers, such as the Bengali and the A. B. Patrika supported it. He is a brilliant lawyer, a capable administrator, a zealous worker of sound judical temperament but he is also a staunch Muhamnadan, as he once confessed, and that is a fault. Our contemporary cannot evidently view with equanimity the elevation of a Muhammadan unless that Muhammadan happens to belong to the Horniman clique. It has written so much about increasing the Indian element in the Bombay High Court but never a word about the claims of a Muhammadan not even about those of Mr. Azad. On the Honourable Mr. Chaubal's retirement a vacancy is likely to occur in the Bombay Executive Council. Will Government be pleased to consult the Chronicle whether it has any objection to the appointment of a Muhammadan in future?"

The Bombay Provincial Congress Committee and the proposed Congress deputation to England.
Message (6), 30th Mar.

35. "It is rather interesting to learn on reliable authority that the Council of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee has come to the conclusion—not unanimous, of course—that the consideration of the question of the Congress deputation to England should be postponed. We presume the 'loyalists' in the Council have been so deeply moved by the sympathetic exhortations of His Excellency Lord Willingdon at the War Loan meeting, as to inflict with a heroic sense of sacrifice, self-abnegation on themselves and on the country. But unfortunately this loyalist 'Cave' in the Committee's Council is reckoning without its host in this matter. It must be remembered in the first instance that the All-India Congress Committee has received its mandate from the Congress to carry out the arrangements for sending a deputation to England, and it cannot question or go back on that mandate."

Comments on the Abkári Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for 1915-16.
Bombay Samáchár (55), 31st Mar.

36. Referring to the Government resolution on the Abkári Administration Report for the Bombay Presidency including Aden for the year 1915-16, the Bombay Samáchár expresses gratification at the action of Government in ordering the Director of Public Instruction to arrange for an early introduction of lessons on temperance and on the danger of drink in the 5th, 6th, and 7th books of the Vernacular Readers Series. It dwells upon the beneficent and lasting effects such lessons learnt at a tender age are calculated to produce upon young readers, and remarks that this decision on the part of Government afforded a proof of their solicitude in the matter of checking the evil of drink. The paper wishes that the head of the Educational Department will take prompt steps to comply with the Government order. It maintains that the people receive with acclamation the assurance given by Government about their desire to mitigate the evil of drink by imposing restrictions upon its sale, but at the same time it expresses its disapprobation at the increase in the number of liquor shops in the Kaira District on the ground that the fear of illicit distillation of liquor in that district which prompted Government to increase those shops has been to a great extent removed by the recent amendment of the Bombay Abkári Act the effect of which has been to impose restrictions on the possession and sale of Mhowra flowers in the Kaira District.

Complaint about the sale of Goa lottery tickets in Bombay.
Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 27th Mar.

37. Writing in condemnation of the Goa lottery tickets which are being openly sold in Bombay, the Jám-e-Jamshed expresses its eagerness to know the reasons that prompted Government to repermit the sale of these tickets after being once stopped by them. If these Goa lotteries are a legitimate means of trying one's luck the paper wants to know why British Indian subjects should be debarred from the enjoyment of the same privilege. It knows of a number of educational bodies and other institutions undertaking various kinds of relief work the conductors of which, if permitted to organise monthly sweeps, would be in a position to do immense good to the city. Why not, inquires the paper, allow Indian leaders to issue a "War Loan Sweep" instead of allowing the money of the British subjects to find its way to a foreign territory. It remarks that like the mysterious workings of nature some acts of Government are inscrutable.

Complaint that the prohibition by the Police of the bullock cart traffic between Wathar and Mahableshwar is causing much inconvenience to the public.
Vrittasar (113), 26th Mar.

38. The Vrittasar complains that the Police having prohibited chhakadas (bullock carts) from plying between Wai and Wathar and Wai and Mahableshwar the travelling public has been put to much inconvenience and suggests that as the owners of these carts are starving in consequence of the prohibition, the authorities may be pleased to restore the traffic.

Comments on the failure to render an account of the Moslem League funds on the part of Mr. Vazir Hasan and others.
Islámic Mail (4), 24th Mar.

39. "A member of the Moslem League writing from Allahabad draws our attention to a very serious matter which concerns all those who have subscribed to the funds of the League. Our correspondent says:—'Almost all contributed large amounts to the League funds and had a right to know how their money was spent. As trustees of the funds, it was the duty of the Raja of Mahamudabad and Wazir Hasan and Mazharul Haq to tell the subscribers in what way their money had been used. It is customary for the secretaries of public institutions to give a report of the year's work of the institution, its income and expenditure, its progress and its activities, at its annual sitting. But Mr. Wazir Hasan's League is an exception to this rule. No one knows what Mr. Wazir Hasan does with the huge funds that he collects in the name of the League. We admit that he has risen too high to deign to look down upon those humble persons who ask for light. But it is due to his own lofty position to give an account of the public funds entrusted to his keeping.' Our correspondent is perfectly right in demanding an account of the public funds in the hands of Wazir Hasan. He and his colleagues Mazharul Haq and the Raja, disdain to answer public queries. But they are bound by every law of honour and propriety to render an account of funds in their keeping. Mr. Mazharul Haq was entrusted with the huge funds collected for the relief of the Cawnpore riot victims. There was some correspondence in the newspapers who wanted him to render an account of the funds in his hands. There was much foul language used, but so far as we know he has never given any account and to this day we do not know how the money has been spent. We do not attribute any sinister motives to him as his detractors have done. If there were any other man in his place, people would have been justified in drawing ugly conclusions. But he and Mr. Wazir Hasan are honourable men."

Claims of Muhammadans to the posts of Public Prosecutors in Sind.
Islámic Mail (4), 24th Mar., Eng. cols.

40. "Our Sind contemporary writes. 'We should like to give prominence and publicity to a letter addressed by the Honorary Secretary of the Sind Muhammadan Association, Karáchi, to the Commissioner in Sind and the Judicial Commissioner in Sind. It is indeed a true sign of progress that the Sind Moslem leaders are applying themselves to discover the true sources of Muhammadan backwardness in Sind. They are approaching Government to confer high appointments on deserving Muhammadans in such departments where Muhammadans are not to be found at all. It is since a long time past that the claims of the Muhammadan community have not been considered in connection with the appointment of Public Prosecutors in Sind. The Province of Sind is wholly a Muhammadan Province, 90 per cent.

general population being the followers of Islam, and it is strange not one of them is a Musalman. It is but fair that all important communities should be represented as Public Prosecutors of Sind. There are many Muhammadan Barristers and Pleaders in Sind who are fit for the post of Public Prosecutor in Sind. The Sind Muhammadan Association has approached the authorities at a proper time as the post of the Public Prosecutor in Sind will shortly fall vacant on account of Mr. Raymond's appointment as an Additional Judicial Commissioner. We hope the request of the Association will be granted, not only because it is a just and fair one, but because it will serve as an incentive to the efforts the community is making to improve its education."

EDUCATION.

Comments on the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Setalvad as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University.

Message (6), 30th Mar.; Gujaráti* (13), 1st Apl., Eng. cols.

41. "It is gratifying that an Indian has been appointed as the Vice-Chancellor of our University. Mr. C. H. Setalvad is undoubtedly a great educationist.......... While we are pleased that he has been selected to fill the vacancy created by the absence of Dr. Mackichan we wonder if it is not after all a strategic move on the part of Government to ween him from Congress politics.......... Considering his lukewarm attitude in recent years, Congress politicians will not have much reason to be sorry for the loss, if loss it is, of Mr. Setalvad's active services. We hope that, as Vice-Chancellor, he will leave his personal impress on the affairs of the University and earn the gratitude of his countrymen in the field of education. His success in this will greatly make up for his possible failure in politics." [The Gujaráti remarks:—"In our opinion this selection will go far towards removing the feeling of suspicion and distrust that still prevails in the public mind regarding the educational policy of the Bombay Government, and convincing the educated people of this presidency that at least His Excellency Lord Willingdon is not going to perpetuate the mistakes of the past but is magnanimous enough to recognise meritorious services and brush aside old official prejudices."]

Jám-e-Jamshed (20), 30th Mar.; Hindusthán (17), 29th Mar.; * Kaiser-i-Hind (21), 1st Apl., Eng. cols.

42. The Jám-e-Jamshed congratulates the Honourable Mr. Setalvad on his being appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University. It remarks that this action of the sympathetic Government of Lord Willingdon, coming as it is does after Sir P. M. Mehta's appointment to that post in the same régime, demonstrates the solicitude of the present Government to see relations of cordiality and confidence subsisting between the University and the people. In view of the Honourable Mr. Setalvad's opinions as to what part a university should play in the matter of the development of education among Indian students, the paper believes that his present appointment is sure to meet with the whole-hearted approval of the educated classes of the City. [While remarking that the educated public will rejoice at the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Setalvad, the Hindusthán maintains that the Bombay University is very backward, when compared with other Indian universities, in the matter of the appointment of leading educated Indians as its Vice-Chancellors. It points out that even a prodigy of learning like Justice Ranade was not accorded this honour and regrets that prominent men of learning in this country should not be able to win it. While not wishing to disparage here the merits of Dr. Mackichan in any way, the paper observes that it would have been better if other educated men of the same or even a little less calibre than that of Dr. Mackichan had in the past been appointed Vice-Chancellors instead of the latter having been appointed to the post not less than four times. It points out that besides being a member of the Bombay University Senate since 1895 and Chairman of the Schools Committee of the local municipality, the Honourable Mr. Setalvad has not achieved anything remarkable in the field of education; but at the same time it wishes that he may soon add to his past achievements. The Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—"It comes as a matter of genuine pleasure to learn of Mr. Setalvad's appointment to the Vice-Chancellorship in succession to the Rev. Dr. Mackichan. Not only will it go to the credit of Lord Willingdon's Government but also add to public confidence in it to know that an eminent educationist has been chosen to fill the highest place in the University; and it will go to establish much that the public have desired and will tend to promote harmony and sympathy between the official and public interests in the Senate."]

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the margin of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed in the report is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word as Arunodaya or the well-known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

D. The figures giving the circulation or number of copies published of each newspaper and periodical as furnished by the proprietor are not guaranteed as accurate, and in some instances must be regarded with caution.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the rules under the Indian Defence Force Act.

Message (5), 31st Mar.

1. "The authorities seem to be labouring under the belief that those who are eager to volunteer are the tag-rag and bobtail of Indian humanity, irregular, unruly and undisciplined, among whom they are to first restore order and then introduce discipline. They seem to have completely lost sight of the fact that in the large number of people who are really eager to prove their earnestness, we have the best among the community, socially, intellectually, morally and materially, that they are not only the educated but are the most respected and esteemed among their people. We wish the military authorities to bear this in mind thoroughly and if they deal with those who will be enrolling before long, with becoming moderation, dignity and considerateness, it will go a long way to establish cordial relations between the officers and men. We are told that the training companies will be commanded by selected British Officers. We hope the authorities will take due care to elect officers possessing a sympathetic and broad outlook who can enter into and respect the feelings and sentiments of the men whom they may be called upon to command. We are constrained to add this gentle note of warning, in view of certain accounts which have reached us in the past as also on the present occasion regarding the manner in which a certain type of 'British' officers, who have long been stationed in India, treat the men under them. Without instituting any unfair comparison against them, we are constrained to admit that during their long stay in this country they have acquired all the prejudices which are inherent in the Civilian Anglo-Indian population and have been translating them in their practical daily conduct. We are referring to this in no light spirit. We feel that this sort of conduct is not the one which will remove rancour and distrust between the one and another and if such conduct be really tolerated among those into whose hands will be committed the task of moulding the new forces, there is less chance of the movement succeeding.......... We would urge upon our readers to keep in view the larger issues which are involved in the success or failure of the present move. If men are slow to come forward because the conditions are disappointing, our opponents—they are many—would readily seize it as an excuse to cry down the whole Indian Nation as a nation of effete, effeminate men, who, when the opportunity was offered them, would not take it. It would affect us in other directions also and must ultimately mean the prolongation of our arrested progress in political and social questions."

Young India (10), 14th Apl.

2. "Would-be volunteer writes:—'We regret very much that the rules and conditions regarding the voluntary enrolment of Indians have been conceived in a pettyfogging spirit. The rules as they have now been issued leave no doubt that recruitment is carried out under no better conditions than that for the regular Indian Army. Only, it is restricted ordinarily to classes other than those which have been exploited for the latter. Think as we might, there is hardly any extenuating circumstances in favour of the Indians. The class bias and discrimination seems to have been permitted full play in the Rules stage and the strong hopes held out to the ear have been broken to the heart. Too much is made of difficulties of training and equipment which ought to exist nowhere except in imagination. If the authorities were in earnest in the matter, we are sure they would have had no difficulty whatever in overcoming any obstacle.......... Having regard to the invidious distinction and discrimination which is sought to be perpetuated, we do not wonder if the enthusiasm of the people has been damped considerably. The sole motive for people to enrol under these circumstances must be nothing but a high sense of duty and love of country. We expect every true and honest Indian who is not over the prescribed military age of 30 years, to do his duty to his Motherland by enrolling himself at once at the centre most convenient to him, and making by his energy and enthusiasm the half-hearted attempt of the authorities an unqualified success.'"

Sánj Vartamán (28), 2nd Apl.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 3rd Apl.

3. The six thousand men required by Government for the Defence Force will constitute an insignificant force, compared to the population of India and we have every hope that the number will be raised in a very short time. The rules under the Act are satisfactory on the whole. People serving in private firms will be able to take leave for 90 days and join the Force. We hope that managers of commercial firms will allow full pay to their men wishing to join the Defence Force as the pay allowed by Government will be quite inadequate to support the families of people serving in it. Steps should be taken to convene public meetings for exhorting people to join the force and explaining to them the rules under the Act. Should India not be able to furnish six thousand men for the Defence Force those who are opposed to political rights being granted to us will say that we are unfit for swarájya. Those who want swarájya must in the first instance prove that they are able to defend their own country. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi writes:—It would be hasty to conclude from the small number which is to comprise the voluntary section of the Indian Defence Force that Government still continue to look with distrust upon the Indian people. We must in this connection recognise the difficulties of Government in providing arms and accoutrements to the men enlisted in the Defence Force who will only be required to serve in the country. The formation of the Defence Force is only an experiment which might lead to the formation of an Indian Reserve Force. We should, therefore, exert ourselves to make the experiment a success with a view to proving our claim to further concessions in the matter of political rights.]

Gujaráti (12), 1st Apl.

4. An impression prevailed in certain quarters that the Indian Defence Force Act did not satisfy the political aspirations of the Indian people beyond making hollow promises and some persons went the length of questioning the motives of Government. But the rules under the Act lately published will revive the hopes of the people. It seems Government want to raise six units of territorial troops in India and give training to 250 men at a time at each centre. It must be admitted that since only men between the age of 18 to 31 are to be allowed to enlist, able bodied men beyond that age will have to suffer disappointment. The question is how many educated men must there be in this country between the age of 18 and 31? If the figure were known it would be seen that Government are right in fixing the limit of the Indian section of the Defence Force at 6,000. The men who will enlist will get the benefit of a change of air and be fed and clothed at Government expense and get military training in the bargain. Apparently the gain is not a very substantial one, but we hope no young man will miss this unique opportunity of receiving military training.

Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.

5. We really regret to learn that Government have limited the number of recruits in the Defence of India Force to 6,000. The circumstances of the war are such as require the increase of man-power as much as possible and attempts are being made in this direction both in England and France. Those who have been rejected formerly are to be examined again in England. Is it not better to recruit as many men as possible in India rather than somehow obtain recruits from those once declared to be inefficient? Government do not seem to be ready to proceed in this matter with a mind quite free from suspicion. Otherwise they would not have made a ridiculous demand for 6,000 men out of 25 crores. As time goes on the little prejudices of Government may disappear and more recruits may be entertained. Something is better than nothing, and our only duty is to provide the men asked for and wait for a fresh call. We trust that Indian youths will not waver from performing this duty.

Hindusthán (16), 31st Mar.

6. Commenting upon the rules under the Indian Defence Force Act, the Hindusthán expresses its disappointment at the small number which is to constitute the Indian section of the Defence Force and adds:—Popular leaders convened public meetings and exhorted young men to join the Force; but we now see that Government are reluctant to fulfil their promises. The rules under the Defence Force Act are a sort of wet blanket on the enthusiasm of the people and the hopes they entertained of serving the country. Government are responsible for thus creating discontent among the people by frustrating their hopes. What prodigious efforts Government have made to secure enlistment in the Defence Force! Young men should come forward to join the Force prompted by no other motive but that of serving their mother-country. We wanted bread and they have given us a stone! However, we have every hope that self-sacrificing young men will come forward to avail themselves of the opportunity to become volunteers and do their part of the duty which every citizen owes to his country.

The War Loan.

Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

7. Referring to the steps being taken in the mofussil to secure subscriptions to the War Loan, the Gujaráti remarks:—"We are not sure if over-zeal has not caused or is not likely to cause dissatisfaction in the moffussil. We do not think sufficient attention is being paid to the fact that it would operate as a hardship to call upon a landholder with a family who pays an assessment of ten rupees only to contribute an equal amount. It should be remembered that the call for subscriptions to the War Loan was preceded by a universal call for voluntary gifts of money or in some other form even in the moffussil, and whilst welcoming all legitimate methods for inducing those who are in a position to subscribe, we deprecate exhibitions of over-zeal in dealing with the mass of the people outside great cities and towns in the very interests of the War Loan.......... India is not England and what may not be felt to be a burden in England may become so in this land of poverty. We would advise the people in the moffussil to rise to the height of the occasion, in fact do their utmost to help the Imperial Government at this juncture in a spirit of self-sacrifice. At the same time it is the duty of Government to see that subordinate officials are themselves not pressed too hard so as to compel them to exhibit unjustifiable zeal in obtaining contributions. If those who are not in a position to pay are made to do so, that will only land them into indebtedness and the burden will perpetually remind them of the great hardship inflicted upon them, of course, with the best of intentions."

Suggestion that interest on the War Loan should be paid to Muhammadan landowners in the shape of remissions of land revenue.

Islámic Mail (116), Urdu edition, 2nd Apl.

8. Discussing the comparative smallness of the total amount of subscriptions to the Indian War Loan, the Islámic Mail urges each and every inhabitant of India to subscribe towards it according to his or her means, and in view of their religious objection to accepting interest it suggests that Government should arrange to remit land revenue due from Muhammadan landowners to the extent of the interest earned on the loans held by them. It is convinced that the proposed arrangement will lead many Musalmans to participate in the Loan, as they could not possibly be deterred then by any religious scruples.

Appeal to Muhammadans to subscribe to the War Loan out of regard for the interests of the Turks.

Akhbár-e-Islám (50), 4th Apl.

9. In exhorting the Muhammadans to subscribe to the War Loan the Akhbár-e-Islám writes:—In spite of putting up a tough fight the Turks have had to give up important harbours and holy places which fortunately have come into the possession of the British Government who are ever ready to respect the religious susceptibilities of their subjects. The Muhammadans should give a practical shape to their anxiety for saving that fragment of the Turkish Empire that still survives by subscribing to the War Loan and thus strengthening the hands of the British and thereby inducing Turkey to conclude a separate peace with Britain. The rapid progress the British army is making in Turkey will, we believe, make Turkey sue for a separate peace with the Allies and thus save its Kingdom from further disintegration.

Comments on the War Loan Lottery sanctioned by Government.

Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

10. "The conditions of the Lottery are not, in our opinion, at all fair To award three prizes of 10,5 and 2½ lakhs is grossly unjust. It is nothing but a huge gamble from which only three fortunate persons will profit to an enormous extent.......... If a lottery was at all to be sanctioned, it should have been on more sensible and equitable conditions. Government should have looked into the terms with greater care than they seem to have done and we are sorry such a huge [illegible] should have been permitted in which a single person will win 10 lakhs, and lakhs of contributors will meet with absolute disappointment. We must enter our emphatic protest against a lottery being started under such grossly unfair conditions."

Welcome accorded in England to the Indian representatives on the Imperial War Conference.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 7th Apl.

11. The Praja Mitra and Pársi expresses gratification at the welcome given to the Indian representatives on the Imperial Conference in England and the eulogistic speeches made by the Premier and the Secretary of State at a luncheon given to Mr. Chamberlain and the three Indian members of the Imperial Conference, and adds :—We never thought that a Conservative Secretary of State would ever give expression to his feelings in such generous terms and declare that Indians should not be allowed to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. We now feel sure that steps will soon be taken to stimulate industrial progress in India with a view to making it self-supporting and thus conducing to the solidarity of the Empire.

Young India (10), 4th Apl.

12. Commenting on the proceedings of the first meeting of the Imperial War Conference and the treatment accorded to the Indian representatives, Young India remarks :—"The net gain, so far as India is concerned, is that the so-called Indian representatives have been allowed equal rights of speech and formality of vote also with the Dominion representatives. If we remember the exclusive character of the past Imperial Conferences, we may congratulate ourselves on the preliminary success we have gained. It cannot but largely be the result of the strong agitation that followed in the wake of the shabby treatment which the Government of India jointly with the Secretary of State meted out to Indian opinion. We did not expect that the prophecy of the jute bag politician of Calcutta would fulfil itself so soon. After all, by 'shouting loud enough' we have gained an inch where formerly we were unable to obtain half an inch by passing cart-loads of pious resolutions from our solemn conclaves of annual Congresses and Conferences."

Gujaráti (12), 1st Apl.

13. The news regarding the war sittings of the Cabinet recently received are hope-inspiring. The Indian representatives on the Imperial Conference are treated on a footing of equality with the representatives of the Dominions. Each Colony is to be given one vote and the Secretary of State for India will give his vote on behalf of India. We believe he will not give his vote against the wishes of his Indian advisers. The difference lies in this that the representatives of the Colonies are not the nominees of their respective Governments, but the chosen representatives of the people to whom they are responsible. It is clear that the Secretary of State for India, or the nominated representatives of the Government of India, are not similarly responsible to the Indian people. On the other hand, the Secretary of State has declared in Parliament that the Dominion members will not be given any powers to deal with Indian questions, that are not given to the Indian representatives. Again, the freedom of the City of London has been conferred upon the Indian representatives at the Conference along with the Dominion members. All these things are gratifying inasmuch as they tend to show that the Indian representatives are being treated on a footing of equality with the representatives of the Colonies.

Message (5), 31st Mar.

14. "When some time ago, it was stated by Reuter that there was a movement afoot in London to accord a public reception to the oversea delegates to the Imperial War Conference, some doubts were naturally entertained whether the delegates would come in for their proper share of appreciation. The present decision clears away the existing doubts and will be welcomed as an indication of the growing desire of the English people to recognize the magnificent part India has played in this war. This is, we believe, for the first time Indians are being admitted to the freedom of the City of London, and it will, we are sure, have a splendid effect on the imagination of the people."

Comments on General Smut's tribute to Indian troops in East Africa.
Mahrátta (4), 8th Apl.

*15. "General Smuts paid a tribute to Indian troops saying that he had never commanded more loyal or brave men. We are now accustomed to these tributes and expect them from every commander who has Indian troops under his command.......... Will these laurels be remembered when the reconstruction of the Empire is effected after the war? The Indian soldiers and officers who have fought in this War for 'the Freedom of humanity' and have brushed shoulders and enjoyed tete-a-tete with citizens of the Free nations will not return to India unchanged in outlook and ideals. They have seen with their own eyes how clearly is National Freedom loved and adored abroad and they cannot fail to institute a comparison between India and these free countries. They will naturally wish to see India on a high pedestal. When the soldier class of India and the ordinary citizens all desire that their country should occupy a higher place than is her share at the present day, no efforts of interested parties to thwart our aims are likely to suceed. England will be well-advised to grant India the Freedom which in South Africa has borne such healthy fruit......... If England deals fairly by India in the after-war readjustments, she will be acting wisely. For the Indian temperament is fast changing under the pressure of circumstances and England may not count upon easy days in India if her demands are slighted."

The declaration of war by the United States of America.
Bombay Samáchár (53), 6th Apl.; Hindusthán (16), 4th and 6th Apl.; Sánj Vartamán (28), 4th Apl.; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 5th Apl.; Akhbár-e-Islám (50), 6th Apl.

16. The Bombay Samáchár maintains that the speech with which President Wilson recommended to the House of Representatives the declaration of war against Germany will mark a golden page in the annals of the liberty-loving Americans. From this speech the paper infers that America has now awakened in the matter of her responsibility towards humanity. It expresses its joy at the news announcing that the Senate has adopted the resolution for declaring war against Germany. The paper is sanguine that on America joining the Allies the war will end sooner and in a sure defeat of the enemy. [The Hindusthán is of opinion that America's entry into the war will greatly help the Allies. It believes that the great financial help the latter will receive from America will go to remove their apprehensions about their economic situation. The paper remarks that if America had, instead of waiting till her own national self-respect was at stake, declared war against Germany when the latter violated the neutrality of Belgium and if Italy and Roumania had soon followed her example the present war would have come to a close much sooner. In the subsequent issue the paper regards America's present decision as a sure precursor of the Allies' victory. The Sánj Vartamán looks upon America's joining hands with the Allies at the present concluding stage of the war as the surest guarantee of the Allies' victory. It observes that the event has struck the death-knell of Germany. The Jám-e-Jamshed remarks that President Wilson's recommendation to the Congress in favour of rendering the Allies all possible help, pecuniary and otherwise, in the successful prosecution of the war, will evoke great feelings of joy in the Allies' territories. It prays that the Allies may, with the co-operation of America, soon succeed in crushing the arbitrary Prussian militarism. The Akhbár-e-Islám expresses the wish that the present union between America and the Allies may not suffer any hitch. It dwells on the probability of this union, as well as the Russian revolution, compelling Germany, Austria and Turkey to think of soon concluding a peace.]

Comments on England's congratulations to Russia on the Revolution.
Mahrátta (4), 8th Apl.

*17. "Mr. Bonar Law stated in the House of Commons on the 4th instant that two Labour M. P.s were going to visit Russia at the request of the Imperial Government with the object of conveying the congratulations and sympathy of British Labour to its comrades in Russia. There is quite a flood of congratulations pouring from England into Russia. If this flood is to be taken as an indication of England's genuine happiness at seeing the Russians free, how are we to explain British indifference in regard to India's affairs? Does Britain think we are happy and contented without Freedom? Or are successful revolutionary attempts the only passport to British sympathy?......... Before the Russians, there was no question of securing National Independence, because they possesed it already. Before us, similarly, there is no question of winning National Independence, because we have made up our minds to remain within the British Empire. Before us, as before the Russians, the question that has demanded solution has been that of the establishment of popular freedom within the Empire. Russians have solved it as far they are concerned. We have still to solve it. We are on our way to solve it. Will our Government hinder us in our work as the Russian Government hindered regenerative work in Russia? We hope that we shall get active co-operation of our Government in solving our problem. We cannot remain in the mire with peace and contentment. Out of it we must get, whatever the effort may cost.'"

Should the Allies imitate the savagery of the German Armies?

Dnydn Prakdsh (33), 1st Apl.; Mahrdtta* (4), 8th Apl.

18. Commenting on the retirement of the German armies on the Western front, the Dnydn Prakdsh remarks:—The criticisms of the Times of India are usually sober and well-informed. Our contemporary, however, seems to have recently lost its balance of mind inasmuch as it is advocating that the horrors of war cannot be sufficiently brought home to the Germans unless the Allies imitate the savagery of the German armies when they cross into enemy territory. A number of correspondents of the Times have acclaimed the suggestion with a chorus of approval. These worthy people seem however to forget that in spite of the substantial advance that the Allies have made in the West, it is still a far cry to the German frontier. Their vehemence would lead one to suppose that the entry of the Allied army into Germany was only a question of hours! Now, no sane man would attempt to justify the cruelties of the Germans. Their inhumanity in the present war certainly merits condign punishment. That does not, however, mean that the Allies should pay them the compliment of imitation. It is enough, we think, if the Allies exact suitable reparation and make the Germans realise that war is not necessarily a paying game. The avowed object of the Allies is to prevent the recurrence of a similar war in the future. Will that object be achieved by imitating the ways of the enemy? If that be done the Germans will only brood over their sufferings and renew the conflict at a convenient opportunity. We trust, therefore, that all talk of visiting on the Germans the horrors of which they have been guilty will be abandoned. [The Mahrdtta remarks:—"We do believe that 'wholesale devastation of a country by burning and razing towns and villages' is not a sound policy. When the war operations have ceased and formal peace is established, the wantonly devastated villages will cry out to sensitive patriotism to keep up the flame of hate and revenge within the secret chambers of the heart.......... Once the superior strength of the Allies is brought home to the Germans, it is only reasonable to suppose that every village and town of Germans left whole and treated with chivalrous considerateness will be a distinct accession of strength to the Allied 'Cause'—which is a cause of Honour and National and Popular Liberty."]

Rights enjoyed by the Philippinoes compared with those enjoyed by Indians.

Dnydn Prakdsh (33), 1st Apl.

19. Those who regard the scheme of self-government outlined by the Indian National Congress and the Moslem League as impracticable should compare our modest demands made after 150 years of British rule, with the rights enjoyed by the Philippinoes after only 20 years of American occupation. The following items will be found of interest:—(1) We want four-fifths of the members of the Provincial Legislative Councils to be elected by the Indians. In the Philippine Assembly all the members are elected by the people. (2) We claim that in the Executive Councils half the members should be Indians whereas in the Philippines, 5 out of 8 are Philippinoes. (3) We desire that the Indian members of the Executive Councils should be elected by the elected members of the Legislative Councils. In the Philippines a Bill has been introduced to abolish the Philippines Commission and to establish a Senate, all the members of which are to be natives. (4) We ask that each province should have a Governor; in the Philippines all the 38 provinces have Governors, 32 out of these 38 Governors are elected by the people. (5) At present Indians form only 5 or 6 per cent. of the Indian Civil Service. In the Philippines 75 per cent. of similar posts are held by natives. (6) In India we have no control over military expenditure and no one dreams of making England pay for the army maintained in India and a third of the Indian revenue is expended on the army. In the Philippines all the expenditure on the army is borne by America and the Philippinoes are not made to pay anything.

Comments on a book named "The Indian Empire".

Mahrátta (4), 8th April.

*20. "We have before us a small brochure in which opinions of a few Americans are collected together. What is the subject the American opinion on which is sought to be presented to us in a concise form? It is 'The Indian Empire.' And who sends us this 'collection'? It comes to us through the Political Department of the Local Government. It is indeed a most momentous undertaking. It could not possibly have been put off to a later date, Indians are pointing at defects in the present system and demanding Home Rule. The demand is made in insistent terms. It was incumbent, therefore, on our benign Government to go through the trouble of acquainting us with the view which some Americans take of the Indian situation. For are we not bound to respect the 'impartial' vision of third parties? So, we are put in possession of what Colonel Roosevelt said on Jan 18th May 1909, and Rev. Jones (?) wrote in April 1907, etc., etc.......... Mr. Bryan's 'diatribes' against the British in India have not been extracted, but Rev. Jones' condemnation of Mr. Bryan for charging the British people with having done injustice and cruelty to India has found a place in the pamphlet under notice. We wonder if the Government desires the Press to attempt a refutation of the views expressed in the publication they have so generously patronised. We think such an attempt if conscientiously carried out by any publicist will involve him in trouble. Here is no American freedom of the Press. Here we live under the rule of the Press Act and a series of other Acts made for the purpose of 'a successful administration'. The following is the first sentence of the first extract (Col. Roosevelt's opinion):—'In India we encounter the most colossal example history affords of the successful administration by men of European blood of a thickly populated region in another continent.' Successful, forsooth! The American administration of the Philippines has evidently been unsuccessful, for America has chosen to give them responsible Government after a rule of only 18 years. While Britain cannot think of throwing any responsibility on our shoulders even after more than a century of her rule in India! Poor America! She cannot manage the Filippinos—hence her haste in entrusting them with the management of their islands! Successful Britain—she can keep out Indians from any real and substantial share in the governance of their country and hence she has not had to suffer the fate of America! Were America successful in the islands, we should not have heard of any grant to the islanders of responsible Government! Will Col. Roosevelt advance such a view? Between American rule in the Philippines and British rule in India which will he put down as the successful one? Whatever Col. Roosevelt and others whose opinions we have been favoured with may say, we look upon the American rule as successful and the British rule as comparatively a failure.......... We think Government would have been well-advised to resist the temptation of patronising a poor collection of old antiquated expressions of opinion which miss the real point at issue. And who cares what the American says—when our hearts are actually aching? Does that American opinion feed our poor when they are hungry—and how many are half-starved all their lives, lives cut off before their time simply because of want of sufficient food and want of decent sanitary conditions and want of timely medical assistance? Can that 'impartial' opinion console us in our distress caused by our just but unfulfilled aspirations? The whole attempt is futile and we are sorry that our Government has patronised it."

Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.

21. It is difficult to obtain correct information about the influence really exercised by the Home Rule agitation upon Government. Who can know the schemes hatched against the Swardjya movement in Government house or in the dark chambers of the Secretariat? We do not know what progress the anti-Home Rule League of Bombay has made. The non-Brahmins of Madras have started a daily journal against Home Rule. Some Rajas on that side have begun to write articles and deliver speeches. One would feel surprised at first at the new power of speech obtained by these dumb golden parrots. But what cannot Royal grace do? What wonder is there that these Rajas parade as real leaders when Government honour the unfit and invest them with the honour of speaking on behalf of the public? We can imagine what sort of victory would be gained by Government when their forces contain Rajas who have no subjects and learned men who are innocent of education and orators who cannot utter a word and writers who cannot write even a line. But what can Government do? Almost all people have treacherously left them and joined the opposing forces. They tried to rely first on the educated classes, then on Muhammadans and the uneducated. The game of rallying the Moderates was also tried. Now the only forces left on the Government side are the Rajas and Jahagirdars and the ignorant masses. Can it be said that these classes have no grievances of their own? A drowning man catches at a straw, and Government have asked for help from America. We cannot help pitying them for their helpless condition. Before us lies a pamphlet sent to us by the Political Department containing opinions of Americans on the British administration of India. The other side cannot be presented as the sword of Damocles of the Press Act hangs over our head. We do not know whether the ancestors of Roosevelt, Taft and Jones helped the American Revolution against England. But even now have they not indirectly condemned the British Government by granting the Philippinoes, who are far less educated and fit than Indians, a form of Swardjya far higher than that enjoyed by India? The question is not whether the British Government is on the whole good or bad but whether Indians have been rendered fit by British administration for Swardjya or not. We would have welcomed more a comparison by Government between the Philippinoes and Indians. Why was Swardjya granted to them so early and why does not India get it? A discussion of these points also would have been advisable. The opinions of the sixteen Americans are irrelevant. No one asks Government to leave India immediately as is implied by them. If Government have come across any such statement by Home Rulers they should honestly publish it. What is the use of wasting paper and ink in these days of high prices to refute statements which have never been made?

Alleged unjust treatment of India by both the Imperial Government and the Government of India in the matter of post-war reforms.

Young India (10), 4th Apl.

22. "An extraordinary proposal was suddenly sprung upon the House of Commons by one of the M. P.'s—Sir Charles Henry—for the appointment of a Parliamentary Commission to investigate and report upon the policy that might be recommended by the Government of the day (?) in connection with Indian affairs. Mr. Bonar Law with considerable zeal replied that 'as at present advised the Government did not propose to take the course suggested by the Honourable gentleman'. He added, however, that Government was 'carefully' considering the whole subject. His Excellency the Viceroy has also informed the public in this country that the subject of post-war reforms is receiving their sympathetic consideration (pace the expedition with which the Public Services Commission Report is being considered). In this matter, we are at a loss to decide who is to be congratulated the most—whether the Imperial or the Indian Government. It would, we think, be invidious to single out either of these for special praise in connection with its treatment of Indian questions. Perhaps, Mr. Bonar Law did not realise the ludicrousness of the situation when he stated they were carefully considering the whole subject. His Excellency Lord Chelmsford also stated that they had submitted to the Secretary of State a despatch on post-war reforms. But what this despatch contains nobody knows and the Government of India have a by no means strange aversion to take the public into confidence. It is no doubt not agreeable to the people or their representatives that 'the Government of the day' should initiate and carry out plans behind their back and that is the fear which is largely shared among them."

Colonial interference in Indian affairs should not be allowed.

Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.; Sandesh (100), 31st Mar.

23. Mr. Chamberlain replying to an interpellation in the House of Commons condemned strongly the uncalled for interference of the Round-Table group and gave an assurance that in matters purely Indian the Colonies will not be consulted. But judging from the suggestion made by Mr. Asquith that the Colonies should be consulted in the settlement of the Irish question, we doubt how far Mr. Chamberlain would be supported by the Ministers in his liberal attitude. The question now raised with reference to Ireland may be raised tomorow in connection with India. We think that a ministerial declaration is necessary in this connection. We think that men belonging to the 'Round-Table' group must have been quite enraged to see the honours showered upon the Indian representatives in England. But we should not miss the point at issue. India has only one vote in the Imperial War Conference and even when the Secretary of State differs from the Maharaja of Bikáner and Sir S. P. Sinha, his vote will be counted as the vote for India. But we cannot help it in the present circumstances. Let us for the present be satisfied with the progress achieved. [The Sandesh says :—We are glad that Mr. Chamberlain gave an assurance that the Colonies will not be allowed to have a hand in the administration of India. India has been accorded an equal position along with the Colonies not simply because of her help to England in the war. It may be the immediate cause but our fitness is also the real cause for this recognition. Our agitation for equal treatment with the Colonies dates from 1906 and we did not begin the demand in the expectation that the war would occur in 1914. We have relied on our capacity and we have kept up our demand. It is necessary that the Native States that have an existence independent of India should be given separate representation in the Imperial War Conference. The Colonies are represented by elected Ministers whereas British India is represented by the Secretary of State. This defect should be remedied early.]

How the people cannot effectively co-operate with the officials under the present circumstances.

Message (5), 5th Apl.

24. Commenting on one of His Excellency Lord Ronaldshay's speeches at Calcutta in the course of which he said he looked confidently to the people to assist him in realising his ideals, the Message remarks :—" Every new ruler has said the same thing when he entered upon his charge. Not so very long ago, Lord Chelmsford said as much. His Excellency asked for the co-operation of the people. The people might as well ask 'co-operation in what direction and in what manner?' If you really want co-operation, you can have it for the mere asking; but it cannot be lasting or fruitful so long as those of whom co-operation is expected are treated as if they were aliens in their own country and in regard to their own interests. Where merely advice and suggestion are looked for, it is meaningless to pretend, as is generally done in some popular quarters, that their co-operation is sought after......... As for the officials themselves, of course by long usage and custom, they have come to regard themselves in this land as all-knowing, all-powerful and in some cases above law. With some of them it seems a rule of life that laws are more made for the people than for the officials.......... If they are slow to take the people into their confidence, one need not wonder. Sometimes, if they choose, they may condescend to consult the people as to what they would like best, just as parents do sometimes with their children. But are parents bound to follow the wishes of the children? Or if at times they gratify their wishes can it be the result of co-operation? Without pursuing the analogy further, we simply wish to make this point clear that so long as the officials and the people feel towards each other a restrained sense of want of trust and confidence, there can be no co-operation, no effective assistance rendered on either side and the wish itself for co-operation or assistance under such conditions may degenerate into a vague meaningless longing."

Comments on the orders passed against Mr. Krishna Swami Varma of Chingleput (Madras) under the Defence of India Act.

Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.

25. Government are disporting themselves in any way they like under the Defence of India Act. Mr. Krishna Swami Varma of Chingleput (Madras) has been prohibited from speaking on any subject or publishing anything which has not been pre-censored by the District Magistrate. As Government cannot be compelled to publish any particulars that may have led them to pass this absurd order, they are free after they have signed the order. But does any one consider what harm is done by such proceedings to the freedom enjoyed by British subjects which pro-Government people themselves are bruiting about? Has the maintenance of the British Government become so delicate a task that one Krishna Swami's word or speech would upset it? How can Government not see that they are committing the absurdity of using a sword for cutting grass? If any writing is seditious Government have got means enough to deal with it. It is very surprising that Government entertain a desire to do such a manifest injustice. Or what wonder is there? When a mind becomes callous enough to brave the infamy of injustice and foolishness, how can it suppress the tendency to be whimsical while enjoying bureaucratic ease? Sometimes medicine itself becomes food if used abnormally. Such is exactly the case of the Defence of India Act. With the preamble that the order is issued under the Defence Act anything can be said and written. No need to go to the courts of justice, no bother of any evidence and no responsibility of making good any heavy loss if inflicted on the people! The war has blessed the bureaucrats with such an easy instrument, and they are using it at their sweet will.

Alleged dislike of British officers for the Parsis.

Râst Goftâr (27), 1st Apl.

26. In giving away at one stroke a big sum of rupees one lakh and a half for the purchase of sea-planes to provide for the defence of the Bombay harbour Sir Dorab Tata has done an act of which the Parsi community can be proud. Really, this news has very much gladdened our heart as well as the hearts of the community. Though it would be unreasonable to write anything that is unpleasant on such a joyful occasion, yet we feel tempted to ask when Englishmen will begin to appreciate the true worth of the Parsis. To a large section of them the very sight of the Parsis is hateful. When an object has to be accomplished the Parsis are raised to the seventh heaven but when found convenient they are also hurled down from the same height. Englishmen do not like Parsis because the latter are not given to flattery but are men who would call a spade a spade. Government officials do not show the slighest amount of sympathy towards the Parsis both in service and elsewhere. Government derive their Abkari revenue in crores of rupees through the Parsis and yet when helpless men and women from among them are done an injustice there is no one to listen to their complaint or redress their grievances. Is it a wonder if the hearts of the people get estranged as a result of such conduct on the part of Government? We regret that we have to write thus at a time like the present but if we do not make Government acquainted with what we complain about in private and in our clubs they would either take us to be fools or would persuade themselves to believe that we are satisfied with everything that they do.

The Western India Turf Club should also contribute to Indian charities.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 1st Apl.

27. Remarking that 70 per cent. of the income derived by the Western India Turf Club from horse-racing comes from the pockets of the Indian public, the Kaiser-i-Hind expresses its belief that the Club will cause great satisfaction among the Indians if it will extend its sphere of liberality and contribute a portion of the money it annually contributes in support of the War Relief Fund and some English charitable organisations, towards helping institutions like the Victoria School for the Blind and the Maternity Homes started in furtherence of the Lady Willingdon Scheme and in support of the Sheppard After Care Fund, which are being maintained for the benefit of the Indian community generally. It maintains that if the Turf Club is at all disposed to practise real charity instead of allowing itself to be influenced by narrow and communal considerations it would do well if it were to include within the scope of its liberality public institutions benefiting the community from which it derives the bulk of its huge annual income.

Government's duty in the matter of controlling wakf properties.
Islámic Mail (3), 1st Apl., Eng. cols.

28. " So far as the Muhammedans of Bombay are concerned there can be no matter of greater concern to them than the management of their Wakfs.......... It is no exaggeration to say that nowhere Wakfs are more mismanaged than here and the pity is that our benevolent Government which exercises a beneficent reforming influence in all matters of public good is sorely indifferent to the Wakf question. The authorities cannot be unaware of the cruel—nay criminal—way in which the Wakfs are diverted from their charitable purposes. We could go on counting instances in which the trustees have misappropriated the funds and mortgaged the Wakf properties for their personal use. We have been told of a revered and respectable trustee in Surat, who has mortgaged and encumbered Wakf trusts and is making the Wakfs a source of his living. We hear of trustees who utilise Wakf for their profligacy and have endowed Wakf properties on their mistresses. We know of trustees who utilise Wakf funds for satisfying their own whims and caprices. Government have provided some safeguards against their mismanagement and the Law Courts are authorised to take cognisance of such cases; but we have never heard of any such case ever coming before the Court and at least so far as our province is concerned any law that may be there to prevent mismanagement of Wakf amounts to a dead letter.......... 'The wakf is an endowment' says Kazi Ayaz—the greatest of our theologians—'meant for the benefit of the public and is administered by certain trustees over whom the State keeps supervision in order that they may not divert it from the purpose for which it is intended.' We have advisedly substituted the word 'State' for the Ecclesiastical Department which occurs in the original text because there is no Ecclesiastical Department for the settlement of Muhammadan questions and they are decided by British Courts of Law. It would, therefore, appear that Government have the power of supervision over the Wakfs in order that they may not be used for purposes other than those for which they have been made. Unfortunately Government—and particularly the Government of Bombay—have never used their prerogative in this respect or the Muhammadan progress would not have been retarded here for want of funds.......... Government appear to be obsessed by the belief that they cannot interfere with the administration of the Wakfs, and they are right. But they are empowered by theological rulings to check their maladministration and Governments in other Provinces are doing so. [The paper then goes on to quote from an issue of the Mysore Blue Book Quarterly an account of the action taken by the Madras Government in this matter, in the course of which occurs the following passage:—] 'The Government (of Madras) consider that, before the question of legislation is considered, an attempt should be made to utilize the provisions of existing law. They agree with the Board of Revenue that the first measure to be taken is the preparation of a complete list of charitable endowments (excluding religious endowments). Lists should be compiled for each district and published for general information. When a complete list of charitable endowments has been prepared, it will be for the Board to see that such lists are kept up to date, that trustees of such endowments keep regular accounts and that steps are taken to remove those who fail to do so. The Government observe that, under the existing law, it is not possible to appoint non-officials as local agents. Local advisory committees might, however, as recommended by the Board, be formed without statutory powers; their function would be to report on the management of endowments and to suggest appropriate action to the Collector of the district.' [The paper then continues :—] Now we should like to know why such a step cannot be taken here. It is believed that Government are waiting for the action of the Government of India who appointed a Committee to investigate the problem and were contemplating legislation based on the recommendations of that commmittee when the war broke out and it had to be postponed. But there can be no harm in taking some such action as has been taken in Madras. The existing law gives them ample powers for the correction of abuses and there is no reason why an attempt should not be made, as has been done in Madras, of utilising the provisions of the existing law."

Comments on His Excellency the Viceroy's reply to the Ladies' deputation regarding indentured labour.

Young India (10), 4th Apl.

29. "One of the most remarkable incidents of modern times in India is the Indian Ladies' Deputation which waited on His Excellency the Viceroy last week. This is the first time in the history of British Rule in India that women—more particularly Indian women—have approached the Viceroy. It is pleasing to note that Lord Chelmsford apparently appreciated this action on the part of the Indian ladies. The treatment which he accorded to the Deputation was thoroughly courteous and dignified, and the reply though not very happily conceived is far from disappointing.......... Though he was brief in his reply, he thought 'it was difficult to conceive that a traffic of this sort once ended can be revived'. We trust His Excellency would kindly enter into the feelings of the nation and see that no more tinkering is permitted with this abominable system. The system must go at all costs and risks and it behoves Lord Chelmsford, as the head of the Government of this country, to place himself at the head of the anti-Indentured Emigration army and lead it on to victory."

Gujaráti (12), 1st Apl.

30. It is reassuring to note that the Ladies' Deputation to the Viceroy has received a very hopeful reply in contrast to the sentiments put in his mouth by his official advisers some time back in the Imperial Legislative Council to the effect that the unequal numbers of indentured men and women would best be remedied by sending out more women. His Excellency has given three promises: that the system of indentured labour once stopped will not be revived; that industries will be encouraged in India so that the labourers will be induced to stay in their own country for earning their livelihood; and that labourers will not be allowed to emigrate unless Government are satisfied that the conditions under which they go out are different from those prevailing under the indenture system. Now that His Excellency the Viceroy has invited the co-operation of the women of India, why should they not urge the Government to spread the light of education in every nook and corner of India? For His Excellency's reply shows how closely the honour of our women is connected with the economic condition of the country. Our commerce and industry must be developed and for this development it is necessary to have more education and better sanitation.

The proceedings of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Gujaráti (12), 1st Apl.

31. In a review of the proceedings of the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Gujaráti refers to the discussion in the Council about the working of the Press Act and dwells upon the necessity of disclosing the general tone of the books proscribed under the Act and of showing how they were politically harmful. While expressing its satisfaction at the acceptance by Government of the resolution for giving an impetus to the Boy Scouts movement, the paper does not regard the policy of rejecting about 75 per cent. of the resolutions brought by the elected members of the Council as calculated to encourage those who aspire to take part in the administration of the country. It is also dissatisfied with the Viceroy's explanation in connection with the making of the war gift of a hundred million to England on behalf of India without previously consulting the Council and observes that the previous resolutions in the Council, laying before His Majesty's feet the entire resources of India do not justify a transgression of the principles and laws governing the constitution of the country. It then goes on to refer to Government securing the services of Mr. Sadler, an English expert educationist, in connection with the reforms to be brought about in the Calcutta University and points to the desirability of employing the services of one who is acquainted with the wishes and the capacity of the people. Alluding to Mr. Lloyd George's recent observation in which he declared that India's services in the war bade fair to bring about a better understanding among the different nations of the British Empire, the paper maintains that the Indians have become desirous of knowing in what direction their political advancement lies. It also expresses its surprise at the reticence observed by the Premier, when congratulating the people of Russia on their liberation, as to England's future policy towards India in the direction of national freedom.

Sind Journal (8), 29th Mar.

32. "The speech of His Excellency the Viceroy in closing the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council bristles with many important statements though it leaves much to be desired having regard to the legitimate aspirations of Indians. The most gratifying feature of His Excellency's speech was his frank statement with regard to the abolition of indentured labour. [Here follows a quotation from the speech.] The whole country will rejoice at these hope-inspiring words. Any doubt that was lingering about the scope of the prohibition and its ultimate result has been dispelled by the above statement of the Viceroy. The death-knell of the hateful system of indentured labour has now been sounded and it is earnestly hoped that any substitute which might perpetuate its horrors without its name would not be devised for securing cheap labour to the Crown Colonies concerned.......... The Viceroy's explanation as to the manner of India's gift of one hundred millions sterling to the British Government is not quite convincing.......... We fail to see why the Council should not have been consulted about the amount and the nature of the gift to the British Government. That would have given the gift the unmistakable character of spontaneity."

Dnyán Prakásh (33), 30th Mar.

33. We are occasionally reminded by high officials not to embarrass Government by discussing reform problems at a time when the Empire is in the throes of a life-and-death struggle. Such discussion, we are told, is likely to result in the dissipation of energy which ought to be concentrated on winning this war. We are glad to note that the non-official members made it clear during the debate on the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council that they did not share this view. The war has not prevented the peoples of Europe from devoting their attention to reforms in the affairs of their respective countries. The Russian autocracy was swept out of existence in the midst of a great war and a popular government established in its place which has been hailed with satisfaction in England by everyone from the Premier down to the man in the street. Why should then the authorities in India show signs of uneasiness when we formulate and discuss our own demands? We do not wish of course to bring about any revolutionary changes. Educated India is only anxious that the question of reforms should not be unnecessarily deferred until the war is over. We expect our rulers to give us an assurance that the ultimate object of British Rule in India is to confer self-government on Indians within a reasonable number of years.

Comments on the proceedings of the last meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council.

Indian Social Reformer (2), 8th Apl.

*34. "Rambler" writes to the Indian Social Reformer:—"We cannot congratulate the Government of Bombay on the decorum of the manners or the wisdom of the methods they exhibited at the last session of the Legislative Council. They seemed to have been too much obsessed by a sense of the value of their own time above everything else. There was more than one reference to the waste of the time of the Council when none of the non-official members had any complaint to make on this score, and when the mere presence at the meeting of some of the busiest men in the country to whom every minute spent there during usual business hours was extremely valuable in money as well as otherwise, and who yet were there out of a sense of patriotic duty, might have given members of Government some pause. And who after all was really responsible for the waste of time if any? No one but Government themselves. Take, for instance, the Honourable Mr. Paranjpye's question about the Principal of the Dhárwár College having to be a 'European' member of the educational service. Government make a mistake in the language of their Press Note in the first instance; when Mr. Paranjpye submits his question to the department as usual no one cares to offer any explanation; and yet when the question actually comes on before the Council the Honourable Mr. Chaubal complains that if Mr. Paranjpye had consulted him outside the Council he could have learnt the facts and the Council would have been saved his speech and the time it had taken to deal with the resolution. Let us take another and a more flagrant case. The Honourable Mr. Patel's various resolutions seem to have made His Excellency the Governor particularly uneasy, and led him to make some thoroughly unjustifiable remarks."

Comments on the discussion in Parliament over the increase in the import duty on cotton goods.

Sind Advocate (7), 22nd Mar.

35. Commenting upon the discussion in Parliament over the question of the increase in the import duty on cotton goods, the Sind Advocate writes:—"The ministers in England are firm, but they evidently have too much regard for the wishes of Lancashire. They are sweetly appealing to the patriotism of Lancashire not to raise an unpleasant issue at this time and taking their stand not on justice but on grounds of political expediency which will end with the war. This is hardly fair and Indians who see their economic interest thus already threatened may be pardoned if inspite of exhortations to cease from controversial questions, they discuss their questions of the counterveiling duties with the view to perpetuating the justice so tardily done by the Financial Minister of India to the interest of indigenous cotton industries. The time will come when India will insist on still more justice being done to all her industries, by protection Tariffs, by bounties, and by State initiative and State patronage. While this is done, India is merely doomed in the rear of modern economic competition; for all countries, which have it in their power to do so are advancing their own industries by conferring special advantages on them."

Young India (10), 4th Apl.

36. In the course of a lengthy article on the subject of the increase in the import duty on cotton goods, the discussion over it in the House of Commons and Mr. Asquith's suggestion that it should be reconsidered after the war, "V. R." writes:—"We are not disposed to raise at this moment inconvenient issues to which Government cannot give a satisfactory answer. But we think we are entitled to the same fair treatment from Government which it expects from us and that it will not do any thing that is likely to provoke strong feeling or resentment. We are perfectly willing that this question of Tariffs is left for final determination at the close of the war. But we should be extremely reticent to do so, unless following in the wake of other Governments within the Empire our own Government will give us a guarantee that in every eventuality the Indian side of the question will be fully borne in mind and when the opportune moment comes we shall be allowed to regulate our tariffs according to our special 'social needs and experiences'. In asking for such an assurance we feel we are fully within our rights. When the war is over, we shall be faced with a great issue. It does not seem improbable from the unqualified acceptance of Mr. Asquith's addendum and what has since transpired that when such a time comes, the selfishness of the Lancashire mill-owners and the interests of party politicians will reassert themselves and they would move heaven and earth to regain for Lancashire its privileged position which it has been temporarily forced to evacuate.......... Will the leaders of the textile industry wake themselves up from their habitual lethargy and enter the lists against the interests of Lancashire resolved to fight the battle to a finish?"

Comments on Lord Ronaldshay's replies to addresses of welcome.

Young India (10), 4th Apl.

37. Young India criticises the attitude taken up by Lord Ronaldshay against adverse criticism in his reply to one of the addresses of welcome presented to him and remarks:—"It is, we think, a bad beginning for any Governor to make, however gifted he may be. Lord Ronaldshay seems to be labouring under the idea that his critics are all a set of wrong-headed people, who have failed to do him justice in committing him to his written and spoken word. The second point about his official utterances is his reference to anarchy in Bengal. He is neither the first, nor we think, the last to deplore the presence of this cancer in the body politic of Bengal. In any effort he may make to rid the body politic of this malignant growth, we hope he will take care to see that he will not resort to a wrong remedy. The temptation would be too great, no doubt, to resist and it requires extraordinary skill and patience even more than what Lord Carmichael could display. If Lord Ronaldshay is sincerely anxious to adopt the right measures he will do well to remember, before he has irrevocably committed himself to any course, that he has within his reach the most potential remedy and that is taking the people into his confidence. For, after all, it is they who are affected by the unrestricted activities of the anarchist. It is their property, their lives which are at stake and you cannot do better than enlist their enthusiasm and confidence on your side in any attempt to eradicate the evils of anarchism. This is what Bengalees are asking for, what the whole of Indian public opinion is asking for and so long as the people who are more interested in maintaining peace over their land are not allowed to do so, we do not say it is impossible but it would be very much uphill work for Government to shoulder alone."

Rást Goftár (27), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

38. "It would be unfair to prejudge a man's work from what he might have gathered haphazard during excursion tours, and still more so rendered in writing. Attention has been drawn by some critics to stray passages in his books which His Excellency might fain have omitted had it ever occurred to him that he would some day find himself confronted with the solving of some of those very problems which he treated superficially in his books. There is, nevertheless, not much data to warrant the presumption that His Excellency would not bring a free and fair mind in the discharge of his duties, and the Province must take him at his word when on his arrival he has assured them of his sympathy and good will for the people whom he is appointed to govern."

Comments on the appointment of Mr. J. G. Covernton as Director of Public Instruction, Bombay.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

39. "The appointment of Mr. J. G. Covernton as Director of Public Instruction in Bombay will be welcomed by all who had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Covernton who is not a figure unknown to Bombay. As a professor he was known to be very sympathetic and his lectures had always been heard with pleasure.......... We are confident his tact and readiness which helped to distinguish him in Burma will not fail him in Bombay. During his regime in Burma he has created a record unique enough for a D. P. I. Bombay is perhaps a more difficult soil to work upon. We welcome Mr. Covernton and wish him success in his new but arduous duties."

Suggestions for reduction of expenditure in the Public Works Department.

Mahrátta (5), 8th Apl.

40. A correspondent writes to the Mahrátta:—"Now that all offices Courts and Departments in all districts have been provided with suitable buildings for their accommodation, there is no necessity to erect new buildings, and the duties of Executive Engineers are naturally narrowed down to the supervision of repairs to public buildings and Imperial and Provincial roads that traverse their charges. It may therefore be asked with reason if there is now any necessity for an Executive Engineer for every district in this Presidency. .... As far as I know standard plans exist for Collector's, Mamledar's and Mahalkari's Katcheries, for Judges, Subordinate's and Munshi's Courts, for Police Lines and officer's quarters, for Hospitals and Dispensaries, for schools of all descriptions and in fact for every description of buildings that form the complement of a district. If a necessity arise for a new building the Engineer has simply to take a copy of the standard plan or to adapt one by additions and alterations to suit special requirements. Under these conditions, the designing part of the Engineer's duty is gone, and very little scope is left for the exercise of skill and ingenuity on his part. He is now reduced to the position of an overseer of the repairs. This work can safely be entrusted, without detriment to the public interest, to Assistant Engineers or to officials of the higher grades of the upper subordinate service. I therefore venture to suggest that districts in this Presidency should be made into groups according to the extent of supervision required and to the peculiar nature of the country and an Engineer placed in charge of each group. Reduction can also be made in the number of Assistant Engineers and Upper Subordinates, because railways, motors and bicycles afford many facilities for fast locomotion rendering the work of supervision very easy without affecting efficiency.......... Reduction in the number of Executive Engineers, Assistant Engineers and Uppers Subordinates will bring to the fore the question of the superintending Engineers. There are at present as many as three Superintending Engineers for the Presidency. It is believed that one Chief Engineer will be sufficient to exercise efficient supervision over the whole Presidency (excepting Sind). .... Native agency should as far as possible be utilized. This will materially reduce the cost of the Department. Their capacity to do good work cannot be questioned."

Comments on the suggestions made by Mr. Wood, Principal of the Roorkee College, before the P. W. D. Committee.
Message (5), 4th Apl.

41. "In his evidence before the P. W. D.—Public Waste Department?—Committee which is now sitting at Allahabad, Mr. Wood, the Principal of the Roorkee College, deprecated the haphazard recruitment of specialists from England. Mr. Wood was of opinion, as many others who are aware of the circumstances are, that ordinary Civil Engineers could specialise and be trained in India. This admission, emanating from the head of an admittedly premier professional institution in the country, is of considerable importance at this moment, when certain interested people are sedulously attempting to instil into the minds of the authorities that no specialist who had not received the hall-mark of Cooper's Hill or some other English institution was of any value. Mr. Wood suggested that the Roorkee College should be open to the whole of India. We welcome the suggestion, and we would add a rider that the 'class' feeling which is said to exist in this institution should be done away with. The lowering of the age-limit from 21 to 19 would go some way in minimising the difficulties which face some intellingent young men at present. It would be interesting to learn what recommendations the P. W. D. Committee is going to make. We shall not be disappointed if the Committee's findings will be as narrow and exclusive in character as those of the Public Service Commission. We are constrained to make this observation because the Committee is presided over by no less a personage than Mr. Sly of the Central Provinces Commission and those who have marked Mr. Sly's mind in the Commission's report and the various minutes to which that amiable gentleman has subscribed will readily know the reason why."

Necessity of changing the constitution of the Abkári Committees.
Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.

42. In accordance with a resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. Kamat, the Bombay Government have decided to establish Abkári Committees in all the Talukas of East Khándesh District. They have, however, assigned various strange reasons for not starting the committees in other districts. In the Kaira Distric committees have been negatived because facilities for illicit distillation exist and they have been refused in the Kárwár District because it is sparsely populated. The Panch Maháls have been denied the committees because the population there is very backward. It would have been better if Government had said that they saw no necessity of establishing the committees instead of taking the trouble of finding out all these diverse reasons. If the present constitution and methods of work of the committees are to be continued it matters not whether they are established or not. It is more important to change the constitution of the committees already existing, to have a majority of non-officials and to accept all the suggestions made by them. Replying to the Honourable Mr. Belvi Government have said that the version given of a meeting of the Poona Abkari Committee in our issue of 30th January 1917 was not correct. But Government should have stated the correct facts. We have again ascertained the facts which are as follows:—Exclusive of the President there were three members. Messrs. Apte and Lawate suggested the reduction of liquorshops, the former one and the latter three. The President said that he would consider about the abolition of the liquorshop or he would convert it into a beer shop or allow liquor of inferior strength to be sold therein. Neither of these three things has been done as yet. Both Mr. Apte and Mr. Lawate suggested that the closing hour should be 8 P.M. but nothing was decided on this point. They also suggested that an experiment of one or two beer shops in place of existing liquor shops selling liquor of 30° U.P. may be tried, but the Committee decided that in addition to the existing shops beer shops should be opened. We do not think that this detailed account will better enlighten our readers about the work of the Committee than our former summary. We request the authorities to say whether the above account is correct. Suggestions made by two members of the three present are rejected and the suggestions made by the President are put down as decisions of the committee! In these circumstances who will not say that it matters not whether these committees exist or not?

Comments on the decision in the Bombay Chronicle Libel appeal case.

Message (5), 31st Mar.

43. "The 'Chronicle' Libel case appeal has ended in the reversal of his Lordship Justice Macleod's judgment and the news will, we have no doubt, be received by the 'Indian' newspapers at least with great deal of satisfaction. If Justice Macleod's view had prevailed, it would have dealt a severe blow at the little liberty that is still left to the newspaper press in this country.......... However much one may sympathise with Mr. Surajamal B. Metha, the fact cannot be overlooked that the journalist in this country labours under manifold disadvantages. In his self-imposed duty of protecting the interests of the community he has often to criticise men and measures alike and the criticism itself will often be determined by the circumstances of each case. If therefore every one who feels aggrieved were to rush to court, there would be no end to it and the journalist would find the business pretty hot work to be dancing attendance upon the courts every now and then. The law has recognised the difficulties of his task and has wisely offered him sufficient protection against harassment.......... If Mr. Macleod had taken a more liberal view of a journalist's responsibilities we think much of the needless worry and expense incidental to a protracted litigation would have been saved to both sides. We are glad, however, to see that fairness has at last prevailed and we congratulate his Lordship the Chief Justice on his judgment and Justice Heaton in accepting the view put forward by Mr. Setalvad and supported by the Chief Justice."

Necessity of an inquiry into enforced prostitution of women in Bombay.

Hindusthán (16), 6th Apl.; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 6th Apl.; Sánj Vartamán (28), 6th Apl.; * Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

44. Referring to the horrifying state of things disclosed in the recent Bombay High Court Sessions case in which a Pathan and a woman accomplice of his were awarded capital punishment for doing to death one of the prostitutes in a brothel owned by the Pathan, the Hindusthán expresses its belief that there exists in Bombay an organised system of enforced prostitution. It dwells upon the necessity of taking measures for putting a stop to the cruelties and oppression that have come to be associated with such a life of moral depravity and remarks that the police should exercise greater care and vigilance than at present in putting a stop to such a state of things. The paper seems inclined to endorse the belief entertained in some quarters that not only the continuance of such a regular system of moral iniquity but the fact of its assuming such serious proportions is to be ascribed to the police winking at it. It, therefore, hopes that the Bombay Government will take prompt and effective measures to remedy the evil. It suggests that a committee should be appointed to investigate the whole question and make recommendations that might go to the root of the evil. [The Jám-e-Jamshed remarks that the case has proved the necessity of keeping a stricter watch than at present on brothels and houses of ill fame. The paper observes that the public will remain anxious to know what steps Government and the police propose to take in this matter. The Sánj Vartamán remarks that Pathans and women of low repute maintain in Bombay many dens of enforced immorality of the kind that has been brought to light in the above-mentioned case. Are Government, the police and the people, inquires the paper, properly discharging their duties in tolerating the continuance of such a state of things in Bombay? It suggests the formation of a Vigilance Committee composed of Europeans and Indians to rescue helpless women who might have, against their will, fallen victims to the keepers of brothels. The paper also asks Government forthwith to issue orders to the police to make proper inquiries and bring to book persons of the type of the Pathan and his accomplice. The Gujaráti writes:—"The subject does not admit of public discussion of a detailed character. But there can be no doubt that the distressing details of the present case have demonstrated the urgent necessity of a full enquiry into the immoral traffic carried on in Bombay and the conditions of life led by the unfortunate slaves kept by inhuman scoundrels.......... We suggest that a mixed Committee of officials and non-officials be appointed to inquire into the whole question and report their conclusions after examining experienced houseowners and police officers, the keepers of brothels and their victims. The inquiry should be private, but thorough and exhaustive.......... The present state of things is the blackest stigma upon the fair reputation of this city and the public ought not to sit quiet until it is removed and Bombay is rid of infamous and fiendish ruffians who thrive on female helplessness and on the incredible wrongs, miseries and cruelties inflicted by them on their wretched victims."]

Complaint about frequent thefts in the suburbs of Bombay.
Bombay Samáchár (53), 2nd Apl.

45. We hope the Police Commissioner of Bombay will enquire into the frequent reports of thefts in Malad, Santa Cruz and other suburbs of Bombay and take steps to put an end to the menace to which the unprotected people in the localities are subjected by the budmashes. Thefts have become so very frequent in these suburbs that it has become impossible for people to stay outside Bombay. According to reports reaching us people are some times roused from their sleep by the reports of revolver shots. Thieves and other budmashes are greatly assisted in their nefarious trade by the absence of adequate lighting arrangements in the suburbs.

Comments on the system of issuing return tickets only to Hajis.
Islámic Mail (3), 1st Apl., Eng. cols.

46. "Now that the return ticket system introduced by Messrs. Turner Morrison and Company for Mecca pilgrims has worked for nearly a couple of years it is time to judge of its merits and demerits in the light of experience gained during the two years of its operation. We have protested strongly against the system but we have an open mind and are perfectly willing to make a large concession in its favour. There is no doubt that to a great extent it has reduced the number of paupers who used to beg and roam in the streets of Jeddah and were brought back at Government expense. Also it has in some way checked the influx of indigent pilgrims who used to flock to Bombay content with the idea that a low rate of passage will take them over to the holy land and once there they would leave it to circumstances or to Government to bring them back. But it has at the same time fulfilled the fears that were entertained at its start. More than a hundred return coupons were not accounted for and looking to the unsettled conditions in Arabia where scarcity or famine is scaring away the people to other countries it does not appear likely that their holders stayed away there. It is more than probable that the coupons were lost as were many which were brought to the notice of the authorities. Again the chief advantage of the return ticket system was said to be a regular and punctual sailing. But we find that this was not so and many pilgrims on coming to Jeddah did not find any ship to bring them back. They were told to wait for some length of time with the result that to escape starvation they sold their return coupons. Even in the matter of refunds things have not gone on as smoothly as was expected. In one or two cases where Messrs. Turner Morrison and Company have agreed to a refund they have made it payable after two years. We had a talk with some of the Hajis and they said that they were very much disappointed in the matter of return tickets. They used to get very cheap rates on their return voyage, the fare sometimes going down to Rs. 15 but now they must pay Rs. 125 at the start, which has scared away many intending pilgrims. The simple Muhammadans from Eastern Bengal and Malabar do not know anything about the world and often lose their tickets even at the Wharfs. They lose them more frequently in Arabia in the hurly burly of the Hadj ceremony and come back in a miserable condition to Jeddah to find no passage. It is however useless to cry over this. We ought to be indebted to Messrs. Turner Morrison and Company for their liberality in taking up this by no means lucrative traffic. The one way of doing away with all trouble is to have a Muhammadan company and we do not know if any active attention has been paid to it so far."

Alleged high-handedness of the Commissioner in Sind.
Message (5), 5th Apl.

47. "Onlooker" writing to the Message says:—"Mr. Lawrence, I.C.S., the present Commissioner in Sind, is rather a strong bureaucrat who does what he chooses without erring too much on the side of respecting public feeling on any of the questions involved. For instance, his unfair way of levying income tax on even the poorest shoe-maker, barber and hawker in the city of Karáchi and the towns of Hyderabad and Sukkur, though so greatly resented by people of all classes in Sind, found no remedy even in the Bombay Legislative Council. Another activity of the Honourable Commissioner seems of late to have been to follow the policy of 'Divide et Impera,' 'Divide and Rule,' in the Municipalities of Sind. To favour Muhammadans, to postpone elections on their account in order to increase the number of Muhammadan voters by hook or by crook, even at the displeasure of impartial leaders of both Hindus and Muhammadans, seems to us neither just nor fair. But yet another movement of this Commissioner that is just on foot is to officialise Municipalities in Sind. We know how the Hyderabad Municipality was degraded and suspended. And now the Commissioner, I hear, proposes the same thing to the Sukkur and Shikárpur Municipalities—nay, he wants to force upon them Government officials nominated by himself to act as the Chief Officers of those towns. He says that it has been found by him that suitable and powerful persons are not appointed to these responsible posts—persons who should domineer like him over their subordinates. This, he says, is due to the fact that Municipal Councillors in whose hands the appointment lies, are at the back of the subordinates and so the Chief Officers thus appointed are afraid of being in the bad books of the Councillors. He would, therefore, wish to choose the officers himself, who should rule over their subordinates and even the Councillors with an iron hand."

Claims of Muhammadans to the post of Public Prosecutor in Sind.
Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 6th Apl.

48. In the course of a communication contributed to the Praja Mitra and Pársi, "Momin" supports the demand made by the Sind Muhammadan Association for the appointment of a Muhammadan to the post of Public Prosecutor in Sind which is shortly going to fall vacant on account of the present incumbent, Mr. Raymond, being transferred to the post of Additional Judicial Commissioner. He maintains that there are many Muhammadan barristers and pleaders in Sind who can acquit themselves creditably in the post of Public Prosecutor and regrets that not a single Muhammadan should have hitherto been thought fit to fill that post.

LEGISLATION.

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Patel's two Bills regarding free and compulsory education in Municipalities.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 5th Apl.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (26), 6th Apl.; Sánj Vartamán (28), 31st Mar.

49. The Bombay Samáchár hopes that the Bill drafted by the Honourable Mr. Patel for authorising Municipalities to make primary education for boys compulsory within their respective jurisdictions will be welcomed by the Bombay Legislative Council and wishes that it may receive support from a sympathetic Governor like Lord Willingdon. It regards the Bill as a very modest measure and desires the Honourable members to lend their support to it, though they may differ on points of detail, in order to indicate their approval of the principle it involves. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi hopes that the Government of Lord Willingdon will open a new era in the progress of the country's education by passing the Honourable Mr. Patel's Bill. It, however, does not approve of clause (3) of section 54 D, under which the parent or guardian of a boy is required to declare in writing his inability to pay any fee that might be levied, as such an obligation would involve considerations of self-respect, and it advises Mr. Patel to drop this clause from the Bill. The Sánj Vartamán appeals to His Excellency the Governor, on behalf of the public, to allow the Honourable Mr. Patel to bring before the local Legislative Council his two Bills regarding compulsory primary education and thus give the people of the districts and the citizens of Bombay the opportunity to express their opinion on the subject. It strongly advocates the introduction of free and compulsory primary education in every town and village of India and remarks that the apprehension entertained by Government that such an educational policy might lead to public riots and tend to make the British administration unpopular is not well founded. Referring to the Bill which seeks to empower District Municipalities to make education for boys compulsory the paper hopes that the Government will accept it inasmuch as it does not place any pecuniary burden upon them and is also in other respects a harmless measure.]

EDUCATION.

Comments on the Government of India's Resolution about encouraging the Boy Scout movement among Indian boys.

Message (5), 5th Apl.

50. "When the Honourable Sir Sankaran Nair, on behalf of his Government, accepted Mr. Sarma's resolution urging the desirability of encouraging the Boy Scout movement among Indian boys, we were led to think that they had overcome the mistrust and suspicion of the Indian youths. The circular letter regarding this matter, which has just been issued by the Education Department, unfortunately conveys the impression that the Government have their own doubts about the movement, and are on second thoughts inclined to go back in certain respects on the promise of encouragement which was implied by their acceptance of the resolution. It appears to us that in spite of their liberal professions of sympathy for the movement, the Government are no more enthusiastic to encourage the scout movement among Indian boys than they are to encourage Volunteering among the Indians."

Bombay Samáchár (53), 7th Apl.; Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.; Mahrátta* (4), 8th Apl.

51. When the Honourable Sir Shankaran Nair accepted on behalf of Government the resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. Sarma on the question of encouraging the Boy Scouts movement in India in the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council all the doubts existing in the minds of the people as to the attitude of Government towards the question were completely removed. We, therefore, welcome the circular letter and hope that steps will be taken at an early date to form corps of Indian Boy Scouts everywhere and that the movement will not be confined to a few approved schools only. In the beginning it might be found necessary to engage only Europeans as Scout-masters, but Government would do well to train Indians as Scout masters so that Indian boys may derive the greatest possible benefit from the movement. [The Gujaráti writes:—"If private educational institutions start such a movement under indifferent management and faulty organisation, local Governments have been asked to call upon the managers to dissolve the troop or withdraw the boys from it on pain of forfeiting their grants-in-aid and scholarship rights, or their students being declared unfit for Government service. We are afraid these instructions to the local authorities are of a drastic character and the growth of the movement in private institutions will be considerably hampred thereby. The local administrations will be even more stringent than is really warranted by the instructions which are exacting enough already and the movement is likely to be confined mostly to a few Government high schools in the larger cities.......... In Ceylon the movements has proved a success and there is no reason why it should not be an equal success in India, if it is fostered and encouraged by the local governments in a really sympathetic spirit and not treated from the very outset in a spirit of suspicion and distrust." The Mahrátta remarks:—"The working of the general directions is not unlikely to be faulty. Whatever the future, we would ask energetic gentlemen inside and outside schools to make sincere efforts to organise boy scout troops in every town of any size. We learn from New India 'that Mr. G. S. Arundale's efforts in this direction have borne good fruit and the Indian boy-scout troop started under his initiation has made good progress'. We hope that our presidency will not remain lethargic in this matter.' The many volunteers that offer themselves for Paisa Fund work and other work of national usefulness will, if organised and trained in accordance with the boy-scout system, be immensely more useful than at present to their society and their nation."]

Comments on the appointment of Mr. C. H. Setalwad as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University.
Rást Goftár (27), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

*52. "The appointment of Mr. C. H. Setalwad as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University is one more proof of the solicitude of the present Government to give to higher education within the Presidency, the benefit of the experience of an expert educationist.......... Mr. Setalwad is a powerful combatant in debate and not of the stuff to truckle to official opinion when the same does not strictly coincide with his own. We congratulate all the more His Excellency Lord Willingdon for his selection which bespeaks confidence in non-official endeavours for the promotion of higher education and a larger measure of freedom for the University. The appointment of Mr. Setalwad would be acclaimed with universal satisfaction in the Presidency."

MUNICIPALITIES.

Appeal to the Municipal Commissioner to allow the work of constructing a mosque in Grant Road, Bombay, to be proceeded with.
Mufid-e-Rozgár (117), 1st Apl.

53. The Mufid-e-Rozgár reports that the Municipal Commissioner of Bombay paid a visit to the mosque under construction in the Muhammadan cemetery situated in the north-western portion of Corner of Grant Road, Bombay. It states that the plan of the mosque as sanctioned by the Municipal Corporation has not yet been received by those responsible for its building, and that Mr. Monie ordered that building opetrations should cease. It adds that an application has been made to Mr. Monie to allow the operations to recommence, and concludes by hoping that he will be pleased to order that the building of the mosque may be proceeded with without delay.

Reflections on the mismanagement in the Bandra (Thána) municipality.
Mahrátta* (4), 8th Apl.; Kesari (92), 3rd Apl.

54. The Mahrátta gives a short account of mismanagement in the Bandra (Thána) municipality and concludes:—"This is the story of Bandra abuses. The principal lesson that Government needs to draw from this story is that the people must be invested with real powers in the management of their affairs. For even if it be brought home to certain councillors that they did not take due interest in local affairs, they have a good reason to fall back upon as the explanation of their meagre interest, viz., the fact that they possessed little real power. Lord Ripon recognised the necessity of placing such power into the hands of 'non-official members' if local self-government was to be a success.......... The feeling of real responsibility goes with the possession of real power and so does real interest in local affairs go with it. These things are really not difficult to grasp. We refuse to believe that the successors of Lord Ripon did not understand it. But even to this day we have all over the country official-ridden Local Boards and Municipalities by the hundred. Where is the explanation? Is it to be sought in the secret (?) resolve of our Government—the bureaucracy—to impede with all means at its disposal the progress of the people in the art of self-government? But there is a wise dictum to the effect that he only flies in the face of history who ignores the fact that no people ever stop or ever hesitate in the middle of the road once they begin to struggle for their liberty. Our rulers should ponder over this and frame their programme with this principle in their full view. We do not think that if they act in this way, an obstructionist and illiberal programme will commend itself to them. For such tactics can only serve to make the struggle between the rulers and the ruled bitter and violent. They cannot help the authorities in keeping the rights from the people for ever and ever." [Kesari writes:—Just as Government do not recognize the utility of a non-official however qualified he may be, they do not admit the inefficiency of an official however unfit he may be. The Bandra municipality was being utterly mismanaged under an official President. Had the President been a non-official one Government would have long ago suspended the municipality. Can we find any statement in Government records that the work of any official President was found to be inefficient? Government have all along behaved themselves as if God himself had made only Indians and non-officials inefficient. If the angle of vision is to be really changed it should be changed in this respect.]

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Duty of England to raise the status of India to secure its assistance in the war.

Chitramaya Jagat (85 and 56), Marathi and Gujarati editions for Jan. and Feb.

1. Mr. Mahadev Rajaram Bodas, M.A., LL.B., in the course of a very lengthy article in the Chitramaya Jagat, writes:—At the beginning of 1916 Lord Hardinge told us that though we may have swarájya as the ultimate goal we cannot get it just now. But His Excellency Lord Chelmsford now says at Calcutta that he hopes some day to see India reach that goal, i.e., during his régime as Viceroy. Nobody credits Lord Chelmsford with greater magnanimity than Lord Hardinge, but this change in view is due to the times. England once felt confident that she would be able to crush Germany with the help of the Dominions, but that hope proved futile and Mr. Lloyd George had to come forward to save the Empire from ruin. It was seen that England could not come out victorious without India's help and that the days of securing its assistance by force being now past, it was to be gained by inviting India's representatives to England and by means of humble supplications. England wants men and money from India as well as from the Colonies, but the latter have got their own domestic difficulties to solve and they are not so foolish as to make the sacrifice disregardful of those difficulties. They are openly asking for a hand in the management of the Empire in return for assisting in a war in declaring which they were not consulted, and the demand has been indirectly conceded to a certain extent. But England and her Colonies are bound to each other by ties of blood while India has no such tie with England. Therefore, even English statesmen do not suppose that Indians can be very keen in the matter of upholding the prestige of the British Empire. If a master falls ill, his servants do not feel as keenly for him as do the members of his family. India is England's 'dependency' that is, something like a servant, and its duty is simply to obey England. India has up to this time well discharged its duty as a servant. But the question is worth consideration if a servant is bound to obey if the master proceeds to completely rob him or asks him to sacrifice his life. India has, as a matter of fact, nothing to do with the war in Europe. She has no concern with the fate of Belgium or Servia. And yet she has sent up two lakhs of her army and spent millions of money out of regard for the British Empire, and is prepared to make further sacrifices. But the time has now come to fearlessly tell our British rulers that we shall give the necessary further assistance to the Empire only if our dignity is maintained and our demands are granted. Some ultra-loyalists maintain that it is not proper to make these demands while the Empire is in difficulties. But England herself did not get the Magna Charta without methods of obstruction, and the history of Canada, South Africa and Ireland tells a similar tale. What wrong is there, therefore, if India follows the example? The relations of England and India are those of master and servant. England has given India the gifts of peace, education and material civilization, and in return for that has taken away countless money from this country. It has defended India from foreign invasion, to increase the prestige of its own Empire. Had there been any other master in place of England, he would have done the same. The master has fed the servant who in return has given his faithful service to the master. There is not much room for sentiments of gratitude or benevolent intentions in this matter. So long as England is not prepared to set India on a higher level than that of a dependency, how will Indians take pride in the Empire? Why should Indians sacrifice their lives for the Empire so long as the Arms Act makes invidious racial distinctions? We know to what extent a master who is always kicking his servants is loved by them. Are we to suppose that Indians are not men and do not possess human sentiments? But they are so very patient that pocketing all insults, they have remained loyal in the midst of the difficulties of the Empire. They will remain loyal and assist the Empire only so long as they think that their elevation is dependent on their remaining under its protection. It is to the interest of the Imperial Government to strengthen this sentiment by giving further rights to Indians and by raising their status, and that is the sum and substance of the united demands of the Congress and the Moslem League. But the Congress scheme of reforms is still a mere scrap of paper. It will be invested with life only when the Congress leaders come to possess strength that will compel British statesmen to accede to the scheme and that will take place only when Indians become prepared to sacrifice their all for it. The outspoken and courageous utterances of India's leaders at the Lucknow Congress have given a valuable lead to the younger generation in carrying on the Home Rule agitation. To insist upon the grant of equality for Indians if England wants our aid in the war should be the first step in the campaign and we would be rank fools if we did not take advantage of the present opportunity when England will have to bear almost the whole brunt of the war single-handed with India's aid. [The Gujarati edition of the Chitramaya Jagat publishes a Gujarati version of the article.]

Comments on a brochure, containing views of distinguished Americans on the Indian administration, said to be circulated by the Government.

Hindusthán (16), 10th Apl.

2. While acknowledging with gratitude the receipt of a book entitled "Some American opinions on the Indian Empire", the Hindusthán remarks that it cannot be positively known as to who could have sent it beyond drawing the inference, from the Government envelope in which it was sent and which bore a service postal stamp, that it must have been sent by Government. The paper does not regard many of those whose opinions have been collected in the booklet as "impartial critics," which they are declared to be in the preface. The paper then observes:—At some places statements are made which are as novel as they are false. For instance, while describing the mutual relations between the Brahmins and the British officers, Admiral Goodrich has said: 'How can the British officers be friendly with the Brahmins who regard them as unclean persons whose touch means pollution, who cannot dine with them, who believe that their (the white men's) wives and daughters are void of all sense of shame, who describe them (Europeans) in words which cannot bear reproduction, who cannot welcome them in their homes and who cannot allow their polluting sight to fall upon the female members of their family?' We do not deny the superstitions and the narrow tendencies of the Brahmin class, yet how very exaggerated are the sentiments contained in the above statements! In some of the opinions it is declared that the educated classes (in India) clamour for swarájya and independence, not for the benefit of the ignorant villagers but for acquiring power for themselves so that they might be able to tyrannise over others. And these are the opinions of "impartial critics"! If we are correct in our belief that this brochure has been published with a view to demonstrate the advantages of the British rule and thereby to refute some bitter American critics of the British administration in India, we should say that the selection of opinions is not wise. It would have been better if the opinions of some Indians on the subject had been collected. If the object of publishing this pamphlet is to create a favourable impression upon the Indians with regard to the British rule we would say that the attempt is futile, because the Indians have been for years past enjoying the benefits arising from that rule and, therefore, they can very well appreciate those benefits. Indian writers can descant upon greater benefits than what have been referred to in these American opinions, and that too without indulging in any exaggeration. In spite of the defects that exist in the British administration we are not oblivious of its advantages, and it is therefore that even while making demands for Swarájya or Home Rule we emphatically proclaim the necessity of the permanence of the British connection. India's unshakable and deep devotion towards the British Empire has been proved to demonstration since the outbreak of the war and that is a fact which cannot be gainsaid. Under these circumstances, by sending such opinions to us, do Government intend that we should not complain, should not disclose defects in the administration and should keep silent, because these eminent Americans have given excellent opinions which show that our grievances are groundless? We will humbly and respectfully say that any such intention, be it ever so remote, is not right. New desires have at present sprung up in India, a new enthusiasm has come into existence and it is the supreme duty of Government to cherish this enthusiasm and direct it into a proper channel.

We hope that Government will, instead of making futile endeavours in sending books like the present, occupy themselves with more substantial pursuits and will exert themselves to make India a partner of proud Britain by bringing about her advancement.

Comments on the administration of the country by the Indian Civil Service.

Message (5), 12th Apl.

3. "While the English bureaucracy became in course of time a beneficial institution in the Government of England, in India it tended towards retardation, and retrogression, so familiar in the history of autocratic countries. The powerful and permanent bureaucracy which has become an important feature in the English system of Government was kept within its bounds by certain limitations exercised from without, particularly owing to its being brought into continual contact with Parliamentary life and Parliamentary criticism.......... Whereas, in India, even under the present system of interpellations in the councils, not one of these causes operates to keep the "Machine" in check or impose any restraint on its arbitrary doings. By long usage, it has come to occupy a position of superiority over the nation, whose servant the Civil Service in reality is. The last word to-day on any public question lies with the Indian official opinion, with the Civil Service, so that neither the Secretary of State nor the Viceroy nor the Provincial Governors, however powerful they may be, can feel competent to force any measure against the united opposition of the bureaucracy.......... In this respect, the Russian bureaucracy offers a close parallel to ours. During the time of Peter the Great, circumstances rendered it essential for the creation of a machine which would restore efficiency to the administration and conduce towards the good Government of the people. And Peter the Great lived to exercise his effective control over the machine he created. The Russian bureaucracy might have been, for all it is worth, a useful body like its English prototype. But the Tsars who succeeded Peter the Great were men of ordinary capacity lacking both the superhuman energy and will power which characterized their great forbear. The consequence was that the bureaucracy acquired what amounted in practice to absolute irresponsibility.......... What is the case in India? 'Here the Administration is the Government and nothing else particularly matters.' But that Government is the Civil Service. The Secretary of State may lay down the large lines of Indian policy. He may even supervise, suggest and sometimes initiate. A powerful Secretary of State may even make his influence felt at the Secretariats of Simla and Delhi, as Lord Morley did to a certain extent. But in reality the last word, as Mr. Fisher says, lies with the bureaucracy. It has got in its hands the task of administering India and it can nullify the effect of the most benevolent measures.......... Of course, in recent years, efforts have been made to break down the reactionary character of the Machine. But what are these efforts? These, it seems to us, are like the ineffectual waves breaking against rocks that will not yield.......... It is this feeling of helplessness and disappointment which has engendered the deep discontent with the present system of Government. Indians are demanding for this reason that the civil service be largely modified, that the people do have a larger share in its personnel and that they be given a form of representative Government which would 'control the bureaucratic Machine.' On the other hand, what does the Public Service Commission propose? It will make the civil service more and more exclusive and leave intact the power of determining the issues in its hands."

Complaint against the prevention of Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal from attending the Sind Provincial Conferance.

Message (5), 10th Apl.; Sandesh (100), 10th Apl.

4. "Our Sind correspondent writes of the keen disappointment that was caused by the action of the authorities in expressing strong objection to the attendance of Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal at the Sind Conference. To say nothing of the disappointment to the conference and the delegates many of whom had come specially to hear him, we strongly protest against the eleventh hour action of the Sind authorities. If the authorities did not like the presence of Mr. Pal at Shikarpur, well they might. But decency [illegible] that the least possible inconvenience is caused to the public thereby. It cannot be presumed that until the last moment the officials were unaware of the invitation of the conference to Mr. Pal. If they objected to his presence they ought to have informed the organizers of the conference accordingly, so that they might ask Mr. Pal not to start from Calcutta. On the other hand, they sleep over the matter and wake up when it is too late to discover that the presence of this, that or any other man is objectionable to them. Whether their objections are valid or not, consider the humility (sic) that actions such as these inflict on the people of the Province. In all good conscience, do the officials believe that galling and obtrusive interference with the peaceful currents of public life tends to promote good feeling and encourage co-operation for which His Excellency the Viceroy pleaded the other day in the Imperial Council?" [The Sándesh also expresses its dissatisfaction and adds:—Who invited Mr. Pal for the Conference? If it was the Reception committee that invited him then the point must be cleared up as to who asked him not to come to Shikarpur after he had already travelled all the way down to Bombay. Was it the Reception committee or somebody else acting on his own authority? This incident unpleasantly calls to mind what took place at Amroati in connection with Mrs. Besant on the occasion of the Berar Conference. If the local authorities did not like the advent of Mr. Pal, they had the authority to prevent him from going there. But instead of doing so they seem to have privately brought to bear their pressure upon the local leaders. But why blame the authorities? Why should the Sind leaders have yielded to the solicitations of the authorities? It was ablsolutely unbecoming to act in such a way towards an invited guest. Such cowardice would never bring success to the Home Rule agitation.]

Mahrátta (4), 15th Apl.

5. "Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal was invited to attend the Sind Provincial Conference held at Shikárpur. On the 7th instant he received a wire from the Conference authorities to the effect that Bombay Government objected to his presence at the Conference. So the Conference passed off quietly! We cannot commend the spirit either of the Government or of the Conference authorities. We want more grit in our leaders and more sanity in our Governments."

Reflections on the alleged shadowing of distinguished Indian politicians by the C. I. D.

Young India (10), 11th Apl.

6. "Barring until the other day, the land of the defunct Tsar of Russia, India is so far the only country where distinction has its penalties. It is a matter of common knowledge that the late Mr. Gokhale was himself the subject of the benevolent attentions of the C. I. D. and his Servants of India Society Members, whose work had been highly spoken of by distinguished officials, were shadowed in an outrageously offensive manner.......... In our local legislature, when the question was raised by the Honourable Mr. Parekh, the member in charge—the Honourable Mr. Curtis—laconically remarked that 'the movements of His Excellency the Governor were also shadowed by the police and the Honourable members must after all remember that they were distinguished persons.' Apart from the extreme facetiousness of the remark, Mr. Curtis seems to be lacking in a sense of proportion. If to be pursued and pestered by the over-manned and over-officered C. I. D., is a sign of distinction,—a sign of greatness,—it is but a thin veil which separates the Honourable Mr. Wacha, Mr. Parekh and the rest of them from the criminal and the anarchist. We hope Mr. Curtis did not mean what his words expressed."

Appeal to Government to legislate for the segregation of brothels.

Rást Goftár (27), 15th Apl., Eng. cols.

7. In the course of its comments on the case in connection with the murder of a prostitute, recently tried in the Bombay High Court Sessions, the Rást Goftár remarks:—"We refer to the impunity with which disreputable women are allowed to establish themselves without let or hindrance in any locality in which they may wish to carry on their nefarious trade. Possibly the same condition exists in other towns of the Presidency besides Bombay; and a law is needed to segregate these houses and locate them out of the reach of respectable quarters in all such cities.......... An eyesore more repellent than the houses of obscenity which line some of the principal thoroughfares of Bombay cannot well be imagined.......... As it is, there is no respectable locality or house in Bombay which is secure from the menace, so long as it is possible for any woman of bad fame to plant herself wherever she chooses. The residents of Girgaum bestirred themselves some years ago for the removal of such houses from their locality; but nothing, to our knowledge, resulted out of the movement. It is the duty of the Government, as the guardian of public morality, to step in to the rescue of the residents of this and other cities within the Presidency, with such practical measures of relief as are imperative: and we trust that they will undertake without any loss of time such legislation as may be required to remove an unquestionable and long-standing evil."

Praja Mitra and Parsi (25), 12th Apl., Eng. cols.

8. "In the first place, in the interests of public morals and decency, it is essential to take measures to strictly circumscribe infamous localities. At present they are irregularly scattered over different quarters of the city, in close proximity to respectable areas. We believe the suggestion has often been made to relegate all these houses of ill-fame to the outskirts of the city, remote from business and residential localities. But neither the Municipality nor the Police have thought fit so far to act upon the suggestion. As a result, brothels contiune to spread and thrive in localities where they are perfect eyesores and nuisances to all decent-minded people. Well-known and indispensable thorough-fares, like Falkland Road, Foras Road and Duncan Road, are lined by strings of prostitutes' houses.. .... The next important fact forced upon our attention by the sessions case, is the part played by Pathans in the slave-market of Bombay. The principal accused in this case was a Pathan, the keeper of the brothel. We are afraid there are many persons of his caste plying this nefarious trade in Bombay. For various reasons, we consider this circumstance a very grave danger to society.......... We do not know if there are any regulations controlling the immigration into British India of wild tribesmen from across the frontier. But it is abundantly clear from the riots, robberies, murders and other crimes of violence, which are frequently reported in various parts of the country, that some of these fierce foreigners are by no means desirable customers. They are a standing menace to the peace of the streets even in the Presidency towns........... If there is a slave market in Bombay run by Pathans, it is easy to imagine how helpless women may be inveigled or forced into the prostitute's profession, by these ruffianly money-lenders.......... Apart from their internecine brawls which often distrurb the streets of peaceful Indian towns, it is believed that they come in handy for being employed as hired bravos and assassins. If it is now brought home to the public that many of them also run public brothels, where the inmates are practically slaves for whom it is death to seek liberation, it is clear that very stern and stringent measures are needed to deal with this peril. We suggest that there should be some sort of vagrancy legislation in force to deal with the Pathans."

Suggestion for starting experimental Panchayats in the Bombay Presidency before framing a Panchayat Bill.

Kesari (92), 10th Apl.

9. Referring to the success of the Panchayat system in Dewas and Cochin States the Kesari says that it is to be recommended not only because of its usefulness but because it will bring home to the people their administrative responsibility. It further remarks:—The Bombay Government have under consideration the Panchayat Bill but we do not know how long it will remain in embryo. Madras has about 235 panchayats but they have not yet been endowed with powers. Is it not desirable to have experimental panchayats of the above type in our Presidency also before preparing a Bill concerning them?

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's speech at the banquet given by the British Empire Producers' Association.

Kesari (92), 10th Apl.

10. Mr. Chamberlain speaking at a dinner given by the British Empire Producers' Association said that Indians can no longer remain hewers of wood and drawers of water and that they should be given opportunities to rise according to their capacity. We are much obliged to Mr. Chamberlain for thus frankly stating the position we hitherto occupied in the Empire. Uptil now we wasted our breath in talking big about equal rights and in grumbling about our not being treated on a footing of equality by the Colonials, but all this was of no use as there are very few philosophical men in the world who would give hewers of wood an equality of position with their own children. But just as the real value of a faithful servant is appreciated when dacoits attack a village, British statesmen have now come to recognize the true merits of India. But who can guarantee that this feeling born of distress will last after the danger is over? But now England cannot do without the assistance of India. England has had bitter experience of the danger of having to depend on foreign countries for food-stuffs and munitions and now there is an agitation set afoot to make the Empire a self-sufficing one. If the Empire wishes to produce everything it needs within itself, it must turn to India which is blessed by nature in every way. But nature does not give away its gifts spontaneously to mere hewers of wood. It is, therefore, an axiomatic truth that it would not be proper to let Indians remain hewers of wood any longer, and that is what Mr. Chamberlain said in his speech. We have, however, to watch and see when and how these hewers of wood will be transformed into the rightful masters.

Protest against suggestion of British manufacturers for restricting hours of labour for juvenile and female operatives in India.
Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 11th Apl.

11. The Jám-e-Jamshed is of opinion that the suggestion recently made in Parliament for restricting the hours of labour for juvenile and female operatives in India was dictated by the selfish motive of not allowing India to reap the fruits of the recent increase in the import duty on foreign piece-goods. It asks the authorities in England to give careful consideration to the question of the special labour conditions obtaining in India before taking steps that might prove injurious to Indian trade. It hopes England will not be influenced by selfish Manchester to take any step during the present war that might give rise to controversy.

Comments on the proceedings of the annual general meeting of the Millowners' Association.
Message (5), 12th Apl.

12. "At the general meeting of the Millowners' Association, His Excellency Lord Willingdon made a very sympathetic speech. After expressing his delight to be present at the meeting, His Excellency referred to the crowded incidents of the past year. They were four, according to His Excellency; 'the great successes in Mesopotamia, the continuous progress of the Allied armies in France, the dramatic events in Russia and finally the entry of America with all her financial and material power on the side of the Allies.' These are no doubt incidents worth remembering, but they do not by any means exhaust the catalogue. His Excellency, perhaps for obvious reasons, omitted to mention the most stirring events at our own doors: The accomplishment of the Hindu-Moslem Unity; the drafting of the joint Post War Reform scheme; the rapid growth of the Home Rule for India movement and the publication of the Public Service Commission Report; and above all the ban placed against political leaders by various Governments including his own. These are, if anything, more intelligible incidents to which, along with others, one would have expected his Excellency to refer. It might be contended that it was a meeting of the mill-owners' association which His Excellency addressed, where these things cannot find a place. But such a contention would be untenable in view of the fact that His Excellency Lord Willingdon approvingly mentioned 'the dramatic events in Russia' as one of the crowded incidents of past years."

Sanj Vartamán (28), 11th Apl.; Bombay Samachár (53), 13th Apl.; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 12th Apl.

13. The Sanj Vartamán endorses the protest made by Mr. N. B. Saklatwalla at the recent annual meeting of the Bombay Millowners' Association against the embargo placed on the importation of Indian yarn into the United Kingdom and agrees with him that the measure has been dictated by the bug-bear of Indian competition and that it has nipped in the bud India's incepient trade in coarse yarn with the United Kingdom. It expresses hope that the Government of India will enlighten the authorities in England as to the public opinion in India on the question and make a recommendation to them to remove the restriction. [The Bombay Samachár writes in a similar strain laying special stress on the argument advanced by Mr. Saklatwalla that the reason alleged for the measure, of freights being required for important war goods, cannot stand when it is taken into consideration that a large quantity of cotton was freely allowed to be exported for trade purposes not only to the United Kingdom but to other parts of Europe. It expresses a hope that in course of time the public and Government of Great Britain will be more attracted to study Indian questions with impartial minds and so will not be influenced by the selfish considerations of any influential commercial circles to allow them to reap advantage at the expense of India. The Jám-e-Jamshed, along with the other papers noted above, asks the Millowners to follow the advice tendered to them by His Excellency and provide sanitary dwellings for their operatives.]

The proposed one rupee currency note.
Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl.

14. Those who advocate the issue of one rupee currency notes for India on the basis that notes of such small denominations are in vogue in the Straits Settlements, France and other places, forget the difference between the time when they were introduced in those countries and the present time when their issue in India is being advocated. If such one rupee notes had been issued in India also in time of peace there was nothing to be said against them; but at the present times it is a matter of first importance for Government to preserve their financial prestige. One rupee is a very small sum and it is surprising to the people that a note should be issued for a sum like sixteen annas. Ordinarily, people in the villages talk about there being only ten annas' worth of silver in the rupee and it is a matter fit for consideration whether these people will be willing to accept a piece of paper instead of a rupee in exchange for their goods. Even uptil now the story is in circulation among the people about the currency of leather coins introduced in the régime of Muhammad Taghlaq, called the mad, and it is not desirable that a similar thing should take place at the present time. Through ignorance people believe the British Government to be an alien Government and some still ask of what avail these currency notes would be if the present Government should cease to exist. These impatient people, however, cannot even conceive this much that they cannot defend even themselves without Government. But little has been done to impress upon the minds of such people, for the purpose of securing their confidence, that the British administration is, in effect, an Indian administration, is an administration carried on by the Indians for the benefit of the Indians, that currency matters are dealt with in conformity with Indian opinion and that those who decide such matters are not alien but Indian officers. It is, therefore, our belief that a great deal of thought should be bestowed upon the subject before embarking upon the enterprise of issuing the proposed one rupee notes.

Protest against the abolition of Modi in official correspondence.
Prakásh (99), 4th Apl.; Bákul (81), 25th Mar.

15. Precisely at the time when people are agitating for encouragement for the study of Marathi, Government have banished Modi from official correspondence for the convenience of a few of their officials, and to the inconvenience of the people at large. Why should not these officials be asked to take a little more trouble and learn to read Modi? Our own people sometimes experience considerable difficulty in deciphering the hand-writing of some of these officers. But they being the rulers are not much concerned with our difficulties. We request Government to abandon their present high-handed policy and restore the use of Modi in official correspondence. [Bákul makes a similar protest.]

The Kipling Memorial tablet should not have been erected at the cost of public money.
Mahrátta* (4), 15th Apl.; Message (5), 7th Apl.

16. "Recently a tablet was placed at the office of the Civil and Military Gazette to commemorate Mr. Kipling's connection with the Punjáb. Mr. Kipling is notorious for his contempt of 'natives'. But these 'natives' have been made to pay for the honour done to their hater. The tablet erected to Mr. Kipling's memory was erected at the cost of public funds; and this while War-economy is being boomed. Strange are the ways of Kipling's kinsmen that 'Providence' has appointed to rule over the natives of India!" [The Message remarks:—"If every tag-rag and bob-tail of the Anglo-Indian or rather the anti-Indian party were to be dubbed "great" and tablets erected to their memory, both living and the dead, at public expense, the Treasury will have first to be emptied and secondly additional new buildings raised wherein to place the tablets."]

The War Loan.

Islamic Mail (3), 8th Apl., Eng. edition; (116), 9th Apl., Urdu edition.

17. The Islamic Mail expresses its sense of gratification at the lead which the Bombay Presidency is giving in the matter of subscribing the largest amount of any province in India towards the Indian War Loan. It ascribes this success to the personal popularity of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay among all classes of the people and to the well-thought out schemes for enlightening and canvassing the public. It holds that many men are ignorant of the terms of the loan, or indeed of the fact that a loan has been at all issued by Government. It attempts to prove that the war loan would be quoted at a premium after the termination of the war and that therefore it is more profitable than landed property. It adumbrates a scheme for the remission of land revenue, to the extent of the interest earned by subscribers to the loan, in favour of those Muhammadan Zemindars who object to accepting 'sood' (interest). Finally it urges Goverment to bestow titles on those who subscribe generously to the loan, declaring that Seth Surupchand deserves a baronetcy. [In its Urdu edition the paper writes very much to the same effect and ascribes the great success of the Loan in Bombay to the happy relations subsisting between His Excellency the Governor and all officers of Government on the one hand and the people on the other. It commends the system of establishing War Loan Committees in every ward of Bombay and holds that the man in the street requires to be enlightened as much as possible on the subject.]

Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 13th Apl.

18. Referring to the new Indian War Loan, the Gujaráti dwells upon the desirability on the part of the Indian people of subscribing to it as much as possible, as in that case it will be the Indians themselves who will annually receive the interest on the sum so subscribed. It also refers to the advantage accruing to India, from an economic point of view, of a large portion of that sum which will be spent by Government in India itself in paying for labour and incurring other war expenditure in India on behalf of England. Expatiating on the probable effects of the loan on the commerce and industry in India, the paper observes that the floating of this loan will increase the general rate of interest in the country, which, in its turn, will raise the prices of commodities and will also make labour dearer. The net result, opines the paper, will be high prices all round. [Dwelling upon the necessity on the part of India of not again becoming heavily indebted to England from whose former obligations she has freed herself during the present war, the Praja Mitra and Pársi remarks in connection with the India's war gift to England of £100 million, as follows:—It has been so arranged that India should be considered indebted to England in the amount that will remain outstanding after deducting from £100 million the amount subscribed towards the Indian War Loan and also after deducting the war expenses the Indian Government will incur in India on behalf of England, and that India should repay that debt with interest at the rate of 5 to 5½ per cent. within the period fixed for the repayment of the British War Loan. Clearly then, India will be thus heavily burdened with the payment of this interest over and above the principal amount in which she will stand indebted and for these she will get no return whatever. We will, therefore, urge that India should take up the whole amount of £100 million so that she might be spared the payment of a large sum in the shape of interest and the sum advanced may in course of time return to India in the form of payments towards the Sinking Fund. Exchange will thereby greatly improve in favour of India and England will, along with other big States, feel compelled to adopt a bimetallic currency and that will result in increasing the facilities for the development of Indian trade and commerce.]

Comments on the Government sanction to the Western India Turf Club War Loan Lottery.

Young India (10), 11th Apl.

19. Mr. Kanji Dwarkadas writes to Young India:—"All serious minded people must keenly regret that His Excellency Lord Willingdon should have given his consent to the Western India Turf Club to run the War Loan Lottery......... Laudable as the object of the promoters of the lottery is, viz., to help the Victory Loan, the means adopted for achieving it appear to me to be of a questionable nature. Speaking last Monday at the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, Sir William Meyer deprecated Mr. M. N. Hogg's suggestion for popularising the loans by means of the premier bonds.......... If that was the view he took of the premier bonds, how much worse should it be of a downright system of gambling? Sir William observed that they 'occasionally winked at a gamble by others'. But in the present instance, His Excellency Lord Willingdon has outstepped all the known limits of prudence in giving the sanction of the Government to the Western India Turf Club for organising the lottery. I know that Lord Willingdon in his anxiety to see that the Presidency did not suffer on this occasion by falling behind in the War Loan race, has allowed his enthusiasm to outrun his discretion. The lottery is nothing short of catering to the gambling instincts of the people and I regret very much that His Excellency Lord Willingdon should have lent all the weight of his authority to excite those instincts to the highest pitch. If the sanction of the higher authorities can so easily be obtained in support of an admittedly vicious principle, the day must be far off when we shall be rid of the fruitful source of evil which has wrought and has been working dire misfortune on all those who have succumbed to its temptations." [Elsewhere the paper comments as follows on the above letter:—"The writer has very properly taken exception to the sanction which Government has given to the Western India Turf Club for running it. One has nothing to say about the object of the lottery. The principle involved remains however the same in this as in any other case of legalised gambling, as for example on the Turf. If the Government had merely connived or 'winked' at it, to borrow a phrase from Sir William Meyer's speech, it would have served the object in view equally well and would not have exposed His Excellency Lord Willingdon and his Government to criticism."]

Pressure should not be brought to bear on the people to purchase the War Loan.
Kesari (92), 10th Apl.

20. The Kesari, while expressing its satisfaction that Bombay is taking the lead in subscribing to the War Loan, says:—We have received some letters from the mofussil stating that people are tyrannised over or rather very much pressed to subscribe to the War Loan. We do not think it desirable to publish them but we hope the authorities will take care to stop such things if they are occurring anywhere. No one need be pressed to do a thing that is profitable. Villagers cannot subscribe largely to the War Loan but such of the agriculturists as have cash with them should purchase Postal Cash Certificates instead of wasting their money on other things.

Complaint of forcible recruitment in the Kolhápur State.
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 11th Apl.

21. One Rama Raghu Magdum, an inhabitant of Sidherli in Kagal (Kolhápur), writes to the Dnyán Prakásh that his nephew Govinda Krishna Magdum while on his way to the temple at Nrisinhawadi was forcibly taken away by recruiters on the 7th instant. The correspondent adds that he has not yet been released nor does he know his present whereabouts.

Whom does Sir James Meston represent at the Imperial War Conference?
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 13th Apl.

22. Although it is very gratifying to note that the Indian representatives at the War Conference have met with a splendid reception in England, we must not forget that they are only the advisers of the Secretary of State and will have to take their cue from him. Of the three representatives we can understand the selection of Sir S. P. Sinha and the Maharaja of Bikanir. The selection of Sir James Meston, however, is a mystery to us. We hear it suggested that he represents the Indian Civil Service. If that is so, the appointment is not only improper but positively unjust. In spite of the very great utility of the Indian Civil Service, it is unfair to recognise its special position in the scheme of the Empire. Our people cannot protest against such a claim too emphatically.

Declaration of war between the United States of America and Germany.

Hindusthán (16), 9th Apl.; Sánj Vartamán (28), 9th Apl.

23. Will the entry of America into the war bring it to an early termination? It is difficult to answer the question. It rests more on the resources of the enemy than our own. We went into raptures when Italy joined the war. The entry of Roumania in the fray raised expectations in our minds that the Balkan tangle would soon be solved; but German strategy has cleft poor Roumania in twain. So far the entry of other nations has increased the responsibilities of the Allies. America is the only country that is in a position to help the Allies with munitions, if not with men, and its participation in the war will prove a source of help to the Allies in that direction. Nor does America expect that its entry into the war will forthwith compel Germany to sue for peace. In the House of Representatives some members remarked that the war would be protracted for years to come and we thus see that America has joined the war with the consciousness that it will be protracted. The Allies are also taking measures to meet the possibility of a protracted war. Let us see how long Germany will be able to make a stand. The war will not come to an early close unless a revolution takes place in Germany like the one that has transpired in Russia or some unexpected and extraordinary circumstances arise. Suffice it to say that the Allies and the Americans are facing the situation with the consciousness that the war will continue to be waged in the coming year. [The Sanj Vartamán writes:—Though the entry of America into the war may not have any immediate effect, America will surely be able to render incalculable help to the Allies in the matter of munitions, food-stuffs and money. Its navy and army will also be helpful to the Allies. But America will help the Allies most by its unlimiled wealth and resources.]

Islámic Mail (3), 8th Apl., Eng. edition.

24. "So America, the apostle of freedom and liberty, has joined the Allies in their noble efforts to destroy the greatest menace to liberty and freedom, thereby endorsing the justice and righteousness of the British cause. The effect of this would be that the whole world would stand arrayed against the enemy of civilization and human freedom. The decision of America has been hailed with jubilation in the Allied countries, who more than the active support which America can give appreciate the endorsement of the ethical and moral principles for which we are fighting. We are told that though the vast potentialities of American aid to the Allies are appreciated, the uppermost feeling produced by Dr. Wilson's speech is one of deep emotion at the moral endorsement of the Allies' cause in a noble and moving utterance which like the voice of humanity has awakened the conscience of the world to realism, namely, fight between systems of Government, not quarrel between peoples."

Kesari (92), 10th Apl.

25. The Kesari welcomes President Wilson's message to the Congress declaring war against Germany and says:—Everywhere the democratic form of Government is highly in favour and the autocratic and bureaucratic system has to bend low before it. As soon as the Russian revolution began to reverberate in Prussia the Kaiser had to declare that after the war all would have equal rights. Prussia was stated to be the most illiberal Government in all Europe but it appears that there will be a desirable change in it after the war. If the enemies of England, the Germans, are to obtain freedom as a result of the war, why should not India which is under the suzerainty of England get it?

Comments on the King's Message to the Imperial War Conference.

Islámic Mail (3), 8th Apl., Eng. edition.

26. "No one who is not an Asiatic can understand the ties of love and devotion which bind an Easterner to his Sovereign. These ties are considerably strengthened by gracious acknowledgments and marks of appreciation from the King; and the King Emperor's message to the War Conference in which His Majesty has expressed his pleasure that India is represented for the first time in the Council Board, cannot but evoke feelings of heartfelt gratitude and devotion for him all over India. For the first time India is assigned a position of trust and responsibility in the Councils of the Empire and she is fully cognisant of the great honour.......... A petulant officer or a short-sighted newspaper may belittle her services but those who control our destinies fully recognise them and, what is more, appreciate them. The Premier's message read by the Viceroy at the close of the Delhi Session of the Imperial Legislative Council is full of this appreciation and the King's message is couched in most sympathetic terms. Lord Ronaldshay has assured us that the British public are no more indifferent to our affairs. They appreciate our loyal devotion and have begun to take a lively interest in our affairs. Let us hope that the 'the last penny which would win the war' would go from India and justify her claim to be the brightest jewel in the British Crown."

Danger of the indentured coolie system being revived in another form.
Message (5), 11th Apl.

27. "Mr. Chamberlain told the House of Commons the other day that the Viceroy had informed him of his and the Government of India's wish that 'the indentured system of recruitment of labour for the Colonies should not be resumed.' We thank Lord Chelmsford for this act of kindness. We would, however, ask our countrymen not to persuade themselves to the belief that it is the death-knell of recruitment of labour for the Colonies.......... When the corpse of the 'indenture' is, after the inter-departmental conference next month, laid in the grave amidst due pomp and ceremony, something else will take its place and the horrors and atrocities of the old may perhaps be perpetuated under a new name, a new system; that is all. People who value their honour and self-respect more than the sordid wages of sin will do well to guard against the dangerous possibility.......... However anxious the Government of India and the Secretary of State may be to propitiate the colonial planters, Indian opinion cannot and will not countenance any change from the fire to the frying pan.......... And we feel we should warn our countrymen that the open hand of friendship and equality which has been extended to the Indian representatives to the war cabinet and the protestations of unmixed love and gratitude to India which have been expressed in certain interested quarters, should not blind them to the seriousness of the danger which at the moment 'no bigger than a man's hand' is threatening the nation."

The Kangani system of recruiting coolies is as pernicious as the indenture system.
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 5th Apl.

28. The Dnyán Prakásh referring to the report submitted to Government by the Committee appointed to investigate into the condition of the Indian coolies in Ceylon and Malaya working under the Kangani system remarks that a perusal of the report will convince any one that these coolies have to rot in slavery just like those working under the indenture system and therefore it would be improper for Government to substitute the former for the latter as proposed by some people. It hopes that the Conference which is to be held in England in May next will give proper consideration to the matter.

Comments on the Public Service Commission Report.
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 7th and 10th Apl.

29. At present only Europeans can compete at the examination held in England for recruitment for the higher ranks in the Police Department, but the Public Service Commission has now recommended that Indians should no longer be debarred from competing at the examination. The condition attaching to the removal of this colour bar is, however, remarkable. The Commission recommends that the candidate's age should be 19 and that he should have resided in the United Kingdom for 5 years before the date of examination. They thus want the prospective Indian Police officer to leave this country for England at the age of 14! We shrewdly suspect that the Commission, while appearing to be making a 'concession', had no mind to concede anything. [In a subsequent issue the paper writes:—All the appointments in the Indian Medical Department are practically monopolised by I. M. S. officers. That Department has thus lost its independent existence and has become a mere appendage of the Indian Medical Service. The Public Service Commission ought to have suggested that the Medical Department should be completely divorced from the Indian Medical Service. But the Commission, or rather its European members, had apparently decided not to touch any question which even remotely related to the army. Its recommendations, therefore, in regard to the improvement of the Medical Department are of a very limited character and fall far short of our expectations.]

Young India (10), 11th Apl.

30. Mr. L. G. Khare contributes an article to Young India criticising the recommendations of the Public Service Commission with regard to the Indian Police Service, in the course of which he writes :—"Mr Chaubal thinks that the recommendation of the Commission is 'calculated to observe the letter and ignore the spirit of the enactment of 1833.' He was not long in finding out, that as the examination for the Indian Police Service is held at 19, the 'Asiatic Indian student will have to be in England before he is 14.' Now there are very few parents in India who are consumed with a desire of seeing their sons turned in to 'Police-Sabs,' and are willing to send them at 14 to the United Kingdom. Why a five years' stay abroad should be necessary to pass an examination which does not appear to exhaust one's intellectual powers, is hard to understand. It can be understood of course on the supposition that this was the British way of preventing the Indians from competing for it. Given a fair chance, the Indians would have satisfied every condition as regards character, intellectual attainments, and that elusive quality which none can define, the possession of the British spirit. One comes across Police officials in this country who appear to fight shy of pronouncing the initial 'h' in an English word, and whose abilities are largely devoted to a rapid mastery of the swear-words in the Hindustani language. It is safe to assume that the Indian would have easily assimilated these intellectual attainments. I hope, however, another Commission will give him a better chance."

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's statement that the Report of the Public Services Commission was not to be discussed in the House of Commons.

Message (5), 10th Apl.

31. "In the House of Commons, replying to a question by Sir John Jardine Mr. Chamberlain stated that he did not propose to give the House an opportunity of discussing the still-born Report of the Public Services Commission, but he would be glad to discuss the matter with the member in question, if desired. One prominent feature of Mr. Chamberlain's regime at the India Office has been his preference for secrecy, and his reply only confirms the impresssion he has given before. If in India the Government can agree to discuss the matter openly before arriving at any definite conclusions, why should not the House of Commons also have an opportunity of realising the niggardly spirit that pervades the majority report? Is he afraid that any action of the House would bind him down to abandon the favourite schemes of giving effect to the majority's recommendations which he may have in view? Surely if he so chooses, he can set the opinion of the House at nought. There is the irresponsible India Office and the equally irresponsible and dummy India Council behind which he can take shelter any time. There is also the pecedent in the nullification of the House of Commons resolution of June 1893 favouring simultaneous examinations in India and in England. Perhaps Mr. Chamberlain does not like the 'heckling' to which an open debate would subject him."

Demand of security from the Manorama Press by the Madras Government.

Mahrátta, (4), 15th Apl.

*32. "The Madras Government has demanded a security of Rs. 1,000 from the Manorama press in respect of certain articles published in Deshmátá, the leading Telugu weekly edited and published by Mr. Chilakamurti Lakshminarasimham, at Rajmahendry. New India gives the following information about the editor: 'The editor is a well-known poet. He is also the well-known author of several Pauranic dramas, notably Gayopakhyanam and is one of the foremost playwrights of Andhradesha. He is a pathetic figure on the platform, the blind orator ringing out impassioned notes in the cause of Right and Reform. His literary fame has made his name a household word in the Andhradesha, and every household will feel the blow.' Everyone, his duty. The Act is at work in its own wayward manner. Let the strokes fall promiscuously. They are an indirect boon. They confirm the people in their opinion about the bureaucratic system. They strengthen more and more the resolve of the people to end it."

The Abkári policy of Government.
Mahrátta (4), 15th Apl.

*33. "Once the advisory committees got the power to determine the number of shops, they may very well determine that in a particular locality the number ought to be nil. And such a situation would be awful for Government! Liquor gives so much revenue to Government and so much pleasure to the drinker. When these two things follow from the present drink-policy of the Government, it would be suicidal and even nationally ruinous on the part of Government to change that policy! Government of India, Mr. Chintamani was assured, was considering the question of excise policy. We wonder what sort of consideration it is receiving at the hands of Lord Chelmsford and his advisors. Lord Chelmsford wants all the Acts he can get hold of for the purpose of keeping intoxicating writing from the eyes of the people under his care. But as to intoxicating drink—there he would probably think deeply and plentifully before any the smallest step in the direction of lessening Government activity in supplying the dirt to the people is decided upon! 'Government is not keen about morals; its chief concern is to see that the people under its care do not learn to care for themselves': This is an inference that may well be drawn from the liquor-policy of our Government. With the strong temptation of liquors placed in the way of the ignorant people, the latter are practically taught to regard Government as a great supporter of their mal-practices.......... Government profess sympathy with the Temperance Reformer and have no objection to—nay encourage and authorise—the exposure of the vice of drink. But this profession is not consistent with their practice in excise affairs. The fact of Western Nations—England included—making supreme efforts to fight the drink evil has made our Government's backwardness the more glaring. We are sorry we have had to say hard words respecting Government's liquor-policy. Our explanation is that no same man can believe in Government's righteous intentions (so far as the liquor-problem is concerned) when with its omnipotence which nobody questions, it thinks proper to tempt men by its liquor-shops, though at the same time encouraging the introduction of Temperance lessons in school-books and the exhibition before boys and elderly people of lantern-films picturing the effects of drink on the individual drinker and his family."

Alleged corrupt practices of officers of the Excise Department.
Rást Goftár (27), 8th Apl.

34. Referring to the recent exposures of corruption in the Excise Department that have come to light in the Thána District, a correspondent calling himself "Daruwalla" writes to the Rást Goftár, alleging that a very large number of officials in the Excise Department in the Presidency would be found to be guilty of corrupt practices if people were allowed to give evidence under protection and without their names being disclosed to the Department. He suggests that a Commission consisting of responsible European and Indian officials and non-officials should be appointed to take up the enquiry so that no one may have any ground to complain. He also asks for relaxation in certain regulations governing license holders so that Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors may not find any excuse to harass them and advocates the abolition of travelling allowance to Excise Officers so that they might confine themselves to their legitimate duties and have no scope for making illicit gains.

Comments on Mr. Kajiji's appointment as Acting Judge of the Bombay High Court.
Islámic Mail (116), 9th Apl., Urdu edition; Kaiser-i-Hind* (20), 15th Apl., Eng. cols.

35. The Islámic Mail expresses its sense of gratitude to Government for elevating Mr. A. M. Kajiji to the Bench of the Bombay High Court, and it hopes that he would be confirmed in his appointment at the earliest opportunity. It regards Mr. Kajiji fully qualified for the high office to which he has been called and trusts that his preferment would be fraught with benefit to the Muhammadan community. While on this subject, it ventures to point out that no Muhammadan occupies the post of either a Judicial Commissioner in Sind or of a Collector in the whole Presidency. It names two Muhammadan members of the Provincial Civil Service for the latter office, and maintains that till such time as all the three offices mentioned above are occupied permanently by Muhammadans they have no reason to be satisfied with Government. [The Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—"We heartily welcome the appointment of Mr. A. M. Kajiji to the Judgeship of the Bombay High Court. We congratulate the Government of Lord Willingdon on the wisdom of their choice.......... It is not too much to hope that Mr. Kajiji in his new exalted position will maintain the glorious tradition created by the great Indian Judges who adorned the Bombay Bench."]

Comments on the Bombay Chronicle libel case.
Praja Bandhu (24), 8th Apl., Eng. cols.

36. "The news that the appeal in the Bombay Chronicle libel case has resulted in the reversal of Mr. Justice Macleod's judgment will, we are sure, be welcomed by the whole Press in India in general and its indigenous section in particular. The reason for this is quite obvious, for if Mr. Justice Macleod's judgment had been upheld it would have resulted in depriving the Press of the modicum of liberty of criticism that it has still got."

Urdu text-books in Mullan Schools in Sind.
Al-Haq (40), 31st Mar., Eng. cols.

37. "One of the chief difficulties confronting the Moslems is the text books. 75 per cent of the total population of this province are the followers of Islam; but the text books in vernacular for use in the primary schools or the Mullan Schools are not found as tasteful to Moslem feelings as they ought to be. These books do not contain the language which is used in the family intercourse of Moslem society in Sind. They contain many Sanskrit made words and phrases of Hindu society and Hindu religion of Sind. Besides, these books reflect the manners and customs of Hindu Society. A Mussalman attaches great weight to religion, which is the first and foremost object and concern of his life. In the primary schools all over the Province, religious instruction is conspicuous by its absence. [The paper here refers to a suggestion made by it in 1915 for the introduction of Mirza Kalich Beg's Sindhi Books in all the Madressas for Mussalman boys and girls and then continues:—] But we regret our suggestion has not yet been approved of by the Educational Department. We do not know why Mirza Kalich Beg's Sindhi books are not introduced as text books in the Mullan Schools. In fact Sind Mussalmans have made no efforts in that connection. Mirza Kalich Beg's Sindhi books are the translation of the Urdu books of the Anjuman-e-Himayet-ul-Islam, Lahore. There is a Government Resolution [Educational Department No. 1513 of the 14th August 1907] sanctioning the use of the Urdu books of the Anjuman-e-Himayet-ul-Islam, Lahore, in primary schools in this Presidency."

EDUCATION.

Comments on the Government of India's circular to Local Governments on the subject of the Boy Scout movement among Indians.
Young India (10), 11th Apl.

38. Commenting on the Government of India's circular to Local Governments on the subject of the Boy Scout movement among Indians, Young India remarks:—"The circular recently addressed by the Imperial Education Department to all Local Governments and Administrations on the subject of 'encouraging the Boy Scout movement among Indians' will be most certainly received as a cold douche in Indian circles. We wish the Imperial Department of Education, which in some people's eyes now possesses the advantage of being presided over by an Indian, had simply referred the resolution to the Local Governments without writing an essay on it. 'The attitude to be observed by the Government towards the Boy Scout movement in India,' to explain which the circular has been drafted, is of course not the attitude which educated Indian opinion will expect it to adopt, considering several things, and particularly the one principal thing, that the growth of corporate action amongst Indian youth under Indian agency is not a consummation 'devoutly to be wished' in the eyes of several members of the Indian Educational Service.......... If the Government of India looked on, however, while 'many Government officers in their private capacity assisted this private association? they are not going simply to look on when the movement to learn the value of discipline in early age in the task of defending their own country, spreads among Indian youth. The Government of India appear to be quite concerned at the exhibition of this new feeling, and are reduced, to the necessity of lecturing the Local Governments as to what they should do or not do, what they should allow, or disallow. It is not the movement that troubles them, it is the problem of the scout-masters.......... One would like to ask those who drafted this circular why they are so anxious to make any reference to the possibility of using the scouts for unlawful purposes. What are these unlawful purposes, which the authors of this minatory epistle have in mind? Who are the persons whom they expect to be villainous enough to utilise these Indian scouts for such purposes? An answer to these questions will enlighten the Indian public very rapidly as to the attitude the Educational Department at Simla has been pleased to adopt in this matter.......... Privately-managed institutions will be looked after with a vigilant eye, it appears, in this matter, and if they form troops under what the Local Government may consider 'indifferent management', they may be visited with dire penalties, beginning of course with the time-honoured threat of withholding the grant-in-aid. We are not sure that there are many private educational institutions which can afford to take the risk of employing scout-masters for a time, who may not come up to the expectations of the Local Government. Some may be rich enough to afford a European trainer, but the majority will note the chilling enthusiasm with which the Imperial Government has blessed Mr. B. N. Sarma's idea and we are afraid they will wait and see."

Kesari (92), 10th Apl.

39. The resolution of the Government of India on boy-scouts shows how much Government are influenced by political suspicions and what a want of confidence they have in private schools. But if we want to take advantage of a good thing at the hands of Government we have to be satisfied with the imperfect way in which it is dealt with. [The paper then proceeds to give a short history of the Boy-scout movement and goes on:—] Indian boys are not smart not mainly because of their poverty but also because of discipline the thorns of which though invisible are injurious. The students have their eye on the teachers and the latter on the educational authorities even when at play. We suggest to the teachers to take free advantage of the new movement not much caring for the assistance of Government.

Prospects of Europeans and Indians in the Educational Department.

Gujaráti (12), 8th Apl.

40. In connection with a circular recently issued by the Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, wherein it is urged that holders of the M.A. and M.Sc. degrees should not be given a starting salary of more than Rs. 50 per mensem, and those holding the B.A. and B.Sc. degrees more than Rs. 40 per mensem, the Gujaráti refers to the observations made by the Viceroy at the last Calcutta University Convocation pointing to the desirability of giving handsome salaries to teachers for the purpose of securing educational efficiency, and then sarcastically inquires if the said circular indicates the way in which the Viceroy's recommendation is carried into effect. The paper concludes:—There is, however, no harm if an Englishman from an English University gets a start of Rs. 500 on his arrival in India. That is nothing more than putting into practice the recommendation of His Excellency the Viceroy. His Excellency says that capable graduates do not join the Educational Department. It is surely no small piece of fortune that the poor fellows can, after thirty years' service, retire on the magnificent monthly salary of Rs. 150!

The proposed Muhammadan University.

Message (5), 11th Apl.

41. Commenting on the decision of the Muhammadan University Committee to accept the model of the Hindu University, the Message writes:—"The proposals go for the present on the lines of the Hindu University and in the circumstances, our Mahammadan brethren could not have done better than accepting them. We know that there is a strong feeling among certain sections of the Moslem community against the narrow minded proposals and they are strongly in favour of rejecting them. They would not be sorry if the question were held in abeyance until after the war when they can make a better beginning. However much we may sympathise with this veiw, we think it would not have been practical politics to reject the proposals outright. The majority who have voted for their acceptance have acted on the sound principle, 'Take what you get and then agitate for more.' When once a strong footing is gained, it is simple work to gain the next step until we gain the whole ground."

Akhbár-e-Islám (50), 13th Apl.

42. The Akhbár-e-Islám, among other papers, congratulates the Foundation Committee of the Moslem University on their having decided to accept the proposals put forward by Government and thus agreeing to have the University conducted on the lines of the Hindu University. It deals at length with the history of the question and the reasons that have delayed the establishment of the University and expresses its gratification at the reasonable step taken by the Foundation Committee. It believes that there is every possibility of a Bill being soon introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council for the establishment of the proposed Moslem University.

The "insane policy" of the Calcutta University in the matter of school buildings.
Mahrátta (4), 15th Apl.

43. "The Vice-Chancellor of the University of Calcutta has informed the managers of private schools that unless they have buildings of their own, their schools will be closed. His Excellency the Viceroy, the Chancellor of the University—can he contemplate with equanimity the results of this insane policy? Has Government enough schools to accommodate the students who will be turned out? And what sanity is there in asking a person to stop feeding his family unless he has a building of his own to feed them in? The private schools feed the members of the Indian family with the food of knowledge, most essential to the growth of the soul —and here comes Government with its order to turn out the hungry youth and their host, because, forsooth the ground on which they sit and the roof which covers them are not a property' of the host! Says New India :—'There would not be a Hindu University, there would never have been a Central Hindu College and High School, if a cruel policy like that now adopted in Calcutta had been in vogue. We began in rooms lent by one of the first managers, and remained there until the gift of the Maharaja of Benares and the money collected enabled us to build.' But possibily, it is the multiplication of 'private" educational institutions such as C. H C. that our benign Government wants to check!"

MUNICIPALITIES.

Condemnation of the water service rules of the Hyderabad (Sind) Committee of Management.
Sind Advocate (7), 29th Mar.

44. "The Hyderabad Committee of Management have framed a set of rules for private service connections which are a study in perverseness and the spirit of the Marwari bargain driver. If a connection paying the domestic rate is used also for building or trade purposes, it will be chargeable not only for the larger fee but the smaller one as well. If a man builds two or more houses on one plot and takes one connection from the Municipal main, he shall pay the full domestic rate for each house, having a branch from the single connection. If there is a set of rooms separately occupied with a single connection from the main, but with branches for the other rooms, each occupant of the room will pay separately as if he had a direct and separate connection from the main. One house in the occupation of different families with one connection from the main, but with or without branches for the individual families renders each family using pipe water liable to pay separately the full fee for the connection. It does not matter in all these cases whether the owner provides and pays for a big connection from the main in view of the number of families depending on it.........
Then if a man builds a house and takes water from a public hydrant through Pakhals, he has still to pay full fee fixed for an independent building connection. If a man takes water by metre, he must not only pay for water 8 annas per thousand gallons but pay separately for the use of the metre or rent of 8 annas a month! There are other rules open to severe criticism, but these should suffice as samples. We are told a lot of people will stop their connections and some will refuse to pay and take the matter to court on the ground that the rules are ultra vires, no objections having been invited from the rate payers before promulgation of the rules. There is said to be great resentment and indignation among the people. But at this time of plague when the town is deserted, protest meetings are out of the question. Will the Committee persist in enforcing the rules?"

Alleged need of a Food Prices Committee for Karáchi.
Phœnix (6), 4th Apl.

45. An anonymous correspondent writes to the Phœnix:—"The inflated prices now ruling are ruining the poor and middle classes. The prices of fire-wood and charcoal in Karáchi at the present moment are, to say the least, prohibitive. Only a few months back charcoal could be purchased at less than a rupee a maund and now it is Rs. 3-8 or near it. What is required for Karáchi is a Food Prices Committee with power to fix maximum prices and have a strong control over local dealers who are making hay out of the war at the expense of the poor."

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on the action taken against Mr. Gandhi by the District Magistrate of Champaran (Behar).

Message (5), 20th Apl.; Dnyán Prakásh (33), 21st Apl.; Indu Prakásh (35), 20th Apl.

1. "It is difficult to foresee at the moment the end of the startling incident which is just reported from Behar. The action of the District Magistrate of Champaran in serving a notice on Mr. Gandhi under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code directing him to leave the district, is at any rate very disquieting and leads one to think that nobody, whether he is a politician or philanthropist, is immune from coming under the bludgeon authority vested in the Magistracy by an all-liberal and sympathetic criminal law.......... In the first place it is absurd to impute to Mr. Gandhi any intention of obstructing or causing injury or disturbing public tranquility, etc., etc. There is no doubt that his enquiry would cause annoyance to the planters, if it resulted in throwing open the floodgates of light on the dark spots of labour recruitment and labour management on the plantations and might as well cause them 'injury' if it further resulted in removing the conditions under which sweating of labour would be possible. But that is a view of the matter in which Government officials cannot take sides with the planters as against labour and their business is to remain neutral if they cannot assist in bettering the conditions of labour. Further, if, as the Commissioner stated to Mr. Gandhi, Government were themselves inquiring into the matter, what was there then to prevent them from co-opting Mr. Gandhi in the investigation? Government and Government officials may be infallible people, but so long as they have to deal with mundane affairs through fallible men, would it not have been the better course to pursue? If instead of hampering Mr. Gandhi, they had lent him a helping hand in arriving at a fair and impartial decision, would it not have gone to enhance the prestige of the Behar officials for absolute fairness?......... Whatever may be the net outcome of the incident, we regret very much to have to say orders like these do not help to place the Government and Government officials above suspicion and reproach in the public estimation." [The Dnyán Prakásh and the Indu Prakásh also condemn the action of the District Magistrate and make similar comments.]

Message (5), 21st Apl.

2. After describing at some length the hospitality received by Mr. L. Curtis in different parts of India the Message writes:—"The relevancy of this elaborate digression may not be apparent at first sight. We have enlarged upon this matter in order to show the difference between the treatment accorded to Mr. Curtis and Mr. Gandhi. We do not wish to say anything particularly about Mr. Curtis's open letter to the Indians except that it is the most unsuccessful attempt to dissemble his true thoughts and intentions. We shall soon show the fallacies and inconsistencies into which Mr. Curtis has fallen in trying to dissemble his opinions. Meanwhile, we would ask our readers to note how Mr. Gandhi has been treated by the Behar officials. As we said yesterday Mr. Gandhi went to that province with the sole object of finding out the true state of affairs, not to advocate bloodshed or obstruct any one lawfully engaged from doing his duty. Still, the officials come down upon him as if he came of that criminal class to whom alone section 144 of the Criminal Proceedure Code applies. And why? In the first place, it is well known Mr. Gandhi cannot claim the same intimacy and friendship with Lord Chelmsford or Sir James Meston or with the Editor of the Times of India or the Secretary of the Behar Planters' Association, as Mr. Curtis. Nor is Mr. Gandhi, fortunately or unfortunately engaged in the same sort of enterprise as the 'Round Table' Knights, to fit in somehow the Indian labour in the capitalistic interests of the Colonial and Indian planters. For this reason the attempt, it seems to us, was made for turning Mr. Gandhi out of the planting district, even as the authorities at Hong Kong horned out the representative of the Canada-India League and forced him to go back to Canada. It does not need much imagination to draw the moral from the two cases cited here and we shall leave that matter to the readers themselves."

*3. "The extraordinary order passed by the District Magistrate of Champaran ordering Mr. Gandhi to leave the district as his presence in any part of it would endanger the public peace, and might lead to serious disturbance which may be accompanied by loss of life, has created widespread indignation.... ... We may say that, from what he has been able to see, Mr. Gandhi thinks that there is urgent need for an independent enquiry into the labour conditions in Champaran. It would seem that an investigation was undertaken some years ago by Mr. Gourlay under the orders of the Government of Bengal, but his report has not been published, notwithstanding the request of non-official Indian members of the Legislative Council. Mr. Gandhi is anxious that the public should fix their attention, not on his personal position, but on the position of the labourers in Champaran. The Government of India have the matter on hand, and we earnestly hope that they will relieve the public mind, which is naturally excited by the order served on Mr. Gandhi without the slightest provocation, by announcing the appointment of an independent committee of enquiry."

Hindusthán (16), 20th Apl.

4. Expressing its belief that the order issued under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure against Mr. M. K. Gandhi to leave the Champaran District (Behar) will produce an impression that the local authorities have abused the power vested in them under the section, the Hindusthán observes:—If apprehensions are thus entertained, directly or indirectly, at Mr. Gandhi going to that district to investigate the relations between the planters and the labourers, as if his doing so were to be something like a torch applied to combustible matter, that very fact indicates that the conditions there must be unsatisfactory. There is no doubt that such prohibitory orders will considerably increase agitation in the country in this matter, and as a matter of fact the authorities have thus indirectly helped Mr. Gandhi in his work. We do not believe that the Champaran District authorities are under the delusion that Mr. Gandhi moves about in the country merely with the object of creating dissatisfaction among the people. If they are labouring under such a delusion they must now open their eyes. The use of section 144 in such cases would mean that Government allow their officers to stifle all independent inquiries into public grievances in order to avoid the danger of unsatisfactory conditions coming to light. What then is the significance of the permission Lord Chelmsford gave to an American representative to go about in the whole of India and freely make inquiries into the condition of the country? Can a mere American visitor have such a permission while sons of the soil cannot? We at least do not interpret Lord Chelmsford's words in that manner, and therefore believe that the action above referred to is clearly arbitrary. We hope that, whatever may be the views of the Behar Government, the Government of India will not but reprimand the authorities of the Champaran District for the step they have taken.

Comments on the Bombay Government's orders regarding Messrs. Pal and Khadilkar.

Message (5), 21st Apl.

5. "The Bombay Government is to be congratulated upon its boldness in being inconsistent, and shall we say, irrational. Mr. Khadilkar was one month ago ordered, on pain of legal penalty, not to lecture at Belgaum, though it was widely known that he was going to address the people on the duty of recruiting in the Indian Defence Force. But a week ago he was allowed to give a political lecture on Home Rule! Again, Mr. Pal is allowed to write anything he chooses in widely read newspapers. But he is not allowed to deliver a lecture before such a responsible body as the Sind Conference at Shikárpur!"

Why England should support India's demand for Home Rule.

Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

6. Englishmen could not uptil now make out why Indians complained loudly against the bureaucracy. But since the calamity of the great war, the Defence of the Realm Act has been enforced in England and Englishmen have now come to enjoy the happiness of living under the unlimited sway of the bureaucracy. The Globe has expressed in one sentence the fault of an autocratic bureaucracy. It says that the bureaucracy thinks that it can administer the affairs of others better than they themselves can do, and that is exactly what the Home Rulers say. When the administration seeks to control even the minute details of private life such as what books students should read and what newspapers the people should take, what wonder is there if important political issues are decided at the sweet will of the bureaucracy without the consent of the people? We do not attribute any evil motive to it. Everything is done with an honest motive and for the good of the world! But just as man cannot know the ways of God, Indians cannot clearly make out the intentions of the bureaucracy, and they murmur needlessly! The people may be right or they may be wrong, but it is desirable that the bureaucracy should set aside its conceitedness and allow people to manage their own affairs. Though the Home Rule of the Globe is destroyed temporarily it will have it back freely after the war, but can India entertain a similar hope? Is it not the duty of the English Press that knows the bureaucratic administration well now to support the demand of India for Home Rule?

Comments on the brochure entitled "Some American Opinions on the Indian Emipre".
Indian Social Reformer (2), 22nd Apl.

*7. "We were surprised to receive some days ago from the Government of Bombay a slight booklet of about thirty pages containing quotations from a number of American publicists in appreciation of British rule in India. The publication, issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin at two pence a copy, is entitled "Some American Opinions on the Empire". We rather thought that we were in a better position to appreciate British rule in this country than Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, Mr. William Howard Taft or Admiral Goodrich. The idea of a great Government circulating testimonials by foreign publicists to its beneficence among its own subjects, is altogether strange to us and we are not satisfied that it is a very sound or fruitful idea. It seems to us, on the other hand, derogatory to a Government like the Government of India to send round the opinions of foreigners about itself, as if it were a patent pill, or a special kind of soap. In these days of rigid economy too, it seems to be wasteful to spend any money on such flimsy compilations. If it was desired to remove misapprehensions as to the methods of British rule in India in neutral countries, a compilation of the opinions of Indians who live under it, we fancy, is likely to carry more weight than the opinion of foreigners."

Contrast between the agricultural policies of Great Britain and India.
Gujaráti (12), 15th Apl.

8. The Gujaráti dwells upon the necessity on the part of Government of encouraging the development of agriculture by assuring to the cultivating classes the enjoyment of the benefits arising from their skill or labour. It remarks that much greater efforts should be made than what are being made at present to give these classes scientific education in agriculture. The paper is rather inclined to hold the view that the present revenue policy of Government is influenced by the sole consideration of increasing revenue every ten, twenty or twenty-five years when a new land assessment is made. It regrets that Government are not as anxious for the development of agriculture as they are for strengthening the Police and Criminal Investigation Departments and for overawing, with the help of the Press Act, journalists who raise the question whether Government desire to keep the people in the condition of 'hewers of wood and drawers of waters'. It contrasts the present policy of the Government in England of being prepared to spend, even in the existing crisis, large sums of money for the development of agriculture, with the policy of the Indian Government who have curtailed by 33 per cent. the expenditure on irrigation which is so helpful to agriculture. It then refers to the statement contained in the Agricultural Report published by Mr. McKenna to the effect that great improvement has been made of late in the cultivation of rice, wheat and cotton seed, and remarks that improvement in these directions should not be aimed at from the standpoint of England's needs but from that of the benefit of Indian agriculturists and labourers. The paper then proceeds to refer to the resolution passed by the House of Commons prohibiting land-owners from increasing the rent of agricultural lands and fixing the minimum of weekly wages for agricultural labourers as well as the price of wheat, and observes that this arrangement goes to demonstrate how remedial measures are soon devised when one's own vital interests are affected. It maintains that in the present war Germany has taught England the importance of the development of agriculture side by side with other industries and asks if Indian administrators will learn a lesson from England's experience. It is of opinion that progress in agricultural matters should be made at a more rapid rate instead of at a snail's pace as at present.

The dignity of the Indian Legislative Councils is not being properly preserved.
Kalpataru (90), 15th Apl.

9. The Kalpataru says that popular expectations that the reformed Councils would be able to exercise a wholesome check on the decisions of the executive do not appear to have been realised. It refers to the report appearing in the Leader of Allahabad that the United Provinces Government have sanctioned a sum of Rs. 20,000 for a new post of Secretary in opposition to the clearly expressed opinion of the Legislative Council and have also disallowed a resolution proposed in the matter, and says that incidents such as these only prove that the Councils are merely a farce. It concludes by saying that the promise of a contribution by the Government of India of £100 millions towards the cost of the war without the knowledge of the Imperial Legislative Council was another instance of the same kind showing that the dignity of the Legislative Councils is not being properly preserved.

Danger of Lancashire's intervention in the Indian Cotton Mill industry.
Indu Prakásh (35), 14th Apl., Eng. cols.

10. Referring to His Excellency Lord Willingdon's speech at the annual meeting of the Bombay Millowners' Association the Indu Prakásh writes:—"We accept in all good faith the assurance of His Excellency Lord Willingdon that there is no need to cultivate a pessimistic attitude regarding the future and that the status quo ante will not be restored after the war. But one cannot disguise the fact that Lancashire has bowed to the inevitable on the clear undertaking given by the present Imperial Government that the whole position will be reconsidered after the war. Lancashire evidently hopes to upset the preset arrangement soon after the war ends and no doubt extraordinary efforts will be made to compass the end in view. If Lancashire pursued only fair methods India will have no cause to fear. But we cannot be sure of this, for we notice already the righteous and humane manufacturers of Lanchashire becoming suddenly concerned about the welfare of Indian mill-operatives. Tactics such as these are barefacedly unholy and clumsy....... ... That their condition needs amelioration cannot be gainsaid, but it does not lie in the mouth of Lancashire capitalists to raise a hue and cry in the manner they have done."

Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

11. Eight years after the Swadeshi movement, the Manchester merchants have again been moved by the sufferings of Indian labourers and they have begun to weep! When the Swadeshi movement affected their trade, they raised a hollow cry about the Indian millhand being overworked and advocated the lessening of his hours of work. And now that Government have levied an import duty they have begun to shed crocodile tears over child-labour in India. We are all for labour reforms but the cry of Manchester is not a disinterested one; it can be easily proved that it is inspired by bad motives. Their statement that Indian children below nine years work for six hours in our mills is false because under the Factory Act such children cannot at all be employed. Manchester should have the sense to see that such false statements will only do harm to its cause.

Imperial Tariff Scheme will not benefit India.
A'rydvart (80), 14th Apl.

12. Referring to the scheme promulgated in some quarters for an Imperial Tariff after the war, the A'rydvart declares that India will not benefit by it inasmuch as Indian merchants mostly deal in goods manufactured by other countries and show little tendency to develop the manufactures of India itself. It declares that the autonomous units of the Empire like Australia and New Zealand will take full advantage of the revised tariff and flood Indian markets with their goods. What would we gain, it asks, if our money which hitherto went to Germany and Austria found its way to England and the Colonies? India lost money when Germany and Austria looted her and it would make no difference if Australia did the same. Merely a change in the merchants will not benefit India. Unless economic autonomy is granted to the country, no scheme of Imperial Tariff will benefit it, inasmuch as it will only end in sending up prices.

Young India (10), 18th Apl.

13. "Those who have carefully followed the drift of His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's previous pronouncements on post-war questions, including, among others, the question of the reorganisation of the machinery of the whole Government of India will have very little reason to feel flattered by the profuse expression of sympathy to which he gave utterance in Láhore the other day. .... Neither His Excellency's official pronouncements nor the conduct of some of the high officials of State nor the open entertainment and encouragement of political philanthropists like Sir Valentine Chirol and Mr. Lionel Curtis is likely to enlist very much the confidence of the people in the high moral purpose of the ruling class to prepare the people for a great destiny. As Mr. Gokhale once said, whenever certain declarations are accompanied by a profusion of lip sympathy, people would be well advised in accepting them with a grain of salt. His Excellency declared: 'I sympathise whole-heartedly with Indian aspirations, and I hope it will be my lot during my period of office to assist them to find great scope. But let me repeat here a warning, which it is my duty constantly to reiterate in these times of exuberant political activities, when peoples' minds are disturbed and opinions are unsettled by the conflict and crash of Empires: let me repeat that the ideal which is best suited for India is not so much rapid progress as steady progress. Do not expect violent changes: if progress is to be sure it must be consolidated step by step'.......... But this is 'more platitudinous than promising.' We are living in a most eventful period of history. Even as Mr: Lloyd George declared only the other day, 'there are times in history when this world spins so leisurely along its destined course that it seems for centuries to be at a standstill. There are also times when it rushes along at a giddy pace covering the track of centuries in a year. These are such times.' The Prime Minister very aptly cited the case of Russia as an instance in point. 'Six weeks ago, Russia was an autocracy. She is now one of the most advanced democracies in the world.' Judged by the standard of 'fitness' for even a limited case of self-government, which our rulers have thought fit to apply in the case of our people, were the Russians fit for the most advanced form of democracy in the world? Is it not a well-known fact that the Russian people were considered even more backward and helplessly dependent on their bureaucracy, a bureaucracy unparalleled in the world for its tyranny, oppression and corruption, beyond compare to all the bureaucracies of the world put together? If Russians can obtain freedom and fitness by a stroke of the pen, as it were, are not Indians fit for self-government within the Empire after a century and a half of her connection with the Mother of Parliaments and more than half a century of enlightened British rule in India? If the reforms unanimously voiced by the Congress and the Moslem League and endorsed by the whole country are 'violent changes', which people need not expect, there is little in it of statesmanship or political wisdom, and the lessons of history must have been completely lost on our rulers. It would be an evil day for India and for the Empire,—we utter this warning in all solemnity, if our rulers could applaud a revolution in Russia and throw a damper on the most constitutional and legitimate demands of the people of India. His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's speech, however sweetly phrased, does not inspire us with great hopes that the Indian bureaucracy would willingly surrender the power or authority which by long usage they have now come to regard as solely vested in themselves."

14. "The scheme of land gifts recently announced will no doubt go a good deal towards securing the contentment of the war-scarred veterans when they return home and settle down to resume the plough which they had exchanged for the sword. But, reading the various addresses presented to the Viceroy, one at the same time is struck with the fact that these communities aspire for something more than a mere plot of ground to eke out a living from. More than one of the addresses referred to the desirability of commissions in the Army being thrown open to Indians and dwelt also on post-war administrative reforms, showing that the military classes, no less than the civil population, are moved by the spirit of nationalism which is now abroad in the land. We are sorry the Viceroy's reply was not wholly satisfactory on these points.......... The question of wider careers, we are told, is now engaging attention of Government, but it may be justly asked, for how long has not that question been under consideration? One of the hopes held out in the Imperial Proclamation of His Majesty the King-Emperor on the Coronation Day at Delhi in 1911 was that facilities will be provided shortly for enabling Indians to rise to higher ranks in military service. But over five years have passed since this hope was held out and still we are told the question is under consideration. One would have thought that the occasion of a world-wide war would have provided a golden opportunity to the Imperial Government to make up their mind and offer better attractions to the military races of India, not to mention the civil population, to enlist in the Army. But the authorities appear to be disinclined to grant this concession, and to judge from His Excellency the Viceroy's speech, the question of commissions will be left to be definitely solved either at the fag end of the war or after the war itself. One can only regret that the authorities have lost a splendid opportunity to demonstrate to the world and to the Indian public that they are not slow to recognise the unstinted war services of the country as a whole."

Indu Prakásh (35), 18th Apl., Eng. cols.

15. Commenting upon the utterances of His Excellency the Viceroy during his recent tour in the Punjab, the Sánj Vartamán writes:—In his reply to the address of the Sikh community in his Durbar speech His Excellency gave expression to the view that India is suited for steady and not for rapid progress, and warned people against expecting violent changes. His Excellency is fully in sympathy with Indian aspirations, but his speeches have disappointed us. The Indian public will feel thankful if he is pleased to take them into his confidence and tell them what he means by "violent changes" and "steady progress". Does His Excellency mean to say that the Indian National Congress and the Moslem League are advocating "volent changes" in their demand for political rights? The people want to share the responsibilities of the Indian Government and do not ask for violent changes. The people's aspirations have been reflected in the memorial submitted by the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council, and if His Excellency Lord Chelmsford is disposed to regard the just and reasonable claims put forth therein as a demand for violent changes, we would ask him to study Indian questions more minutely by coming into close contact with the true leaders of Indian opinion. His Excellency's reply in the matter of granting commissions to Indians is equally disappointing. His Excellency was proud to narrate the achievements of the Punjábis on the field of battle but when they asked for commissions he put them off by telling them that a question of policy could not be dealt with hastily. His Excellency does not seem to understand what the people want. The Punjabis have earned Victoria Crosses, Orders of Merit and Distinguished Service Medals. Have not these solders qualified themselves for Commissions? Indians want that officers' training schools should be opened for them and commissions given them on their proving themselves efficient. This demand cannot be said to be an unreasonable one. Now that Indians have proved their mettle this demand of theirs should be satisfied without any delay. The world is advancing at a rapid rate and India would do well to keep pace with it or else it will remain in a backward position. [The Bombay Samáchár, on the other head, remarks that the Viceroy is quite justified in saying that people must be trained as soldiers in the Defence Force before they can aspire to be officers and asks young men to enlist in large numbers and pass all the tests before advancing their claims for higher posts.]

Sánj Vartamán (28), 19th Apl.; Bombay Samáchár (53), 20th Apl.

16. "During his sojourn at Láhore His Excellency Lord Chelmsford was the recipient of several addresses from the several communities—the Sikh, the Muhammadan and the Hindu—in addition to the one presented by the Cosmopolitan Municipality of Láhore. The replies of His Excellency to these addresses contain very little that is fresh, but there is a good deal of platitude about many things of wider interest, more particularly the doctrine of step by step which he propounded at great pains in reply to the Sikh community's address.......... He then repeated most solemnly that 'the ideal which is best suited for India is not so much rapid progress as steady progress,' whatever that may mean. We have no doubt the Sikh community must have been highly impressed by the sympathetic attitude of the Viceroy and must have felt highly grateful to him. We should have had no hesitation in endorsing the view of Lord Chelmsford. But we beg to draw His Excellency's attention to a little passage in the speech of Mr. David Lloyd George, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, delivered at the American Luncheon Club, just on the eve of his Excellency's sympathetic speech at Láhore Mr. Lloyd George said amid cheers and loud cheers: 'Strange things have happened in this war and stranger things are to come, and they are coming rapidly. There are times in history when this world spins so leisurely along its destined course that it seems for centuries to be at a standstill. There are also times when it rushes along at a giddy pace, covering the track of centuries in a year. These are such times. Six weeks ago, Russia was an autocracy; she is now one of the most advanced democracies in the world.' .... We have no reason to think that what Mr. Lloyd George said of Europe cannot be true of Asia. As we observed the other day, many things have happened, which ought to inspire our countrymen with confidence in the future—not the distant future, and many more things must happen, before this war comes to an end, which will upset the most fondly cherished calculations of Lord Chelmsford and his infallible advisers regarding the Juggernath of Indian progress."

Message (5), 17th Apl.

17. Referring to the Viceroy's remark in his reply to the Sikh community's address that reforms in India should be carried out slowly, the Kesari says that the discussion whether the rate of progress of reforms is slow or rapid cannot be decided unless Government make a full statement of the reforms they have in view and the stages by which they wish to attain them. So long as Government keep their gifts secret, it asks, why should the Viceroy take the trouble to make emphatic declarations that our demands are excessive and that the concessions Government intend to grant are sufficient? [The Dnyán Prakásh says:—The Viceroy did not make it clear why the rate of progress could be rapid in other countries and why it should be slow in India. It would be better if we were to bring to the notice of the authorities in England the public opinion in India and ask them to introduce large reforms required by the situation which has now arisen rather than give warnings to the people. We would also give His Excellency to understand that his warning will not break the force of the public movement.]

Kesari (92), 17th Apl.; Dnyán Prakásh (33), 17th Apl.

18. "In his reply to the address of the Lahore Municipality His Excellency Lord Chelmsford expressed the hope that 'both those who now enjoy the amenities of suburban life and the land-owners who are reaping profit do not fail to reflect that their benefits are mainly due to the security establised by the British Raj.' Whatever it may be, we fail to see the relevancy of the remark in this connection. It is indeed impossible to think that there was any occasion for such a remark, which appears to us to be wanting in discretion, if it is also not indicative of a mental obsession. These constant reminders of what people owe and do not owe to the British Raj, as if they were all a set of thick-headed people who could not realise the fact without being frequently reminded by high and authoritative quarters, savour too much of distrust in their good will and judgment. And this, in the face of the terrible sacrifices they have made and the sufferings they have endured, is lacking in fairness and graciousness, if nothing else. These lapses, however unintentional, cannot certainly be reassuring to any self-respecting, intelligent people even when those are accompanied with the sweetest platitudes."

Message (5), 17th Apl.

Comments on Mr. Lloyd George's speech at the American Luncheon Club.
Mahratta (4), 22nd Apl.

*19. "The Premier's speech at the American Luncheon Club delivered on the 12th instant has naturally served as an important occasion for the Indian Press to press its demands with strengthened hope in the light of the noble sentiments given vent to by Mr. Lloyd George. .... As America has already granted the Philippinoes representative institutions of sterling character after a short period of tutelage extending only to 18 years, the American Ambassador may truly say, on behalf of his Government, that the latter cannot think of the place where democracy is assailed, as a place worth living in.......... That the Philippinoes should receive representative institutions of a substantial nature after only 18 years of tutelage and that the Indians should be still under cramping tutelage without any assurance as yet from their rulers that not far in the future lies the moment of their emancipation—these things have not happened accidentally.......... Every argument that has been urged in extenuation of British backwardness has been answered pretty effectively. In any case it cannot be said that in India which unlike the Philippines contains two communities with civilizations and cultures of their own (which are admittedly of a high order) and which has been successfully and beneficently ruled by men from either community for centuries together—that in India of this description the fault of the present politically backward state lies wholly with the people and not with their rulers. A democratic spirit with American earnestness would have dealt with India in a different manner and to a different end.......... We turn to the Premier's speech without more ado.......... 'The advent of the United State into the war gives the final stamp and seal to the character of the conflict as a struggle against military autocracy throughout the world.' An autocracy to be 'efficient' must have the backing of 'militarism.' The latter is dangerous as an instrument of autocracy, and is its invariable concomitant in a more or less developed form. It is 'autocracy,' therefore, that needs to be stamped out of the world and since this war is characterised by the Premier as a struggle against autocracy throughout the world, India may fairly claim that the 'democrat' Premier is bound, for consistency's sake, and of course for the sake of world-progress, to cast his eye in the direction of Indian 'autocracy' and dethrone it in favour of a more up-to-date and beneficent form of Government. The Premier went on to designate this struggle as 'a great fight for human liberty.' Indian liberty is surely included in 'human liberty.'.......... 'Russia engaged in this great war for the freedom of Serbia, Montenegro and Bulgaria. They were fighting for the freedom of Europe and they wanted to make their own country free and have done with it.' These remarks again cannot be read without 'India' standing sharp and clear before the mental eye. Indians cannot come back home except with their love for national freedom redoubled by their efforts in the cause of human liberty. The Russians wanted to make their country free, i.e., to place it under popular rule, and the Premier is happy that the Russians have succeeded. So we have reason to expect that our efforts to make our country free will be appreciated and helped by Mr. Lloyd George.......... 'The Hindenburg line' which he expounded and exposed so well in his eloquent speech, is a phenomenon of no uncommon occurrence. This line he described as 'a line drawn in the territories of other people with the warning that inhabitants of those territories cross it at the peril of their lives.' By appropriate modification we can speak of the race bar and other bars in India as 'Hindenburg lines.'......... 'And soon Frenchmen, Americans, British, Italians, Russians, yea, and Serbians, Belgians, Montenegrins and Roumanians will emerge into the full light of perfect day.' And can these nations enjoy that 'perfect day' when we here—not to mention other nations—are under a more or less 'dark rule'? Are we not pining for the perfect day? Surely democrats cannot enjoy their freedom heartily so long as that freedom is not fully shared by the various peoples of the earth. As the Premier remarked, 'Democracy means peace,' and the absence of it in any nation, we hold, must be taken as a potential disturber of the peace of the world.......... May that real peace come is our earnest prayer. But we cannot see such a peace unless and until a real democratic policy is earnestly followed by Governments having alien countries under their rule and in consonance with this policy timely concessions are made to the several subject peoples according to the urgency of their needs and demands."

Reflections on a recent speech of Dr. Page, the American Ambassador in England.
Young India (10), 18th Apl.

20. "Dr. Page, the American Ambassador in England, orating on a very recent occasion on Anglo-American friendship, took the trouble to explain what exactly the United States of America were as a form of Government. They were a republic, 'a system of society, a scheme of life, a plan of freedom, a state of mind—an ideal that every human being shall have the utmost opportunity for individual freedom.' When young Indians read these remarks they are likely to ponder over them.......... They will easily notice that in the self-governing colonies of the British Empire, attempts are made continuously to achieve this ideal, but that there are other territories under this very Empire, where such attempts are misconstrued either into sedition or into impossible demands. Is the present form and spirit of the British Administration in India such as to ensure the belief that every human being in India has the utmost opportunity for individual progress?......... There can be no question that the British ideal has been the most remarkable for the scope it has allowed for the exercise of individual freedom, so long as that ideal has worked among men of the same race and civilization. The moment however it comes into contact with other races and another civilization, the British ideal loves to create exceptions, and becomes ultimately lost in the counsels of caution which crowd round it.......... We should have imagined that after a century of British rule in India, one of the central conditions of Indian political progress was bound to be a visible acknowledgment on the part of the governing agency in India of the trust and the faith the Indians have in British ideals of government. But this trust is met with distrust. Nowhere is this attitude more evident than in the official tinkering with problems of local self-government in every province of India."

Comments on the recent grant of Jahgirs by the Punjab Government for war service.
Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

21. The policy pursued by British statesmen after India came under the East India Company was that no new Jahgirs or Vatans should be given and that if possible the old ones should be confiscated. They did not naturally desire to introduce in India the feudal system condemned in the West. They thought of making use of titles in order to get their work done, but they came to see during the war that hollow titles were not useful in getting important and responsible work done, and new Jahgirs are to be given in the Punjab for war service. A king's policy is said to have many phases, but it is strange that the policy declared to be useless in one part of the country should be welcomed in another at one and the same time. Government are engaged in abolishing Kulkarni Vatans in one part of the country, but in another sixteen new Jahgirdars were created the other day. If Government think that the new system of giving Jahgirs for two generations only will not prove harmful like the old one, they are mistaken. They know how dearly Indians love their Jahgirs. If they resume the Punjab Jahgirs during the third generation as proposed they will surely make the future generations discontented. If they want to grant Jahgirs, they should grant them permanently or have nothing to do with them at all. But whatever be their decision regarding the new Jahgirs, they should not at least resume Vatans that have been in existence for thousands of years. It is quite inconsistent with the new policy adopted by them.

Government should not permit any other War Loan Lottery in the Bombay Presidency besides the one organised by the Western India Turf Club.

Sind Observer (9), 3rd Apl.

22. Referring to the Western India Turf Club War Loan Lottery sanctioned by Government, the Sind Observer remarks:—"We would like to point out that Government having accorded their sanction to this large and respectably conducted lottery should not permit the numerous petty concerns which are springing up. Not that we wish it understood that any which is now placed before the public is less honestly managed; but unless Government recognise one, and only one lottery in this Presidency, there will be no limit to the number which will be organised, and we know from experience what fraudulent practices will appear in the guise of helping on the War Loan. We, therefore, advise Government to draw the line at once and warn all concerned that there is one authorised lottery in the Bombay Presidency."

Complaint about neglect by officials of the activities of the Bombay Moslem Committee for the entertainment of wounded soldiers.

Islámic Mail (3), 15th Apl.

23. "The Muhammadans complain that the attention of Government is monopolised by the noisy agitators and that perhaps if the Muhammadans played the agitator they would be paid more attention. This may be true or not, but the way movements initiated by Muhammadans are neglected by officials lends some justification for the supposition. With laudable zeal and enthusiasm, certain influential Muhammadan gentlemen formed a committee to entertain the wounded soldiers as a mark of appreciation and encouragement. The entertainments have been carried out with great success and enthusiasm and the soldiers have declared that nothing has given them greater pleasure and amusement than these entertainments. Even the Y. M. C. A. officers who helped in the arrangement affirmed that the soldiers enjoyed nothing better. The organisers deserved to be encourged by official patronage for such laudable object which is more important than many other social and communal movements. The Honourable Mr. Cadell with that generous regard for Muhammadan affairs which he has evinced of late, accepted the Presidentship of the Committe. The Police Commissioner attended it once and there it ended. No other official personage took part in it and even our ubiquitous Governor did not grace it with his presence. When Muhammadans see how movements of far lesser import organised by the advanced congressists are patronised officially and encouraged on all hands, is it a wonder if they feel a bit disheartened at the scanty attention paid to their undertakings?"

Probabilities of a separate peace between Russia and the enemy.

Gujaráti (12), 15th Apl.; Hindusthán (16), 18th Apl.

24. Reviewing the progress of the war and referring to the proclamation issued by the new Russian Government, wherein it was declared that Russia did not wish to extend its sway over other nations or to subjugate or humiliate them, the Gujaráti remarks that this proclamation of Russia is pregnant with meaning. It writes:— When the war broke out Russia took the side of Servia for preserving her supremacy over the whole Slav nation of Europe including not only the Slavs of Russia but those residing in an independent country like Servia. If Russia had not, for that purpose, begun collecting her army this war would not perhaps have taken place in its present form. It would have arisen between Austria and Servia and might have ended there. However, regard being had to the proclamation issued by Russia it can be asked if she will give up her ambition of conquering Armenia and securing Constantinople and the Dardanelles. Will she give up her supremacy over the Slav nations? If such be not her ambitions she will easily be able to conclude peace with Turkey and there will be, likewise, no difficulty in doing the same with Germany and Austria. Along with the abovesaid proclamation are received telegrams announcing that Russia is ready to fight with Germany till the last. It is doubtful whether these telegrams are reliable. Perhaps they may have been intended to reassure the English and the French. The certain chance of defeating Germany has become uncertain on account of the unsettled conditions in Russia. Reuter's telegram dated the 11th instant says that even in England news received from Russia is not relied upon and is unintelligible. Indians hope that the Russians will not bring upon themselves the opprobrium of letting slip a fine opportunity from their hands. [Speculating upon the possibility of Russia concluding a separate peace the Hindusthán opines that the new Russian Government cannot make a separate peace with Austria inasmuch as it has accepted all the treaties entered into by the previous Government, one of which is opposed to any such peace. According to the paper it is a question whether Russia can tell the Allies that she has no longer the desire, which the Czar had, of swallowing the Turkish territory and that the nation being short of means is no longer willing to bear the burden of war. It then asks what the condition of France will be if Russia concludes peace with Austria and itself answers the question by maintaining that in that case France may be also compelled to make a separate peace and England may have to follow suit. The paper, in conclusion, observes that the future of the war rests with the decision of Russia.]

Reflections on the Russian Revolution.
Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

25. The Russian revolution and the entry of America into the war have changed altogether the character of the Great War. When the war was first proclaimed two years ago, it was declared to have been undertaken for the preservation of the liberty of small kingdoms. Now President Wilson says that the war will decide the superiority of democracy over autocracy. Though there is no democracy in England at present, Englishmen are the best lovers of the virtues of democracy. The establishment of democratic government in Russia has carried the wave of the freedom of the people up to the borders of Afghanistan and so we can infer that England will never hesitate to put bureaucratic government in India under restrictions after the war. The democratic movement has affected also Austria and Germany. Mr. Lloyd George thinks that there might be peace earlier than thought of. Yesterday there was autocratic rule in Russia, to-day there is a socialist democratic government there. If such wonders are taking place, who can say that peace will not be signed to-morrow? The Russian democracy has declared that it is not for any extension of territory and it will be ever ready to make peace honourable to the Allies. This declaration of the Russian Government and the support given to it by the Worker's League and the insistence of some socialists that a separate peace should be made, all tend to show that the Russian revolution has brought peace near. The successful revolutionaries are eager to live in amity with the neighbouring nations. The Austro-Germans also are trying to make peace through their own socialists. Russia has lost its enthusiasm to wield the sword because of its revolution, and thus is likely to put an end to the war and thus spread the light of democratic government all over the world.

Petrol shortage in Bombay.
Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 16th Apl.

26. The Jám-e-Jamshed dwells at length on the difficulties that owners of motorcars and taxi drivers in Bombay have been subjected to of late by the rise in the price of petrol, due to only one steamer plying between Burmah and Bombay for the transport of petrol. In view of the services rendered by Bombay during the war, the paper suggests that Government should so arrange matters as to allow one more steamer to bring petrol from Burmah and thus meet the difficulties of owners of motor cars and taxi-cab drivers. It fears that cars will shortly have to cease running for want of petrol.

The proposed Congress deputation to England.
Message (5), 18th Apl.

27. "We cannot certainly commend the wisdom of those who were responsible for the selection of the members of the Congress deputation to England. From the very scanty information available up to the present, we understand that four from Bengal, three from the United Provinces, two from Madras and one from Bombay, in all ten, will constitute the deputation. We are not yet aware on what principle this distribution was effected. At any rate it seems presumptuos enough on the part of Bengal to claim four of the ten for itself, while Bombay is to be content with only one! .... Is it part of a selfish conspiracy on the part of [illegible] ultra-loyalists to keep out the most eminent and disinterested public men because their views are not approved in high official quarters? Why is not Mr. Tilak there, why is not Mrs. Besant on the deputation? After all, it must be remembered that Mr. Tilak has all along been the sponsor and consistent supporter of the movement for the deputation. Does the Committee doubt his unquestioned right to be the chosen representative of the people of India, after the splendid demonstration of public feeling at Lucknow, or is it jealous of Mr. Tilak's influence and personality?......... It is absurd that a small caucus should still domineer the course of our national life and insult the nation by reprehensible conduct of this sort. Mr. Tilak may not be as great an orator as some of the deputationists are. Yet is there one in this country who can make the nearest approch to him in his unerring patriotism, splendid devotion to duty, and the great sacrifices he has made for the cause to which he has adhered ever since he entered public life?...... It is unnecessary to offer any comment as to the individual persons selected. As far as they go, they are the best that could have been made, but the deputation is incomplete without the two leading figures being in it, and it is the duty of the public to see that the omission is made good without a moment's delay."

Gujaráti (12), 22nd Apl., Eng. cols.

28. "Such a deputation should have gone long before this and we are afraid the men who will proceed by the end of May will be either too late or too early. Too late because, by the time they reach England, the most important part of the work of the Conference may have been already finished and too early because the war may not have ended by that time....... We are not sure if the idea of a large Indian deputation will be approved by our friends in England who know the difficulties of the situation much better than people in this country. What is wanted at the moment is not stumping and oratory in England but quiet talks and interviews with ministers and responsible leaders in that country. A couple of leaders would have done this much more effectively than a large and costly deputation, which it is proposed to send."

The Fourth Sind Provincial Conference at Shikárpur.

Sind Journal (8), 12th Apl.

29. Commenting upon the proceedings of the fourth session of the Sind Provincial Conference recently held at Shikárpur, the Sind Journal remarks:—"The one disappointing feature of the Conference was the paucity of Muhammadan delegates. But, we believe, that is only a passing phase, as the active participation in the deliberations of the Conference by the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri and Mr. Abdul Rahman, Bar-at-Law, clearly indicates.......... The cause of Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal's absence was the unjustifible attitude taken by the Bombay Government to that distinguished patriot's presence in the Conference. The Reception Committee also is responsible for the absence of Mr. Pal from the Conference, to which he had been enthusiastically invited, as the telegraphic correspondence in another column shows. Mr. Pal had, no doubt, asked the Chairman of the Reception Committee to intimate to Government that he was to attend the Provincial Conference, in order to give the Bombay Government sufficient notice of his intention to proceed to Shikárpur. Mr. Pal evidently wanted Government to show their hand beforehand in case it was considered proper by them to exclude him from the Bombay Presidency or any portion of it under the Defence of India Act. But we fail to understand why the Chairman should have inquired from Government if there was any objection to Mr. Pal's attending the Conference. This was sufficient to egg on the Bombay Government to express their strong objection to Mr. Pal's presence in the Conference, as if it were a powder magazine which would have exploded as a result of this eloquence. If the attitude of Government was most regrettable that of the Reception Committee was still more so.......... The conduct of some public spirited citizens of Shikárpur in inviting Mr. Pal on their own book was a set-off to the affront offered to Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal by the Reception Committee by informing him of the Bombay Government's desire at an intermediate station. This incident alone marred the unity of purpose underlying the Conference. Otherwise the record of the Conference would have been unsullied and the nature of the deliberations and speeches delivered would have placed it in the forefront of our political gatherings in Sind."

Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

30. Babu Bepin Chandra Pal was to attend the Sind Provincial Conference by special invitation but the officials did not want him there. They however made a statesmanlike move and expressed their desire to the Conference officials instead of prohibiting him under the Defence of India Act. The Conference authorities asked Mr. Pal not to come to Shikárpur but as there was no legal objection, he went there and was given a grand reception. Without incurring any blame themselves, the officials managed to get the serpent killed at the hands of a third party! We really pity the local leaders for their weakness in falling a victim to the move of the officials.

Sind Moslem (new), 14th Apl.

31. Commenting upon the presidential address at the recent session of the Sind Provincial Conference at Shikárpur, the Sindh Moslem remarks:—"Rai Bahadur Hiranand Khemsing, himself a Hindu and addressing Hindus, could not have done better than that he has done; nor is there much in his utterances that Muhammadans would find fault with, but it would have been only right if he had given some speaking to his hearers on those points the non-settlement of which prevented the Mussalmans from hearing him. Similarly the Rasai, Chapter VIII of Criminial Procedure Code, etc., demanded some notice from the chair. It is a pity the amalgamation of Sind with the Punjab under a Governor in Council with Karáchi and Láhore as the Headquarters of the Government, and having a High Court that could stay during summer at Karáchi, has not found favour with him, though considering all that is common between the two provinces, already there has begun to spring up considerable Hindu feeling in favour of it in the Punjáb. Instead of that the idea of the Rai Bahadur of seeing a Governor in Council for Sind supervising, we suppose, the loading and unloading of camels for Australia at Kiamari is too wild to be taken seriously in any quarter; yet with all that he has done a distinct service to Sind by prominently referring to the Land Revenue policy in Sind, the Ten Years Settlements and the Fallow and Remission rules.......... While on this, we cannot help saying that the two resolutions of the Conference on the introduction of Quran teaching in Vernacular schools and the Moslem representation on the Local bodies are worked in a manner that would not do any credit to 'the patriotism' of their framers or those who passed them. They are too vague and meaningless and any discussion towards the settlement of the Moslem representation on the basis of the resolution would be fruitless."

Comments on the personnel of the Emigration Conference.
Message (5), 20th Apl.

32. "The personnel of Indian representation at the Conference on Emigration to be held in London next month must be hightly flattering to Indian opinion. There is the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State who is no other than Lord Islington, the most estimable and esteemed Chairman of the Public Services Commission, who will be assisted by one India Office official—name unknown. There are then again 'three' officers from India, viz. the most sympathetic Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, now on deputation in London as a representative of India at the Imperial Conference—that most excellent friend and host of Mr. Lionel Curtis,—Sir S. P. Sinha an ex-President of the Congress and Bengal's Advocate General, and Lt.-Col. W. M. Kennedy. The last but not the least important is Mr. N. E. Marjoribanks of the Madras Commission, now so famous all over India for the report on Ceylon Labour recruitment, etc., which he in conjunction with the Honourable Mr. Marakkayar investigated so ably and so zealously under the authority of the Governor-in-Council of Fort St. George, attending the Conference as having expert knowledge of the conditions of recruitment of labour. What an imposing array of stalwarts to represent India at the Conference on emigestion ! Could human intellect and ingenuity go further for a selection of 'infallibles'? Indian opinion, which wasted its lungs for over three months may now go to recuperate its lost vigour and remain fully assured in the unfailing wisdom of the 'Indian representatives.'"

The Americans are angry against Germany for drawing the 'Hindenburg Line' against them, but they themselves have drawn a similar line against the Asiatics.

Young India (10), 18th Apl.

33. Commenting on a recent speech of Mr. Lloyd George, Young India remarks :—"Mr. Lloyd George referred amidst much laughter to 'The Hindenburg Line,' as the most characteristic of all Prussian institutions. He explained this 'Hindenburg Line' as 'a line drawn in the territories of other people with the warning that the inhabitants of those territories cross it at the peril of their lives'.......... It was no doubt too much for the spirited people of the great Western Republic to put up with the insolence of the German military caste which having played fast and loose with the temper of a most docile, peaceful and the most logically minded critic of the war and its calamities, provoked it to a war by drawing a similar line along the shores of America. The Americans could not tolerate the humiliation because it affected their own lives and property. But they would not realise the humiliation to which this great republic—this cradle of the world's freedom and liberty—subjected the non-white people, by drawing a similar line along the shores of India by its anti-Asiatic legislation discriminating against the British Indian subjects of His Majesty. When this legislation was still on the anvil, did the British Ambassador at Washington intervene and tell the Americans that the place for that line is not the Bay of Bengal or the Arabian Sea, but the Pacific and Atlantic Coasts of the United States ? Did the Indian Secretary of State intervene ? Why go so far ? Have we not in the anti-Asiatic legislation in force in the self-governing Dominions, something akin to this 'Hindenburg Line ?' Call it economic necessity or what you will, the fact remains that the self-governing Dominions have drawn the line along the shores of India with the warning that her free subjects cross that line for the Dominions, not at the peril of their lives but at the risk of being turned out on reaching the shores of the Dominions. It is no doubt unexhilarating to remind one self of the presence of this skeleton within the Empire. But there it is, and one has necessarily to take account of it. Thus while the Dominions people are free to come into and go out of India at their pleasure, Indians may not do the same in the Dominions ! In one case, they come for benefitting the country and enriching its people while in the other, the people go to swamp the thin ranks of the settlers !"

The C. I. D. reporters submit mutilated reports to their superiors.

Young India (10), 18th Apl.

34. "A friend of the C. I. D." writes to Young India :—"The C. I. D. gentlemen in this country do not only claim the right to report the speeches of public men at public expense, but would insist on being most conspicuously accommodated. Once comfortably settled in their seats, they take down notes of speeches of great men and small and transcribe them at their leisure. In the act, they omit many things that are said and add many things that are not said.......... They have the happy instinct of understanding what words and sentiments interpolated into the reports are likely to propitiate them with their official superiors and win for them favours. In their present temperament, officials are less likely to perceive the absurdity of such mutilated reports. Where they are particularly biased against public men, discretion and discrimination will be coolly given the go-by. Cases of this kind are too familiar to readers to be recalled here.......... If the authorities in this country were to make a free and frank confession, it should be found that there is hardly a leg on which the case for the officials can rest. The entire method of running the C. I. D. machinery is faulty and instead of proving a blessing to the people it has proved a curse. And the result is that officials have been long living in fool's paradise as it were, without realising that the public discontent has increased under the C. I. D. rule."

The police should start Rescue Homes to assist unfortunate fallen women.
Subodh Patrika (38), 15th Apl.

35. Referring to the recent case in which the Bombay High Court convicted a Pathan and his two female accomplices of the murder of a prostitute, the Subodh Patrika remarks:—The public would never have learnt the details of this ghastly tragedy but for the intelligence of a police sepoy. The much-talked of miseries of the indentured labourers in far off Fiji pale into insignificance before the horrible condition of the unfortunate inmates of the brothels run by the unscrupulous Pathans in Bombay. We understand that the Police maintain a list of these houses of infamy, and it ought not, therefore, be difficult for them to hunt down the criminals who forcibly detain women in the brothels against their will. Their task will be made easier if they enlist the co-operation of our well-to-do benevolent people and start Rescue Homes for assisting these unfortunate women.

Comments on the conviction of Police Sub-Inspector Adsul (Sátára).
Message (5), 18th Apl.

36. "The cause celebre at Sátára in which a Police Sub-Inspector named Mr. Adsul stood charged for rape on a Maratha girl named Jija has ended, and we are glad to see that the offender has been sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment for the offence. The case contained some pathetic incidents, which cannot but move the heart of any one who reads or hears of them. It has also many lessons to teach. One is that Police-officers some of whom may possibly be evilly inclined, should not be given such powers of arrest and temporary imprisonment as will give them easy opportunities for the gratification of their lust, greed or other such passion. If a police officer has the authority to place a young lady in custody and practically control the environment, it is not very surprising that some few of them do abuse their power. The authority of the lower officials needs to be curtailed—that is one lesson. Another is that unless education spreads, there will be found some ladies who will be easily duped into false positions."

A complaint against the state of the tonga service between Kumta and Bhatkal (Kanara).
Kánara News (31), 18th Apl., Eng. cols.

37. "It is a happy thing to see that two companies of tonga service have entered into a competition of running tongas twice a day between Kumta, Honavar and Bhatkal.... ...... As a consequence the passenger traffic is more than doubled and passengers are huddled up together in the rickety tongas and the poor animals drawing them are made to bend down under the heavy burden. It is really a ghastly sight to see the poor animals dragging on an over-loaded tonga along the dusty road.......... We invite the attention of the Pubic Works authorities also to the miserable condition of the seashore road between Kumta and Honavar and Bhatkal.......... The road is not only dusty and feeble but is also extremely narrow and as such prevents two carts from crossing each other with ease. The culverts and drains too are not in good order."

Complaint that the Dharamashala near the Gokak Railway Station has been appropriated by the police for their own use.
Chikitsak (84), 11th Apl.

38. A correspondent writes to the Chikitsak that the Dharamashala close to the Gokak Railway Station has been appropriated by police officers for their own use for the last six or seven months thus putting travellers to considerable inconvenience. He requests that if the building in question is to be no longer available for public use the authorities should make the fact widely known so that people will be saved the trouble of needlessly walking to the place.

Indian journalism is not responsible for the stringent Press laws enacted by the Indian Government.
Gujaráti (12), 15th Apl.

39. Referring to the reply given by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford to the deputation of the Indian Press Association, the Gujaráti remarks that the belief entertained by the Viceroy, that journalists and authors are responsible for the stringency of the law of sedition, is not correct. It wants to know what objectionable writings were published in Indian newspapers or books before the time when the Vernacular Press Act was passed in India. It writes that it behoves Lord Chelmsford to show

[illegible] writings appeared in journals or in books from the time of Lord Ripon, when the Vernacular Press Act was repealed, till the time of Lord Elgin. The paper goes on to suggest that whenever there was agitation in the Indian Press it was not without reasons, and supports itself by maintaining that the prosecution of the Kesari for sedition in the time of Lord Elgin came in the wake of the agitation created by the severe measures taken by Government for the prevention of the plague and that it was the various acts of Lord Curzon ending with the partition of Bengal that had exhausted the public patience during Lord Minto's regimé. It remarks that, instead of relying upon the sound administration of justice, the Indian administrators frightened Lord Morley with the bogey of prestige and succeeded in getting the Newspapers Incitement to Violence Act passed in 1908 and that when the officials failed to carry out their object even with the help of that Act and could not take their stand in courts of law under the Act or under sections 124-A and 153-A of the Indian Penal Code, they got the Press Act of 1910 enacted to make themselves independent of legal tribunals. The paper believes that Lord Chelmsford has been put on the wrong track with regard to the history of the causes that led to the passing of the Press Act. It concludes with observing that if Lord Morley had reversed the partition of Bengal in the year 1907 instead of treating it as a "settled fact" no occasion would have arisen for passing the Acts of 1908 and 1910 above referred to.

Comments on the action of the United Provinces and Punjáb Governments in calling for opinions on the re-commendations of the Public Service Commission.

Indu Prakásh (35), 16th Apl., Eng. cols.

40. Referring to the circulars issued by the United Provinces and Punjáb Governments inviting public bodies to submit their opinions on the Public Service Commission's recommendations, the Indu Prakásh remarks:—"So far as we know, the other Provincial Governments have not yet seen their way to issue similar communiques. But we suppose they will hurry up in the next week or two and discharge this their unpleasant duty even at the eleventh hour, and call upon public bodies here and elsewhere to despatch their suggestions in double quick time so as to make them reach the authorities before 31st May. We fail to understand the raison d'etre of this official secrecy at the beginning and unseemly haste at the eleventh hour. To the public mind such an attitude betrays awful disregard for the convenience and feelings of the public concerned......... They withheld publication of the Report for over two years, even though all India was clamouring for it and led the public to believe that it had been shelved forever in view of the 'changed angle of vision' engendered by the war. This year, when nobody wanted it, they spring a tremendous surprise on the public by publication of the report and are feverishly expediting action on the same, leaving the Indian public at sea whether the post-war reforms that India is to enjoy are to be formulated on the lines of the recommendations of the Commission or whether a further instalment of reform on more generous lines is to come after the war. The Government have never explained their position clearly and have enveloped the whole thing in a fog of mystery and uncertainty."

Praja Bandhu (24), 15th Apl., Eng. cols.

41. "At a recent meeting of the Legislative Council of the United Provinces the Local Government accepted a Resolution by which it agreed to consult the Indian National Congress and the Moslem League Committees as also other public bodies with regard to the Public Service Commission Report before forwarding its own recommendations thereon to the Imperial Government. This is no doubt satisfactory, for it is as it ought to be. We would, therefore, like to see other Provincial Governments following this excellent example of the United Provinces."

Criticism of the Indian Education Service.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 22nd Apl., Eng. cols.

42. Referring to the death of Dr. Wordsworth, late Principal of the Elphinstone College, the Kaiser-i-Hind writes as follows about the development of the young recruit from England to the Indian Education Service:—"As a young man he easily falls under the influence of hardened Anglo-Indians who make him swallow all sorts of absurdities in the name of efficiency, prestige and what not. The result is the young 'professor' soon imbibes a certain lack of sympathy—if not disgust—for his Indian pupils. He feels that his duty is merely to teach in the class-room; he does not care to mix with the students; hence he does not get to know them; but he can always pose in the columns of the Times as a 'man on the spot'. There is a professor in a Government College at Madras who is amiable enough to address his students as niggers, and there is another in South India who openly says, 'we Englishmen never call on Indians.' A joint effect of the above defects is to render an average I. E. S. not merely a harmless failure but a most pernicious influence on the minds of the young. With such boorish teachers, who deserve to be dismissed rather than be paid fat salaries, there is no wonder that the present generation of Indian students tends to be profoundly dissatisfied with the state of things in India,......... There is something wrong with the whole system of recruiting I. E. S.'s. To demand that the candidates for the service must be under thirty, they must be sportsmen, and they must give twelve lectures a week—all this is in flagrant contradiction to the most elementary principles which ought to govern educational appointments. To prefer a third rate sportsman graduate to a first class non-sportsman graduate is a folly committed time and again by the Board at Whitehall. To prefer a raw graduate of 24 to an experienced teacher of 34 is another folly. Both have been so frequently committed that the Indian Education Service has mostly become a soulless service often with more muscles than brains. No wounder that Indians despairingly ask for more Grants and Wordsworths."

Need of placing restrictions on the sale of liquor in India.
Hitechhu (59), 8th Apl.

43. Commenting upon the reply given by Mr. Chamberlain to Sir John Roberts on the question of restricting the sale of country liquor in India, the Hitechhu writes:—The reply is very disappointing. Laying aside the question of furthering the cause of the war there is a great necessity, as remarked by the Modern Review, of placing restrictions upon the sale of liquor. Restrictions have been put on the use of liquor by munition workers in England. Why should not similar restrictions be placed on munition workers in India? Would not restrictions on liquor lead to happy results in India? Does liquor make people sober and virtuous in tropical India?

Strictures on the policy of Government regarding Salt manufacture in Native States.
Message (5), 15th Apl.

44. Commenting on the salt-tax the Message writes:—"We are concerned immediately with the reply which the Honorable Sir George Barnes vouchsafed sometime back to Mr. Wacha's interpellation on Salt manufacture in Native States. The reply was, to say the least, extremely unsatisfactory and unsympathetic. Under certain so-called treaty obligations the Native States are debarred from exploiting to their best advantage certain natural resources including salt.......... We are in all seriousness told that salt is not a Government monopoly. Only the duty is maintained as it might otherwise interfere with its proper collection. However that may be, it is important to note that Government have recognized that salt plays an important part in industrial development, so that any increase in the duty leviable on this important commodity or restriction in its manufacture would necessarily affect it. In view of this, it was expected that instead of curtailing the production on a large scale of this necessary article locally, Government would give all possible encouragement to its manufacture. Those who know of the history of the Salt-tax will recall that free use was made of this article not only for agricultural and industrial purposes but for the better preservation of men and animals. There is abundant testimony to prove that owing to the dearness of salt, the poor people have been put to considerable inconvenience and suffering. Apart from this there is the injustice involved to the Native States. .... The States signed away their rights at a time when conditions were far less conducive to their resisting the influences which were then at work. There is at present hardly one who would agree that it has on the whole been for the good of both.......... It is only a question of two decades when the State of Cutch carried on the most flourishing trade in salt with the African ports. The so-called agreement has put an end to this valuable trade and transferred it to the foreign powers who have retained a footing on the coast strips of this country. It has profited neither the British Government nor the States......... According to Sir George Barnes' reply to Mr. Wacha, if the States were allowed to exercise their national right, it might necessitate the strengthening by the addition of a few more hands to the Department of Salt Revenue to see that a pocketful here or a pocketful there of "Desi" salt was not smuggled into British territory to the great detriment of the Indian revenues! .... In view of the fact that Government have been able to devise safeguards against the smuggling of foreign salt, it is impossible to think that the "wonderful Civil Service" which plays "terrestrial providence" to the poor illiterate ignorant masses cannot discover a means of dealing with the indigenous salt. Consider as we may, the attitude of the Government of India has been most illiberal. Sooner or later there is bound to be a strong agitation against the unjust impost on salt and Government will be called upon to face the problem of finding other sources of income to make good the loss sustained by the abolition of the duty on salt. It would have certainly been an act of statesmanship to recognize this fact and by a stroke of the pen release the States from the unjust and indefensible agreements abrogating their own natural rights."

Bombay license-holders should have one representative on the Advisory Committee.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 20th Apl.

45. While opposed to many of the demands made by the License-holders of Bombay in their memorial to the Collector of Excise against certain recommendations made by the Advisory Committee, the Bombay Samáchár supports their demand for having a representative on the Committee. It is of opinion that the work of the Committee will be greatly facilitated by being in touch with the views of the license-holders and knowing their difficulties. It hopes, therefore, that their request in the matter will be granted.

Need of constructing piers at the ports of Kumta and Tadri (Kanara).

Kánara News (31), 13th Apl., Eng. cols.

46. "The want of piers has been very keenly felt in the case of some of the ports of Ratnágiri and Kánara Districts. So far as North Kánara is concerned, there are no piers or even some convenient landing arrangements in the ports of Kumta, Tadri and Bhatkal. This state of things has been causing a good deal of hardship and inconvenience to the travelling public and trade.......... The hardship to which women passengers are put is simply unsightly.......... Hence it is clear that these ports at any rate do stand in need of strongly built piers for the convenience of the travelling public and trade. Bhatkal may for the present be let alone as we see that the fortunes of the place are likely to take an unexpected happy turn by reason of the Mysore State's intervention. Now as to Kumta and Tadri not to speak of other ports, some practical scheme must be launched to provide them with piers.......... The bodies that may well be approached to participate in the scheme are, in our opinion the following :—(1) The local Municipalities; (2) the Local Boards; (3) the Steamer Company; (4) the Customs Department; and (5) the travelling public. Each of these must be taxed fairly. In the case of the last, something like a paltry poll tax, say at the rate of one anna per head, must be levied and charged on the out-going tickets at each port. The money for the present may be advanced by one or more of the bodies concerned that can afford to do so."

Alleged colour-partiality of the Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 15th Apl.

47. In its "humorous" column the Kaiser-i-Hind, addressing the Chief Presidency Magistrate, asks:—How is it that you mete out uneven justice? A European who committed the theft of a cycle received one day's simple imprisonment with the fine of Rs. 60! While in a case reported on the same day a Hindu employed in the Mint was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for a month and a half for stealing 55 nickel coins! Bravo! Mr. Setelwad, you cannot be said to be specially partial towards the white skin, but even a layman is struck with such difference in the punishment meted out.

EDUCATION.

Comments on the acceptance by the Muhammadan leaders of a Moslem University on the lines of the Benares Hindu Universty.

Islámic Mail (3), 15th Apl.

48. "Nothing can be more welcome news to us than that coming from Aligarh that the leaders of the Muhammadan community have at last decided to accpt the Moslem University on the lines of the Benares Hindu University.......... This is indeed very satisfactory. It is useless for any one to ask at this stage, although he would be quite justified in doing it, as to why this decision was not taken earlier, at the October meeting held in 1915, when the Government of India letter declining any discussion of the subject until and unless the Muhammadans agreed to the terms offered to the Benares University was received. If the committee had taken a sane view then and accepted the University, so much valuable time would not have been lost." [Elsewhere the paper says :—" We for one do not think it was very kind of Government not to have met our demands in a more liberal spirit ; but all the same it is better to have a University and try to gain more in times to come than to have none at all."]

Sindh Moslem (New), 14th Apl.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (20), 22nd Apl., Eng. cols.; Kesari (92), 17th Apl.

49. " There was destined to be one and only one Cardova and that in the West. " The Cardova of the East " was a dream. The zeal of Sir Syed has been trampled upon in his own place by his own people, and the M. A. O. College has, with all it future bombastic transformation fallen from its pedestal of glory and liberty. We must bid good-bye to any hopes and ambitions that we might have focussed round Aligarh and must sigh for the change of the long bold 'No' for the timid 'Yes' in favour of the acceptance of the Moslem University on the lines accepted by our Hindu friends for Benares. Those who talked big and committed themselves, on more than one occasion, in no uncertain terms, against a University that was not to meet the requirements of the Mussulmans, have been the first to turn round and preach the wisdom, if there is any, of something being better than nothing.......... It is indeed sad that the community should be guided by men who have learnt to walk with jerks. These gentlemen committed the Mussulmans, without any serious thought, to a definite political policy and have with another jerk laid down the educational programme, trusting more to the community's good luck than to their own wisdom.......... The Moslem University Association has made itself ridiculous in the eyes of the public and its ungraceful surrender will produce an effect of the greatest weakness in all our future undertakings. Messrs. Wazir Hassan and Company have, with all their good intentions, made many blunders in the past, but none so unpardonable as their method of bringing people round to have a University that never is to answer the needs of the community. These gentlemen whom the Mussulmans have granted too large a charter of liberty of action have busied themselves, like their rival gang, with more of party politics than the needs of the community ; and it remains to be seen whether Lucknow is going to be another Lahore. At any rate it is high time for us to open our eyes. Lucknow has tried to drag us, but are the Mussulmans going to allow themselves to be dragged thus ? " [The Kaiser-i-Hind writes :—" It is not an easy task to appreciate this resolve at its real value. Nor do we find it easy either to offer our whole-hearted congratulations to the Committee or to condemn it absolutely. For there is no denying that the acceptance of the Government conditions means the abandonment of a lofty ideal,—nothing less than the ideal of a University which would be the centre of Muhammadan learning in the whole world,—and the abandonment of a great ideal is always a tragedy in itself. On the other hand it is equally true that at least a little good is better than the whole good, and from this standpoint the Committee have done well to be content with a University, officialised and suffering under galling restrictions indeed, but with vitality enough to encourage Muhammadan learning and to infuse broad ideas of culture into Muhammadans." The Kesari remarks :—The officials do not like the idea of our giving education in accordance with our civilisation at our own expense. But the wise man accepts half when the whole is in danger of being lost. These are the days when we should sink all our differences, and just as the Moslems and the Hindus joined hands at Lucknow and demanded the first instalment of reforms they should unite in educational movements and demand reforms with one voice. An agitation of such a character will never fail.]

Some complaints against the Bombay University.
Sandesh (100), 17th Apl.

50. It is certainly not an agreeable task to have to teach an institution whose function is to teach others. The vagaries of the Bombay University indicate that a screw is loose somewhere in the working of that body. The University while fixing the dates of examinations takes no care to avoid public holidays thus putting candidates to needless inconvenience. Recently the authorities responsible for the conduct of the Matriculation examination at Belgaum made a very bad mistake. In the paper on English the examiner asked two questions giving the candidates the option of answering either of the two. The printer or rather the men responsible for the correct printing of the paper omitted the 'or' between the two questions with the result that candidates had to attempt both the questions! Now we should like to know who is responsible for the loss of valuable time of the candidates and what steps the University takes to see that no undue hardship is put on them. Again the University has fixed the 8th of June as the date on which the result of the Matriculation examination is to be out. A number of students hail from places on the Konkan coast the sea communications of which with Bombay are partially or sometimes wholly interrupted at the advent of the rainyseason, i. e., in the beginning of June. How are the successful students to come to Bombay to join College if the communication is wholly cut off by the time the result is out? Why should not the University appoint extra examiners to expedite the result? These are questions which require an answer from the University.

Protest against an order of the Calcutta University to close private schools not having their own building.
Shetkari (37), 15th Apl.

51. His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's appointment to the Viceroyalty of India led to considerable discussion in the press as to which of his qualifications appealed to His Majesty the King-Emperor and his Ministers. It was argued by some that his best claim to the post of Viceroy of a backward country like India was that he was an ardent educationist. His speech at the convocation as Chancellor of the Calcutta University raised popular hopes that the cause of education would considerably advance during his regime. But in some inexplicable way a statesman brought up in the liberal atmosphere of England soon changes his views on coming to this country. We are confirmed in this opinion by an order recently issued by the Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University requiring the proprietor of every private school either to provide his own building or to close down his institution. Although the order is signed by the Vice-Chancellor it must have previously received the approval of His Excellency the Viceroy who is the Chancellor of the Calcutta University. In our opinion want of its own building is not an adequate excuse for closing down an institution which has been doing useful work. We suspect the real object of the authorities is to discourage private enterprise which helps forward the cause of education. The primary duty of every civilised government in the world is supposed to be to diffuse knowledge in every possible way, but in India it is different. Here education is not only not extended, but steps are taken which appear to be intended to hamper its progress.

The late Dr. Wordsworth.
Gujárati (12), 22nd Apl., Eng. cols.

*52. In a long article on the late Dr. Wordsworth the Gujárati writes:—"Though an official, he never thought that he was bound hand and foot by those silvery fetters and obstacles which have turned officials into easy-going, silent and ever obedient tools during the last few years. In fact, it may be said that he was the last representative of those sturdy, courageous and high-principled Anglo-Indians who boldly spoke out their convictions and righteously stood up for the cause of Indian progress......... Professor Wordsworth had no narrow prejudices about students in their relations to politics and did not impose any bar to their joining in the general movement throughtout the country to pay India's last tribute of respect and gratitude to that Viceroy (Lord Ripon) of imperishable fame. Professor Wordsworth was not afraid of attending the first session of the Congress held in Bombay in 1885 along with Sir William Wedderburn and showing his practical sympathy with the growing aspirations of the people.......... His deep devotion to learning, conscientious industry, magnanimity of heart, indifference to the petty details of what is paraded in these days of narrow-minded officialism as strict discipline, his lofty character, his simple and beautiful life, and his venerable Rishi-like figure—all these were a far more potent educative influence than all the mechanical rules and regulations to which so many little-minded teachers and professors attach excessive importance.......... Dr. Wordsworth is now gone for ever, but his influence and the noble traditions he has left behind in the Elphinstone College will remain. It is men like him that bridge the gulf between Indians and Europeans and make European culture a success in this country by inspiring students with love of learning and enthusiasm for higher knowledge.......... In our opinion University Commissions and their elaborate investigations and reports are of less importance than the personnel of the staff of our colleges and their due equipment. Indians and their children are no barbarians. They have a glorious literature and philosophy of their own and are themselves not morally and intellectually inferior to Europeans. It is, therefore, no use importing tenth-rate professors, some of whom are not endowed with the power of clear elocution and fluent exposition in their own mother-tongue or do not possess those high academic qualifications which alone will inspire students with respect and reverence for their professors and enable the latter to turn out graduates of a higher type."

MUNICIPALITIES.

Comments on Mr. Baptista's failure to secure the Presidentship of the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

Message (5), 19th Apl.; Indu Prakásh (35), 16th Apl., Eng. cols.

53. "It is by no means a strange tale, which Mr. Baptista's letter regarding the last election of the Corporation president discloses.......... The only remedy to the ugly feature of our public life, revealed in Mr. Baptista's letter is to see that nominations are altogether done away with and also that the elected members who are found guilty of selling their conscience are exposed to public contempt and ridicule. At the future election, the people must make it morally impossible for them to get back to the Corporation. The method suggested here applies mutatis mutandis to members of Legislative Councils also, who do greater harm to the community at large by lending a hand in the imposition of reactionary legislation on the people. Unless public opinion is brought round to see the full extent of the iniquity perpetrated by this class of people without a backbone, the harm caused to public interest might one day attain unmitigable proportions." [The Indu Prakásh writes:—"It is melancholy to note, apart from this incident, that, since the death of the Father of the Corporation, the late Sir Pherozeshah M. Mehta, the forces of officialism are coming once more to assert themselves and gain the upper hand over the popular party or rather the remnants of the popular party that once was so strong in the Corporation. The disruptive forces are now actively at work among the popular representatives, since the one personality around which they all rallied has been removed by the hand of death. Mr. Wacha is still amidst them, but his voice is more often than not a cry in the wilderness. Unless the elective element in the Corporation is increased and the official and nominated element lessened, the chances for the future are that this leading Municipal Corporation in the country will become more and more officialised."]

Sandesh (100), 15th Apl.

54. Referring to the defeat of Mr. Baptista in the Presidential election of the Bombay Corporation the Sandesh says that there was no chance of a man of Mr. Baptista's type, specially after he had taken the lead in the Home Rule League, being elected under the present constitution. It says that it is a disgrace to the Bombay leaders that even when the mofussil Municipalities enjoy the right of electing two-thirds of the members they should rest content with the present state of things under which only half of the members of the Bombay Corporation are elected, and it urges them to get the constitution changed.

Protest against the rumoured nomination of Rao Bahadur Artal as President of the Belgaum District Local Board.

Mahrátta (4), 22nd Apl.

*55. "Vox Populi" writes to the Mahrátta from Belgaum:—"The experiment of the non-official President for the District Local Board is going to be tried in Poona, Belgaum and a few other districts.......... It is well known in this town that R. B. R. C. Artal, I.S.O., is in the running for the Presidentship of the District Local Board; and Dame Rumour also says that he has been selected by the authorities with whom the selection lies.......... Mr. Artal's views in respect of the aspirations of the natives and his concurrence in the report of the Lawrence Commission and his deliberate attempt to defy the Government orders in the Vyasantol matter in the closing days of his service, not to take up his previous extremely unpopular career, his defamatory letter to Government in connection with the Karnatac College affair and his subsequent unwilling apology, are all too well known to need repetition. Government are, therefore, given warning betimes so that a proper choice may be made after mature consideration. Any number of better qualified gentlemen can be had in the city and unless Government look upon the post as one of mere honour and not responsibility, they would be committing a grave blunder in nominating Mr. Artal."

The Bagalkot Municipality should not accept certain proposals put forward by the District Deputy Collector.

Karnatak Vaibhav (74), 17th Apl.

56. A correspondent writes:—Last year the Bagalkot (Bijápur) Municipality had sanctioned Rs. 5,000 for a new Dharmsala near the old one, but as the place was found to be unhealthy the scheme was held over. Last month it has decided to build a Dharmsala on the Kaladagi Road at a cost of Rs. 8,000 and it has further resolved to locate the English school therein until new school-buildings are ready. But Mr. Mobedji (the District Deputy Collector) does not like the idea and he proposes that the school should be located in the Haveli bungalow which being useless the Forest Department are about to hand over to the Revenue Department. Mr. Mobedji wants to saddle the Municipality with it at a further cost of Rs. 10,000. It will be impossible for the boys to attend the Haveli bungalow in the rainy season, as there is a river between the bungalow and the city. But Mr. Mobedji has suggested that a bridge should be built over the river. A fine suggestion! The Municipality will have to spend 10 to 20 lakhs for the bridge. The Municipality will be reduced to bankruptcy if it decides to take up the Haveli bungalow for the school. Moreover, as improvements cannot be made in the bungalow without the sanction of Government, there will be delay in carrying them out. What about the school then? The proper course for the Municipality would be to finish the Dharmsala that is being built and use it for the school. The Collector should take proper measures to accommodate the school and he should not consider that his work consists only in criticising the Municipality. The school will go on only if the Collector accepts the arrangements made by the Municipality otherwise it will have to be closed.

Request to Government to take over three-fourths of the expenditure on the Satára water-works.

Shubh Suchak (105), 13th Apl.

57. The Shubh Suchak complains that as out of the sum of two and a half lakhs of rupees which has so far been expended on the new Satara water-works only one half is to be borne by Government and the other half by the Municipality, the latter will be forced to levy a heavy water-rate on the people and also to close the local English school as a large part of the Municipal income will have to be devoted to the payment of the debt of the Municipality. It therefore appeals to Government to take over the payment of [illegible] of the expenditure on the water-works and thus save the English school.

Appeal to Government to restore the municipal franchise to Hyderabad (Sind).

Rást Goftár (27), 15th Apl.

58. The Rást Goftár expresses its approval of the resolution passed by the Sind Provincial Conference at Shikarpur, declaring that the appointment of the Municipal Commissioner for the city of Hyderabad (Sind) was illegal and urging Government to abolish the Committee of Management and to restore the municipal franchise to that city. It hopes that the resolution will not fail to make Government realise that a strong feeling has been aroused in this matter not only among the people of Hyderabad but among the people of the whole of Sind. The paper endorses the opinion expressed by the President of the Conference that the appointment of the Committee of Management has proved to be a remedy worse than the disease. It also holds the belief that if Government will correct their mistake by acceding to the demand made by the people of Sind they will win the confidence of the people of the entire Bombay Presidency with regard to their solicitude for the development of local self-government.

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Reflections on the recent Gandhi incident.

Gujaráti (12), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

*1. "Under the Defence of India Realm Act all kinds of orders have been issued in this presidency and elsewhere upon the strength of what appears to the outside public to be very questionable and even worthless evidence. The British press has been complaining that bureaucrats have become all-powerful and that Parliament has ceased to discharge its proper functions. What has become possible in a country where the people's voice is all-powerful, has become very easy in India. The prohibitive orders issued by the authorities at Dharwar and Belgaum and by the Chief Commissioner of Delhi and the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab are instances in point. The executive authorities have unlimited power and discretion to believe or disbelieve anything or everything quite conscientiously and take refuge under the grandiloquent and comprehensive expression 'public interests' and the aggrieved party has no remedy whatsoever, though he may be quite innocent. The action taken against Mr. Gandhi by the District Magistrate of Champaran is a remarkable illustration of the unjustifiable manner in which unlimited discretionary powers can be used to the detriment of the elementary rights of His Majesty's subjects and of the evils flowing from the combination of executive and judicial functions.......... Mr. Gandhi's case shows how even an Indian like him, who is respected and esteemed throughout the country for his high character, downright honesty and patriotism, can be easily hauled up before a Criminal Court and punished, and how English officials, however exalted, hopelessly fail to understand even a man like Mr. Gandhi and will not hesitate to treat him in a summary fashion under the wonderfully comprehensive and convenient provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in a spirit of distrust and suspicion. It is a painful and humiliating illustration of the official attitude towards non-officials. Indigo planters are a powerful body and we are not surprised that officials who are so slow in the investigation of the grievances of labourers on these plantations should be so quick in ordering Mr. Gandhi to leave the District at once or by the next available train!!......... The news of the proceedings initiated against Mr. Gandhi produced a sensation in the country and it appears from his telegraphic communication to the press that the proceedings against him were withdrawn at the instance of the Indian Government. The withdrawal was all right in the best interests of the country and of the reputation of Government. But as a matter of law and constitutional precedent the intervention of the Indian Government, after Mr. Gandhi had pleaded guilty, was fatal to the independence of the judiciary. There was a series of gross blunders in this deplorable business. Mr. Morshead was hopelessly wrong in the view he took of Mr. Gandhi's mission and inexcusably so in asking the District Magistrate to take action under section 144. The latter wrongly exercised his discretion in sole reliance upon what the Commissioner had illegally and most improperly asked him to do as a District Magistrate. The Deputy Magistrate should have proceeded to enforce the provisions of the Penal Code and not looked up to the higher executive authorities for further instructions. The Government of India had no locus standi whatsoever in the matter. The trial should have proceeded and Mr. Gandhi dealt with according to law after he had pleaded guilty. If that had been done, the stupidity of the proceedings taken against Mr. Gandhi would have been easily exposed in a manner that would have arrested the attention not only of the Indian but also of the British public.......... We are supremely glad a painful agitation throughout the country has been averted at this juncture, but we sincerely wish that the local officials are made to realise the serious responsibility of their most ill-advised, unjustifiable and thoughtless action."

Mahrátta (4), 29th Apl.

*2. "Mr. Gandhi has by his well grounded disobedience secured the hearty blessings of the people. But his success does not end here. The Government of Behár, in addition to the withdrawal of proceedings against him, has promised Mr. Gandhi official assistance during the conduct of his inquiry. New India 'is not quite sure that official help will be on the whole beneficial. We cannot but agree with our contemporary. 'Official help' is not unlikely to spell hindrance in a certain way, especially when the immediate authority of the Division—the Commissioner—has shown by his treatment of Mr. Gandhi that he does not quite appreciate his zeal in investigting the relations between the planters and their tenants. Mr. Gandhi speaks of the issues involved in his enquiry as 'tremendously great'......... No wonder that he speaks of the issues involved as tremendously great. The ryots have evidently a lot to tell of their past and present miseries. The Commissioner knew this state of things. And his object in dissuading Mr. Gandhi from proceeding with his enquiry—what could it be? There was fuel in Tirhut out of which 'an agitator' could make a blazing fire—did the Commissioner think so? Probably he did. Who is responsible for bringing into existence the inflammable material and why has no serious attempt been made heretofore to check its growth? The Planters' Fraternity and the Government of the Province must in our opinion accept a large share of responsibility in this matter.......... We do not propose to pursue this subject further. We are glad to see that the Government of Behár has been able to appreciate the conduct of Mr. Gandhi who has set a noble example for his countrymen to follow. We have reason to assume that Government hold that unreasoning law-abidingness is to be deprecated as prejudicial to the abiding interests of the public. We commend to our people this vital truth for thorough assimilation in their mental constitution. For on the assimilation of this truth depends in a large measure the steady and speedy political progress of every community under the sun."

Message (5), 24th Apl.

3. "We are very much pleased to note that good sense has prevailed with the Behar authorities and that the order so unwisely served on Mr. Gandhi by the Champaran District Magistrate has been withdrawn. We are not yet aware to whom the thanks of the public are due, whether to the Government of India or the Bihar Government. Whosoevers' the credit for this step, we acknowledge it to be a most statesmanlike act. We also hope that it will serve as an example to erratic officials in the future. If the authorities concerned had persisted in adhering to their blunder lest their notion of official prestige should be outraged, we shudder to think what consequences might have followed. From the very outset Mr. Gandhi took up a perfectly constitutional attitude in refusing to abide by an illegal and untenable order. However, now Mr. Gandhi is not only free to investigate the matter but is also to have the 'assistance of officials'. There is clearly room for co-operation between officials and non-officials; but the irony of it all is that the former would not co-operate with the latter, unless the latter are willing to submit to the 'superior' intelligence of the former."

Indu Prákash (35), 25th Apl., Eng. cols.

4. "The incident, though closed, is not without a moral of its own, to the bureaucracy in India on the one side and to Mr. Gandhi's own countrymen on the other. Mr. Gandhi, let us remember, went to his work quietly and without any preliminary ostentatious trumpeting of his intended mission, so much so, indeed, that not more, we suppose, than half a dozen Behar leaders were aware that he was coming.......... The perfectly constitutional political worker that he is, he voluntarily went out and sought the help of the local European official world as well as of the planters. The majority of these Europeans, we take it, must have been quite amazed at the effrontery of a mild looking Hindu, dressed in humbler garments than those donned by their own Indian clerks or even the indigo peasantry over whom they hold sway.......... The official and non-official world of Champaran knew nothing of the tremendous faith of the man in himself and in the righteousness of the cause he had made his own and hence must have thought it an easy matter to dispose of the mild 'Hindu' by an arbitrary order for his deportation. His quiet reply that he meant to stay on, in spite of the order, must have taken the breath away of the official world, accustomed to see their behests invariably carried out by high and low. There is not the least doubt that they would have proceeded to act blindly and punish Mr. Gandhi, had they not been pulled up betimes by the more sagacious hands at Patna or Simla and told in so many words that they were playing with fire."

Young India (10), 25th Apl.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (20), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

5. "Thanks to timely intervention of 'Government'— no matter what Government it is, what threatened to be a serious matter has been averted. Mr. Gandhi is not only free to pursue his independent investigations but he is promised every official assistance! On the withdrawal of the order, Mr. Gandhi sent a message to the Indian press and the public. It is evident that he has taken the matter in a sporting spirit and bears no rancour or malice against any officials directly or indirectly connected with the affair. We would commend his magnanimity to the notice of our bureaucratic officials. If the officials worked in that spirit of open-mindedness, many of the difficulties would automatically disappear and they can carry on their administrative work better and introduce more vigour and efficiency into it. [The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"A more inexpedient or untenable order could barely have been passed. It speaks volumes for the statesmanship of the Government that this unjust order has been cancelled, and the shibboleth of prestige has not been allowed to add insult to injury."]

Kesari (92), 24th Apl.; Dnyán Prakásh (33), 24th Apl.

6. Mr. Gandhi has gained a moral victory over the Magistrate of Champaran but we cannot but feel exasperated that one more instance of the misuse of the Police Act (sic) has occurred. It is undoubtedly criminal for the officials who preach law to the people themselves to act illegally. We are sorry that people have no power to punish the official who wilfully commits such a crime under the present irresponsible Government. The illegality of an order is not washed off because some section is quoted in the beginning of it. It is most daring to allege that an inquiry carried on by a peace loving man like Mr. Gandhi would result in riots. We are surprised and sorry to see that the vaunted benevolence of the officials shown when they take up the cause of tenants as against the Zemindars, vanishes whenever there is disagreement between the planters and indentured coolies. What obtains in Fiji is to be found in India also more or less, and planters in India also will oppose the abolition of indentured slavery. But have not Government got an independent conscience? What does it advise? [The Dnyán Prakásh says:—We congratulate Government on the foresight and statesmanship displayed by them in withdrawing the order about Mr. Gandhi. Mr. Gandhi had decided to disobey the order and his countrymen would not have put up with the dishonour quietly. If the order had not been withdrawn passive resistance might have perchance been proclaimed. The Behar Government admit that the condition of the Champaran District has become very bad during the last ten years. The Gourlay Report was never published and though some changes in the coolie contracts have been made by the Behar Government as suggested by Mr. Gourlay, the rayats are not satisfied and an independent inquiry is needed. Government have however left the inquiry in the hands of the Settlement Officer. It would be a blunder if Government think that it is a private question between the planters and Government. As Government want to improve the relations between the planters and the coolies they should be glad that Mr. Gandhi is conducting an inquiry.]

Hindusthan (16), 23rd Apl.; Sánj Vartamán (28), 23rd Apl.; Jam-e-Jamshed (19), 24th Apl.

7. We are very glad that the notice against Mr. Gandhi has been withdrawn. The Government of India or the Government of Bihar and Orissa, whoever are responsible for the withdrawal of the notice, deserve to be congratulated, for they have shown that they can act contrary to the usual practise of upholding the mistakes committed by their executive officials. If the notice had not been withdrawn the impression would have gained ground among the people at large that officials can prevent private individuals from conducting independent inquiries into mismanagement prevailing in any industry, to say nothing of Government departments. We hope Government officials will take a lesson from the incident and think twice before resorting to any misuse of their powers [The Sánj Vartamán expresses gratification at the withdrawal of the notice against Mr. Gandhi and adds:—The incident shows how backward the officials are in appreciating or understanding the motives of popular leaders. We hope Government will take the official to task who had not the patience to make any inquiry before expressing his doubts about so selfless and public spirited a man as Mr. Gandhi and asking him to leave the place. The Jám-e-Jamshed also congratulates Government on the withdrawal of the notice and believes the unfortunate incident would have been avoided if the local officials had acted with forethought.]

Mr. Gandhi's activities in Bihar.
Message (5), 26th Apl.

8. The Bankipur correspondent of the Message writes:—" Mr. Gandhi had come to investigate personally what was really happening in the indigo plantations in Behar—Champaran and Motibari. The happenings there will certainly be enough to supply materials for hundreds of Nildarpans (the Bengalee book which did away with indigo troubles in Bengal and which may be compared to Uncle Tom's Cabin). There have been riots and there have been enquiries. We have heard hundreds of stories, but they are to be talked of only in the bathing ghats in whispers as the Bengalee ladies of Rev. Lalbehari Dey's 'Bengal Peasant Life' did about the Police doings. If we give vent to them publicly we are interned or jailed or deported outright.......... Before a dozen people in Bankipur could know it, Mr. Gandhi had left for Muzafferpur to see the high officials first before seeing the Motibari and Champaran villagers, who are so sore about being ill treated by their well-wishers, the well meaning European planters.......... I may note in passing that I read in the Calcutta Sanjibani and perhaps the cursed Amrita Bazar Patrika that Mr. Maitland, a young civilian, who had the audacity of marrying a black girl, the daughter of Mr. P. K. Roy (Principal, Presidency College, Calcutta, for sometime Registrar, Calcutta University and Inspector of Colleges) and had been posted in the planters' district of Behar, had to be transferred to the malarious marshes of Bengal, as the planters objected to Mr. Maitland staying in their midst. I mention this to inform your readers how powerful and entirely impartial our great planter friends are. Motibari (Champaran) is the hot-bed of indigo ryot budding agitation and half published complaints. There again about 10 years or so ago, big riots took place and the peasants, who as usual must be entirely in the wrong, caused agitation and riots, saying, falsely no doubt, that the European planters had ill-treated the ryots. The Government, it was the Bengal Government then, appointed Mr. Gourlay (now private Secretary to the Governor of Bengal) to enquire into the matter. Mr. Gourlay most unfortunately could not understand the great and marvellous work that the planters were doing in Behar and specially in Champaran and Motibari. Mr. Gourlay is said to have reported something which went against the most benevolent planters. The Government, however, was not at all foolish or unwise. The Government only let off the peasants who had been sent to long terms of imprisonment. This was thought unwise by all Anglo-Indians and their friends in the press and by all good loyal Indians. The Indian papers like the Amrita Bazar Patrika and the Bengalee appealed and prayed for the publication of the report, but the Government, who know what is what, never published the report. The High Courts and the local Courts are not at all foolish and they never go against the good planters. Still the Indian agitators clamoured for the publication of the report of Mr. Gourlay. The Government, however, kept it hidden in the stomach of a certain fish like the life-giver golden key of the princess of the folk-tales. I just forget the name of the most turbulent leader of the rebelling ryots—some Rai perhaps. He was proclaimed and at last caught and sent to jail. But the Government committed an error in letting him off, too, after reading the Gourlay report. Sometime before there was the murder of Mr. Bloomfield, a most benevolent 'Ma-Baap' of the indigo ryots by some of the peasants.

Mr. Saroda Charan Mittra, 'Swadeshi' Judge, reduced the sentences of the accused to 10 or 14 years' rigorous imprisonment from transportation for life. The European papers as the true friends of India rated Mr. Justice Mittra for not hanging all the 14 or 15 villagers.......... Such are some of the incidents of the planters' proceedings. Very recently a Hindi pamphlet was issued asking the readers to collect information or something like that about the alleged oppression upon the ryots. Of course our strong and very wise Government at once suppressed and forfeited the booklet. The Amrita Bazar Patrika again strongly commented on this action of the Government. It is said that a high placed Civilian went to Calcutta for a few days to ask Lord Carmichael to check and curb the Patrika but I fear with little effect. Of course this was very wrong of the Government of Bengal. He ought to have at once deported or interned the editor of Patrika and stopped the paper. But nothing of the sort was done. We Beharees all hate newspapers like the Patrika as it speaks against our most benevolent planter friends and some of the strong-minded officials.......... Mr. Gandhi thought that the Behar Government would be as weak as the South-African Government. But that is not so. Our officials are as strong and unbending as adamant itself and they have shown their strength in the Gandhi affair.......... The Behar leaders, instead of condemning the action of Mr. Gandhi, have gone to Motibari to support him. Thus they have shown their ungratefulness to the Government who have given them such an excellent University.......... Mr. Polak came back to Bankipore and met the local leaders in a meeting in the Jubilee Club. He explained everything and urged all the leaders to go to Motibari to support Mr. Gandhi. I wonder why the Police did not intern Mr. Polak or at least prevent him from speaking in the meeting.......... Why should the Behari leaders think of anything else except the War Loan? I very much deplore the action of the Behari leaders in thus going against the Government. They ought to have passed a vote of censure against Messrs. Gandhi, Brajkishore, Rajendra Prasad, Polak and Mazahrul Haq who went to Motibari to support Mr. Gandhi. They may be deported or interned as the result." [The same letter contains the following paragraph:—"The Sub-divisional officer of Gopalgunge (Sewan, Chapra) was trying a case when a witness made some foolish answers. The Magistrate in his rage struck the witness, who was a female, with a cane that was on the table and she began to bleed. The Magistrate is a European. The Sub-Divisional Officer was good enough to say that the witness could appeal to the District Magistrate against him. Of course the witness has done nothing of the kind."]

Bombay Government is helping Sir Valentine Chirol against Mr. Tilak in the defamation case.
Kesari (92), 24th Apl.

9. Mr. Tilak has filed a suit for defamation against Sir Valentine Chirol in the London High Court and both the parties are engaged in making preparations for the hearing. Sir Valentine has been staying for the last so many days in India for it and is collecting evidence in support of his own side. It is a point for consideration what and how much help should be given to him by the officials. One cannot much complain about his entertainment as a guest by the officials as it is impossible fully to distinguish between the private and the official relations of any one. We would not have said anything if Sir Valentine Chirol had confined himself to initiating his hosts into the secret problems of high politics in exchange for his entertainment. It is, however, improper for Government officials to help Sir Valentine Chirol in the defamation case as the suit filed by Mr. Tilak is of a private nature. The reader might remember the interpellation in the Bombay Legislative Council about the assistance given by Government to Sir Valentine by supplying him with Government translators. Much more Government help in being given to him now. We learn from reliable sources that the Bombay Police, ordinary and C. I. D., are collecting evidence in favour of Sir Valentine as if it were Government work. Official documents are being freely made available to him, and the Police officials have taken up the work of collecting oral evidence and people are being sent for by them. We must say that the whole thing is improper and shameless. It may be that a particular Police official is a friend of Sir Valentine, but when the entire Department is engaged in the work, why should we not say that the Bombay Government itself is interested in it? Mr. Tilak has sent an application to His Excellency the Governor about the affair; let us see if it will have any effect.

Hindusthán (16), 27th Apl.

10. The Hindusthán remarks that Sir Valentine Chirol has come to India for the purpose of collecting evidence in the defamation case brought against him by Mr. B. G. Tilak and the fact that he is entertained at the different Government Houses in India, when he has come to this country on such a private purpose is likely to create a very bad impression on the mind of the public. It says it does not know of the Bombay Government have learnt a lesson from an interpellation put some time ago in the local Legislative Council about Sir Valentine engaging the services of two clerks from the office of the Oriental Translator to Government for the purposes of his case. The paper then refers to a petition recently addressed by Mr. Tilak to the Bombay Government complaining against the action of the police in summoning private individuals and ascertaining from them what evidence they would give if they were summoned as witness before the Commission that might hold its sittings in India in connectionwith the abovesaid defamation case, and observes that it cannot comprehend why the police should interfere in this case. It further writes:—Does it not constitute partiality or injustice if one party to a case suffers harm as a result of the police helping the other party? Do not the efforts of the Police, in (specially) helping a private individual as they have been doing in the present case, transgress the immutable and sacred principle of dispensing equal justice to all, prince or peasant alike? We are confident that the Bombay Government will make due inquiries into the matter and will prevent the members of the police force from taking such part in future not only in this but in all other private cases.

Adverse comments on the explanation given by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab of the prohibitory orders issued by his Government against Messrs. Tilak and Pal.

Mahrátta (4), 29th Apl.

11. "The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb in the course of his speech closing the Budget discussion gave an explanation of the orders he issued prohibiting Messrs. Tilak and Bipin Pal from entering his province.......... Leaving apart the fact that Mr. Tilak and Mr. Pal never intended to visit the Punjáb, it will be clearly observed that the Punjáb ruler has a very poor opinion of the community he rules over, and holds very antiquated reactionary views as to what is reasonable or otherwise in political discussion. We will remain within the British Empire, but we will not remain mere 'hewers of wood and drawers of water': that is the burden of the 'agitation' carried on by Mr. Tilak and Mr. Bipin Pal and others of their faith. When the Punjáb ruler expects that such an innocent legitimate expression of opinion would be 'interpreted' by the Punjab audiences as a call to take up arms against the British to drive them out of India—well we leave the Punjabees to judge whether a ruler who holds such a contemptuous opinion of the understanding of the people he is appointed to govern deserves their good will and esteem. Since the message of Home Rule is being delivered to the people of India from the platforms of the various political conferences, in addition to its daily repetition in the Press of India, it is, we think, futile on the part of the Punjáb ruler or the ruler of any other province to dub Home Rule discussion on the lines advocated by the leaders of the movement as 'unreasonable'. No sane person can support such an unreasonable view. If every movement that any ruler seeks to stifle or repress is to be regarded as 'unreasonable' on the authority of the erratic ruler, progress would be an impossibility."

Comments on Mr. Lionel Curtis' "Letter to the People of India".

Message (5), 24th Apl.; Young India (10), 25th Apl.

12. "Mr. Lionel Curtis, who attained a great deal of notoriety by his 'Private' letter, has attempted a belated apologia in his 'A letter to the People of India'. Apart from the irrelevance of the attempt, the letter is impertiment enough, if we are to construe it as a reply to his critics and as an attempt to insinuate himself into the favour of Indian opinion. Although

Mr. Curtis appears in the pages of the pamphlet in a penitent spirit and in a somewhat chastened mood, we are of opinion, after a close and most careful reading of the letter, that Mr. Curtis' sole desire is to reinstate himself in public favour, somehow. Notwithstanding his professions of honest regret for his hasty and ill-understood conclusions, we are constrained to think that in this letter Mr. Curtis has attempted merely to practise dissimulation. His equivocal or onesided assumptions, his over-cautious suggestions and ill-concealed hints, all go to make the letter worthless and the public would be foolish if it accepted it as a genuine document inspired solely by the most altruistic considerations. Mr. Curtis, who (sic), thanks to the lift given by 'Meston, Marris and Chirol' and the patronage extended to him by such a generous host as Lord Chelmsford, sprang into some notoriety in the early days of the discovery of his still more notorious super-journalistic effervescence. He has apparently come to regard himself as a great man, a very heavenly light, to lead the submerged people of Asia and Central Africa to their appointed destiny. We might have well overlooked the stupidity of such an assumption, had it not been for the fact that he has been pitted against the representatives of Indian nationalism by the official hierarchy in this country...... ... The whole story now put forward seems us to be a mere fib, concocted to deceive the public. It is absurd to contend, as Mr. Curtis does here, that he and his friends are injured innocent persons, deliberately misrepresented by the whole Indian journalistic fraternity for ends of its own." [The Young India has a long article on the subject on much the same lines.]

Mahrátta (4), 29th Apl.

13. "As Mr. Curtis says, we are living in times when events are forcing decisions upon us. Let us assure Mr. Curtis that it is with no preconceived prejudice against the Colonials that we refuse to be drawn into the New Building proposed by him. It is events that have forced upon us this decision. Our freedom is at stake and we cannot sanction any arrangement which is likely to prejudice our progress towards Freedom. 'No fresh alien masters' is our first political tenet, and this has been burnt into our brains by unpleasant experiences extending over a long period. 'Home Rule for India' or 'our rule in our Home' is our second tenet. And 'Real Federation, no sham' or 'Home Rule before Federation' is our third tenet. This is the Trinity that receives the homage of 'Nationalist' India. Mr. Curtis, therefore, will, in our opinion, be well advised to modify his scheme in the light of these facts, if he desires to take Indian Nationalists with him."

Kesari (92), 24th Apl.; Dnyan Prakásh (33), 20th Apl.

14. Commenting on Mr. Curtis' open letter to the people of India the Kesari remarks:—We accept Mr. Curtis' explanation as frankly as it is tendered. It is unfortunate that there should have arisen a good deal of misunderstanding that necessitated the present explanation. But Mr. Curtis himself was responsible for it. Mr. Curtis spoke and wrote ambiguously about the rights of Swarajya to be given to India, and in addition, made a distinct demand for the control of the internal affairs of India by the colonies. Mr. Curtis now himself admits that the previous letter was hastily writen and that Sir James Meston and Mr. Marris had therefore to suffer. Such mistakes may occur on account of inordinate haste but how can people be blamed if they drew the plain inference of a conspiracy between these persons? We do not wish to prolong the controversy as Mr. Curtis has expressed his repentance. We shall not be sorry if the Colonies controlled Indian affairs provided India is given equal rights. We shall never consent to the enjoyment of rights by the Colonies which are denied to India. Mr. Curtis strongly advocates in his present explanation that the rights of swarájya should be granted to India. Formerly he held a different opinion and now he has changed it. The strong criticisms to which his former letter was subjected had something to do with the change. The misunderstanding arose because he did not express himself so clearly in his former letter. In January last Mr. N. C. Kelkar saw Mr. Curtis when the latter after declaring that the civilians would never voluntarily part with their authority, assured the former that he would wield his pen with all the force it had in the cause of swarájya for India. Mr. Curtis need not suppose that he has been permanently classed as an enemy of India and we accept the assurance given in the explanation that Mr. Kerr and Mr. Curtis are Home Rulers and friends of India. It is not possible to expect similar views from the white officials. We hope that the new ideas accepted by Mr. Curtis will develop on the same lines and that the fact of his being a Home Ruler will be fully proved in his new book on 'India's place in the Empire' shortly to be published. [The Dnyán Prakásh writes:—Mr. Curtis says:—'We in England have fallen into the habit of writing in one way when we are talking of the Dominions and in another when we are talking of India and Egypt. We Englishmen have got to write to our Indian fellow citizens exactly as we write to each other.' Mr. Curtis' frankness is very commendable and it would be very easy to promote cordial relations between the officials and the educated classes if his advice is accepted and acted up to by his countrymen.]

Suggested compulsory retirement of Mr. Wood, Principal of Roorkee College.

Mahrátta (4), 29th Apl.

15. Commenting on a speech said to have been made by Mr. Wood, Principal of the Roorkee College, to his pupils, the Mahrátta writes:—"Leaving Police pranks alone and speaking seriously of Mr. Wood's observations, we cannot but agree with the Leader and other contemporaries that Mr. Wood has proved by his irresponsible talk that he is unfit to remain a teacher of Indian students. For a teacher to fulfil his functions properly, there must be between him and his pupils a certain amount of mutual love and respect. When a European principal trots before his Indian pupils the good form and bad form trivialities of the schools and colleges in England and tells them in 'intimate' terms that they a 'crooked' set and their parents and guardians 'no gentlemen' at all, but despicable intriguers—well it is a case for serious consideration by the authorities. The Indian atmosphere is too much 'saturated' with the New Spirit to connive at such intimacies of the super-arrogant 'white-skinner'. If Mr. Wood remains in his place, i.e., if Government takes no notice of his arrogant silliness, much food will be given for discontent to feed and thrive on. Men like Mr. Wood by their silly effusions only foment undesirable race-antipathies and ought to be removed, as the Chronicle says, to spheres where the temptation to talk 'intimately' may be a matter of no importance. Let us see what the United Provinces Government does."

Indu Prakásh (35), 25th Apl.

16. Mr. Wood Thomson, Principal of the Rurkee College, declared in the presence of his students that most Indians cannot claim to be gentlemen. We have of course been told ere this that we are a set of lying rogues and it is no new compliment that Mr. Thomson has given us. We are frankly of opinion that India is not the place for men like Mr. Thomson and they cannot too soon be packed off from this country. Perhaps these people are taken in by the blandishments of Germany and come here to forment disaffection among loyal Indians.

The educational policy of the British Government contrasted with that of the Indian Government.

Gujaráti (12), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

17. "There is a strong and widespread feeling in the Allied countries that the present war is bound to be followed by an economic struggle in which Germany will endeavour not only to recover the lost industrial ground but also to attain predominance in trade and industries throughout the world.......... The latest and the most interesting illustration of this spirit of wide-awake and prompt statesmanship is to be found in the education estimates recently introduced in the House of Commons by Dr. Fisher, which exceed those of last year by £ 3,829,000. His proposals were unanimously approved and are described as marking a new educational era.......... What a significant contrast do we see here between the noble and courageous policy that is being pursued in England for enhancing national efficiency and the disappointing attitude of the Government in India which hugs to its bosom the motto 'hasten slowly' in everything? While our Goverment is perpetually slow, hesitating and postponing, the British Parliament approves of education estimates which in a single year of war involve an increase of 5¾ crores of rupees! We hope our Goverment will catch some of the noble spirit of His Majety's Government and exchange its present policy of delay and doubt, for one more enlightened, sympathetic, courageous and energetic."

The Shiwaji festival in Bombay.
Message (5), 25th Apl.

18. "Under the auspices of the Utsava Mandala, the Shiwaji festival was celebrated with much eclat at the Shri Krishna Lodge during the last three days. In all self-governing countries people are taught to respect the past 'heroes' and patriots, but in countries like India to publicly honour Shiwaji's memory is to have one's name written down in the Black List. That is due to the misconception in the minds of some officials, who think or pretend to think, that those who honour Shiwaji's memory go in for rebellion like Shiwaji. These officers do not know that patriotism finds expression in different ways in different times and that a patriot of to-day does not necessarily fight with the enemies with which his ancient predecessors fought, nor does he use the same weapons. English patriots in the 17th and 18th centuries and the first quarter of the 19th century fought against France. Now Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Asquith and other good and true English patriots support France. The Scotch under Wallace fought against England, but now they are one of the best and the greatest fighting assets of the British Empire. Formerly people used lances and swords, now they use aeroplanes, dreadnoughts and other instruments of destruction. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if Indian patriots, who celebrate the Shiwaji festival, do not object to politically associating with Englishmen, whose ancestors were subjected to loot at Surat by Shiwaji or again, the present admirers of Shiwaji use contitutional political agitation, instead of a Waghnakh or a dagger, as the weapon to be used in subduing enemies. We, for one, like to fancy that if Shivaji could, like Christ, resurrect to-day, the blessed Resurrection would not mean insurrection against the British but taking the lead of a Home Rule League and carrying on its work with the same spirit of self-sacrifice and zeal, combined with self-discipline and wisdom, which he brought to bear in the establishment of a Mahratta Empire. And we appeal to all those who admire Shiwaji to prove themselves worthy worshippers of their idol by doing what he would have wished them to do under the present circumstances, namely, devoting themselves to the promotion of the Home Rule League propaganda."

Comments on the Sanitary Commissioner's remarks on the reports of the Pilgrim Committees.
Kesari (92), 24th Apl.

19. The Government of India must have seen from the various reports of the Pilgrim Committees appointed by them that people are discontented everywhere with the pilgrims being made to travel in overcrowded goods waggons by many of the Railway companies. The South India Railway Company has however proved that sufficient number of passenger cars can be provided to cope with the pilgrim traffic. The reports also show that the people have all along been holding Government responsible for the zoolum of the Railway Companies. Government will, therefore, we hope, take the necessary steps to stop the use of goods waggons for the pilgrim traffic. Other suggestions by the Committees about the supply of drinking water, etc., are likely to be given effect to early. We do not agree with the Committee's allegation that pilgrims themselves are to blame for overcrowding in pilgrim trains. As there is no proper arrangement for starting special trains and for notifying their times of starting everybody tries to leave by the first available train and so there is overcrowding. We suggest that some definite rules about these special trains should be issued. The Sanitary Commissioner criticises severely the municipal officials at the places of pilgrimage, while reviewing the reports of the Committees, and suggests that Government officials should be appointed at these places. We must strongly protest against this. Do not the municipal officials act according to the recommendations of the Sanitary officials? When the Governor's visits coincide with the pilgrim season, these officials make special arrangements for the occasion and incur heavy expenditure, and neglect their duties at normal times. Why should the municipal officials alone therefore be blamed? It is true that the municipal Presidents are not experts in sanitary matters but if Government experts will not fail in giving them proper advice there will be no occasion for raising any complaint about bad arrangements. Is the condition of Pandharpur as bad as it was in 1873? And, if so, are not Government also partly responsible for it? The root of the trouble will be found in the small sums of money spent by the Government of India on sanitation. Why should the poor non-official Presidents come into trouble for it?

Comments on the proposed issue of one-rupee currency notes.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 27th Apl.

20. The Bombay Samáchár confidently believes that the Indian Finance Member will, before arriving at a decision, bestow careful attention upon the suggestion, made to him during his recent visit to Bombay, advocating the issue of two and a half rupee instead of one rupee currency notes. It also seems to endorse the belief that the issue of any such notes had better be postponed till the return of more favourable times. The paper goes on to recount the advantages arising from currency notes of small denominations being in sufficiently large circulation in the country, including the facilities they accord to petty traders, and then dwells on the necessity of providing adequate facilities in small towns and villages for cashing these notes. It remarks that at some places people have to pay a small discount for cashing currency notes, which amounts to a sort of tax upon those who hold them. As one of the means of providing the facility above referred to the paper suggests that orders should be issued directing Post Offices, big and small, to keep on hand sums larger than those they have been keeping at present for enabling the public to cash their currency notes there.

Comments on the resolution of the Imperial War Conference recommending the grant of representation on the Imperial Conference to India.

Message (5), 25th Apl.

21. "The resolution which has been passed by the Imperial War Conference to modify the resolution of the Imperial Conference dated April 28th, 1907 (?), so as to permit of India being fully represented in all future Imperial Conferences is consistent with the promise of the Imperial and Indian Governments contained in the latter's acceptance of Mr. Shafi's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council. The resolution was moved by Sir Robert Borden and seconded by Mr. Massey. The former is the Premier of Canada and the latter of New Zealand and the spirit evidenced by these two gentlemen shows that they are in full sympathy with Indian aspirations. In the past also, it appears to us, much of their misunderstanding India was due to ignorance and the opinion fostered by super-journalists of the type of Mr. Curtis and reactionary Anglo-Indian bureaucrats. The war has given the much-needed opportunity to obliterate the differences and remove the misunderstandings and establish a closer interest in Indian questions. We invite the attention of the Imperial and Indian Governments to the wording of the resolution which demands India being fully represented. And we hope that, when the time comes for action, the two Governments concerned will not go on tinkering with the problem of Indian representation by nominating persons who are likely to echo the views of the Delhi and Simla Secretariats."

Rást Goftár (27), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

22. "The resolution of the War Conference marks an important step forward in the general present-day movement to consolidate the Empire and to knit its composite parts into an united whole. For India it is a great concession which has been attained without direct preparatory effort. And the attainment is due to the loyal support of the Indian nation in the prosecution of the war, and the valorous deeds of Indian warriors who have fought shoulder to shoulder with their fellow-citizens of the Empire."

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 24th Apl.; Bombay Samáchár (53), 26th Apl.; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 26th Apl.

23. The Praja Mitra and Pársi expresses gratification at the resolution recently passed by the Imperial War Conference to bring about an amendment in the resolution, passed by the Imperial Conference that met in the year 1907, so as to enable Indian representatives freely to take part in all future Imperial Conferences. It welcomes Reuter's announcement to the effect that His Majesty's Government have already commenced taking steps to give practical shape to the above-mentioned resolution. According to the paper the resolution demonstrates that the talk about the recent change in the angle of vision of the British and Colonial statesmen towards India is not an exaggeration and that the Indian representatives at the present War Conference have been able to prove that India is qualified to take an equal part with other members of the Empire in such Imperial Conferences. It then refers to the efforts that are being made at present by the Canadians to secure a repeal of restictions upon Indian immigration and, in view of this changed attitude of the colonials towards the Indians, hopes that the former will be glad to see that India gets an equal share in the federated parliament of the whole British Empire that is going to be formed after the termination of the war. [The Bombay Samáchár remarks that the people of India will thank the Imperial War Conference for their present resolution with regard to India. It observes that the passing of this resolution augurs nothing but a bright future for the country. The Jám-e-Jamshed also expressed its joy at the resolution passed by the War Conference, in which it finds the recognition of India as a useful partner in the British Empire. It highly commends the decision of the All-India Congress Committee to send to England, at the present favourable juncture, an Indian deputation to create a wider awakening among the British people with respect to the wants and aspirations of the Indians.]

The Indian Defence Force illustrates the adage about the mountain in labour.

Sind Advocate (7), 12th Apl.

24. Referring to the Indian Defence Force, the Sind Advocate writes :—"Now it is being stated that only 6,000 men are required from all India!!! That would be a veritable ridiculus mus, a mountain in labour bringing forth a mouse! It is like taking away with the left hand what is given by the right. It is like a huge joke if at all the reports current do represent the views of Government. We are afraid this sort of illiberality will cool the ardour of many in the matter of the war loan, etc. We trust the Government of India will rise equal to the occasion and make the Defence of India Force worthy of India and worthy the name. Six, ten or twenty thousand is too despicable a number to be entrusted with the defence of this country in the event of war progressing or possibly coming nearer to us."

Indu Prakásh (35), 26th Apl., Eng. cols.

25. Referring to the rules about the Indian section of the Defence Force, the Indu Prakásh writes :—"There is no disguising that the initial enthusiasm roused over the scheme has been well-nigh smothered by the ungenerous restrictions now imposed. But the duty of Indians at this moment is clear, in spite of all disappointments. They must offer themselves for enlistment at whatever sacrifice and make up the Defence Force, without delay.......... When the position of soldiers in the Indian Army comes to be reconsidered at the end of the war, as it is bound to be, the presence of intellectual classes in the force will go a long way to secure the redress of the grievances of the Indian 'sepoy' class. Perhaps, after all, it is a good thing that the authorities have not put the men of the new Defence Force in any higher position than that of the mere sepoy, whom we are disposed to look down upon. These 'sepoys' are our own countrymen and to claim a more privileged position for the so-called 'intellectual' classes, merely on the ground of our supposed intellectual and educational superiority, would be unfair to these less educated classes.......... It is on this account that we would deprecate any movement tending to keep down the sepoy class in their old rut and confer privileges, pecuniary and otherwise, on their fellow-countrymen of the educated class. If the position of Indians in the army is to be improved, let it be improved as a whole, even if we have to wait till the end of the war to witness this consummation devoutly desired."

Comments on the proceedings before the Bombay Exemptions Tribunal under the Indian Defence Force Act.

Rást Goftár (27), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.; Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 29th Apl.; Eng. cols.

*26. "The Exemption Tribunal has to deal now and again with applications of a very ridiculous character; but in the point of absurdity the audacious statement made last week by the General Manager of the firm of Messrs. Carew and Company, Limited, Distillers, would be hard to beat......... The cry of the hour is to suppress the sale and supply of liquor generally and to discourage its use among soldiers. Even Russia, with its steam-roller tendencies has put a ban upon the noxious beverage—vodka. And here we have the representative of a distillery putting forward in all seriousness the plea of its work being of national importance and imperative necessity!......... We trust the Tribunal will admit no such flimsy excuses. The Times of India recently inveighed in very strong terms against exemption granted on any but national grounds; and the Tribunal must once for all wake up to the exigencies of the times." [The Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—"More than being surprised at the manner in which the Tribunal is dealing with the cases that come up before it, we are astonished at the spirit of the young Britons who appear before the Tribunal pleading for exemptions on personal grounds.......... We are all asked to make sacrifices for the sake of the great cause. Have not the appeals of the Empire's leaders reached the ears of Bombay Englishmen? We think those who appear before the Tribunal with trumpery excuses present a sorry spectacle to Indians and forget all about 'prestige' and 'superiority'"].

Indu Prákásh (35), 21st Apl. Eng. cols.

27. "The attacks in the local press have evidently brought the Tribunal to a correcter frame of mind than that which they gave an exhibition of during the opening days. Exemptions were granted wholesale to commercial staffs and individual traders, if they merely suggested that the business they were engaged in would suffer....... To read all the excuses put forward would induce the Indian reader to conclude that the whole European mercantile community of this city was more concerned about the safety of its own petty shops than the safety of the Empire. Of course, there were honourable exceptions, but the burden of the song of the majority was the same as pointed out and the way the Tribunal proceeded in the earlier days with its dispensations seemed more to encourage such a 'slacker' spirit than otherwise......... The effect of such leniency on the Indian public, which is urged from the house-tops to make all sorts of sacrifices for the sake of the Empire, will not be a healthy one. Example is always better than precept. In this connection the Indian public is shocked to find an 'Interested Matron' of European nationality come forward to attack (in print) the Tribunal for its so-called over-strictness in matters of exemption. Overstrictness indeed! .... May we remind this indignant matron that if the Tribunal follows her sagacious advice not only India will be no place for Englishmen and English-women, but the British Isles too will be no place for them, for the Hun would be installed there as well as here!"

India is too poor to make a war contribution of one hundred millions sterling.

Message (5), 22nd Apl.

28. "Though Indian opinion has now fairly reconciled itself to the gift of a hundred millions to the Imperial Government with which the Government of India startled the whole country, it is with a certain amount of pathetic interest that we endorse the following remarks of the Manchester Guardian. 'Why was this matter of financial contribution from India raised now?' asks the Guardian with some indignation. 'For our own part we have the greatest doubts as to the wisdom or justice of taking any financial contribution from India. We believe that this is not the way best for India and for the Empire in which India can serve the common cause, and that the loss it represents to an extremely poor population like that of India is very much greater than the gain it represents to England. If we are really seriously concerned that India should "develop in every way the vast potentialities of her indigenous products," it would be better to spend that 100 millions on developing her resources than to take that money from India.'

There would have been greater virtue if the Guardian had come to the rescue of 'Poor India' with more altruistic motives. We agree with these remarks, for quite different reasons however."

Alleged extortion of contributions to the Indian War Loan.
Mahratta (4), 29th Apl.

29. "The Chronicle publishes, in its issue of the 28th instant, 'a statement from a reliable source' citing instances in which people were slapped and kicked and abused and threatened and thus forced to contribute to the war loan. The statement is truly revealing. God bless the War! To it we owe these revelations of exuberant loyalty (!) kicking contributions out of miserable Indians."

Proposed issue of premiums bonds to enable Moslems to invest in the War Loan.
Bombay Samáchár (53), 24th Apl.; Akhbár-e-Islám (50), 27th Apl.

30. Referring to the suggestion made by the Indiaman of the 23rd March last for the issue of premium bonds in India assuring to the investor repayment of the principal and also an opportunity of drawing a prize, the Bombay Samáchár shares the belief entertained by the former paper that such a scheme would prove greatly attractive to Moslems, a section of which, though very eager to help Government by subscribing to the Indian War Loan, cannot do so on account of the prohibition of Islam against lending money on interest. It holds the opinion that such a scheme of issuing premium bonds would be more popular than the War Loan Lottery sweep and the horse race sweep, issued by the Western India Turf Club and the Calcutta Turf Club respectively, both among the Muhammadans as well as the general public, inasmuch as money spent in the purchase of these lottery tickets is so much money lost for good whereas purchasers of premium bonds are assured the safety of their money while they have also the chance of securing prizes. The paper expresses the hope that the suggestion about floating a scheme of the kind above referred to will receive prompt attention from Government. [The Akhbár-e-Islám raises the question whether it should be considered contrary to the tenets of Islám to accept interest on money lent to Government in the present critical condition of the Empire and answers that question by suggesting that, regard being had to the object with which the loan has been raised, viz., subjugation of the enemy and the prevention of the spilling of innocent blood, it would be only in conformity with the tenets of the Koran to render pecuniary help to Government by advancing money. The paper is also strongly in favour of issuing premium bonds and believes that they would be greatly welcomed by the Muhammadans.]

The War Loan and the Muhammadan objection to receiving interest on money lent.
Islámic Mail (3), 22nd Apl.

31. "We are getting enquiries from officials and non-offficals in United Provinces and Central Provinces as to what is the best way to solve the sood question which hampers the Muhammadans from taking advantage of investment in the War Loan. A respectable official friend says that Muhammadans in his division are well-to-do and eager to invest their money in the War Loan, but the Ulemas having declared the interest accruing therefrom to be sood, they feel shy and keep back. It is not perhaps in the knowledge of our friend that the Ulemas have no voice in the matter, or if they have used it the other (sic) and have put forward some extenuating circumstances for Muhammadans to invest their money in bank loans and get interest. There is, however, a severe Koranic injunction against sood and no true Muhammadan can take sood in any form. The best way to tide over the difficulty is the one we have urged upon Government, viz., to arrange revision of land revenue for such Muhammadan Zamindars as help their Sirkar in this hour of need. The Government of Bombay deserve to be congratulated for having adopted this suggestion and obtained the sanction of the Government of India to it. The provinces where there are big Mahammadan Zamindars can move the Government of India and secure similar concession for their landowners. It is in no way bungling with words and introducing another name for sood. This will not be interest in any form but a mark of recognition by Government, something like temporary Muafi or even permanent. There are very big Zamindars in Sind whose loyalty is beyond question and it is expected they all will take advantage of it and earn the new honour."

All well-known banks in India should be allowed the same facilities as the Presidency Banks in the matter of Government deposits.
Bombay Samáchár (53), 25th Apl.

32. The Bombay Samáchár expresses its gratification at the steps taken by the Finance Department, in view of the depleted holdings of the Indian Banks, to allow these banks to keep for some time as deposit the amounts subscribed through them to the War Loan for purposes of trade. It believes these steps will relieve to some extent the strain the banks are likely to suffer by people withdrawing their deposits from them to subscribe to the War Loan. It associates itself with the protest made by the shareholders of the Alliance Bank of Simla against the reluctance of Government to accord the same facilities to other banks as are extended to the Presidency Banks and asks Government to take steps to extend the facilities now enjoyed by the Presidency Banks to other Indian banks and to deposit with them Indian securities and reserves that are at present lodged with banks in England. It believes such a step will go a great way in enabling the Indian banks to tide over the difficulties consequent upon their treasuries being depleted by the increasing enthusiasm shown by the people to subscribe to the war loan.

Indian recruits from Chandranagore will be able to rise to the highest military posts, while Indians from British India can not hope even to be Lieutenants.
Kesari (92), 24th Apl.

33. Strenuous efforts have been made by public leaders all over India to secure recruits for the Defence of India Force. But Government have not moved forward as much as they ought to have done in the matter of making new concessions. Volunteers from Chandranagore are working in France in the Artillery Section and they have scope to rise to the highest posts. But the British Government is not yet prepared to promise that Indians would be appointed even as Lieutenants and Captains. We should however perform our duty relying on the fact that the new ideas set in motion by the Great War will not fail to influence even the British Statesmen. It would be suicidal and unfortunate to neglect our duty at the present juncture.

Comments on the naval action off Dover.
Indian Social Reformer (2), 29th Apl.

34. "It is impossible not to feel a thrill of admiration at the heroic conduct of British seamen in the naval action off Dover between two British patrol boats and six German destroyers. The two ships without a moment's hesitation decided to ram the destroyers and a hand-to-hand fight between the crews ensued. Midshipman Gyles, a mere boy of probably sixteen or seventeen, held at bay a number of Germans, although wounded in the eye and blinded by the flow of blood. But the most heroic was the conduct of the helmsman, Rowles, who was hit four times by shell fragments, but remained at the wheel throughout the action and only betrayed that he was wounded by reporting to the Captain 'I am going off now, Sir', and then fainting. By what right does the Government of India refuse to the youth of this country, opportunities for developing the immortal qualities displayed by the boy, Gyles, and the sailor, Rowles?"

Some tales of the C. I. D.
Mahrátta (4), 29th Apl.

35. "The C. I. D. is a wonderful institution. The Bombay Chronicle recently gave publicity to the rumour that an officer of the C. I. D., Bombay, of long standing wearing the King's Medal, was in the first week of this month called upon at a moment's notice to sever his connection with the Police service and was invited at the same time to quit the shores of India. A scandal of no small magnitude is reported to be at the bottom of this sudden order. The public is kept in the dark as to the nature of the scandal and the part which the redoubtable officer played in the dark. It has been pertinently asked why Government has not prosecuted the officer. At any rate the public has a right to know why this trusted servant of Government should have been given the kindly treatment he has received. Unless Government vouchsafe an explanation, people can draw the only conclusion possible, viz., that Government have sought to draw a veil over a very ugly affair reflecting great discredit on their trusted Department and hence on Government themselves. Special protection for such a C. I. D. officer spells a disreputable neglect of the interests and rights of the people. The Chronicle has in its issue of 21st instant placed before the public the story of one Mr. Anantram of Bombay, which gives us an idea of the obliging nature of the C. I. D. people.......... We shall leave here the alleged experience of Mr. Anantram and turn to nearer quarters. Mr. Tilak learns that some Police authorities, ordinary or C. I. D., in Bombay, Poona, etc., are calling certain persons who have previously given evidence in the Násik trial, etc., and asking them whether they would give any evidence if summoned by Sir V. Chirol! As we already know Government supplied translators to Sir Valentine when he was in need of them. Now Government officials are further obliging the Knight in another way. This is good form! It is only what gentlemen are expected to do! And what is a gentleman? The other day Mr. W. G. Wood, C. S. I., Principal, Thomason College, Roorkee, defined this term for the benefit of his pupils—Indian pupils. The address which the Principal intended for Indian pupils alone was an illuminating one. As the Principal described it, it was not a regular lecture, but 'something more intimate, more personal'. And in this intimate talk, the kindly Principal told his pupils that a great many of the so-called Indian gentlemen were not gentlemen at all, that there was undoubtedly a spirit of intrigue rife in a great many Indian homes, which resulted in the Indian student starting his school or college career without the first essentials of a gentleman and was indirectly accountable for the 'great deal of crookedness' which, the Principal affirmed, was to be found amongst students in schools and colleges and universities all over India! A gentleman, the Principal said, is a man of high moral courage, of integrity, a man who is upright, straight and honest in all his dealings, a man to whom all intrigue and double-dealing is repugnant. Who can deny that the C. I. D. dealings shortly recounted above satisfy Mr. Wood's idea of the gentleman's code of honour! If students want to improve themselves they may just devour the 'Tales of the C. I. D.' Their homes are unhealthy places—the 'atmosphere of the homes is saturated with intrigue'! It is best that they should be torn from such surroundings and housed with the 'gentlemen' of the C. I. D."

Why Bepin Chandra Pal refused to deliver lectures in Bombay.
Kesari (92), 24th Apl.; Hindusthan (16), 24th Apl.

36. As soon as Babu Bepin Chandra Pal arrived at Dr. Sathe's place he was met by Inspector Patwardhan of the C. I. D. Babu Bepin asked him whether he had brought any gagging order and Inspector Patwardhan said that it lay with the former whether such an order was to be issued or not, and immediately enquired whether any lecture was to be given by Mr. Pal. At about 12-30 P.M. Khan Bahadur Pettigara and Mr. Patwardhan came to Babu Bepin with a motor car and took him to Mr. Vincent. We do not know what conversation he had with Mr. Vincent, but he stated after his return from the Commissioner's office that he could not deliver any lecture in Bombay. We think that Mr. Vincent must have plainly told Babu Bepin that it lay within his powers to arrest him if he opened his lips as Bombay was a protected military fort and that Babu Bepin must have thought it better to give an assurance to Mr. Vincent that he would not speak and leave for Bengal rather than remain in confinement. [The Hindusthan reproduces the article in the Kesari.]

Comments on the personnel of the Emigration Conference.
Young India (10), 25th Apl.

37. "The personnel of the Indian representation at the Emigration Conference has been settled and judging from the numbers—there are quite half a dozen of them—the figures are imposing enough. The authorities responsible for the selection of these gentlemen must have a very strange notion of India's representation. Mr. Marjoribanks, who has been rightly described as the author of a discredited report on labour conditions in Ceylon is attending the Conference as an expert! In these days of experts and super-experts, Government could not have made a better choice than Mr. Marjoribanks who combines in himself all the weakness of the capitalist interests without also possessing their virtues. It was naturally expected that on such a Conference as this, Messrs. Gandhi and Andrews would be represented. Perhaps, these two names which are held in the highest estimation all over the country, were omitted with a purpose to exclude men who would fearlessly espouse the cause of the down-trodden labourers. If India is to obtain an adequate measure of justice in this matter of national importance, it is now more than ever necessary that Indian opinion should make itself heard in the council of the Conference and the back-handed manner in which the whole Indian representation has been arranged makes it imperative that it should act at once and impress the Conference with the strength of feeling in this country against the obnoxious piece of legislation which disfigures the civilised government of India."

Comments on the Government of India's Resolution on the Bengal election dispute betwen Mr. Arif and Mr. Rahim.

Young India (10), 25th Apl.

38. Commenting on the Government of India's Resolution on the Bengal election dispute between Mr. Arif and Mr. Rahim, Young India writes :—" It is not often that Indian public opinion is found to endorse action on the part of the Government of India that touches on the larger political life of the country. It is all the more necessary therefore to acknowledge with profound satisfaction and appreciation the fine stand they made for the purity of elections in this country over the recent election dispute in Bengal.......... Reviewing the conclusions of the report, the Governor-General in Council says :—'In the first place, he regrets to state that he is by no means satisfied that the election was free from corrupt practices.' In respect of this finding we need only say that the Governor-General in Council would have better served the purity of elections, and indeed the general standards of public life in this country, by a more strict interpretation of his duty and a proportionately deterrent decision. If the Viceroy and his councillors are 'by no means satisfied that the election was free from corrupt practices'—even though most of the actual charges made by the memoralist were found to be baseless—it was clearly their duty to cancel the election.......... It is further indicated that, as the Commissioner's report has shown the necessity of changes in the regulations, there is a possibility of permanent legislation 'to provide effectively for the investigation of election petitions in the future.' We should welcome any such measures directed to maintaining the right standards for elections in this country."

Sanj Vartamân (28), 24th Apl.

39. The Sanj Vartamân, while commenting upon the report on the enquiry into the election of Mr. Abdul Rahim to the Imperial Legislative Council, thanks Government for their wisdom in instituting the enquiry and publishing the report thereon. It sees no reason why Government should not have given similar publicity to the report of the enquiry into the election of the Honourable Mr. Jinnah and asks them to take the public into their confidence in the matter. It agrees with the finding of the Commissioner that the allegations against Mr. Abdul Rahim were without any foundation but is of opinion that the election should have been set aside in view of the fact that Mr. Abdul Rahim engaged a canvasser on a salary of Rs. 50 per mensem and had placed the sum of Rs. 400 at his disposal, in view of similar action taken by Government in this Presidency in the case of a Muhammadan candidate in the Southern Division who had merely promised a donation to a school.

Alleged unwholesome working of the Revenue Subordinate Service Rules.

Young India (10), 25th Apl.

40. "Experience" writes to Young India :—" Government with the laudable object of securing efficiency in Service revised the old rules in 1910. The Lower Standard Examination was abolished and the Higher Standard of old replaced by a qualifying examination. In furtherance of the said object, the rules, no doubt, give preference to Lower and Higher Standard passed clerks but with the restriction of subordination to claims due to seniority and subject, of course, to considerations of merit and efficiency. The rules thus by themselves have not much to complain against. It is their working that has produced discontent in the lower strata of the Service and is pointed to as being responsible for an amount of heart-burning caused among old clerks of proved merit and efficiency. The practice in most places has been to earmark Lower and Higher Standard men for preferential claims to every grade promotion without any the least regard to one's real worth on the score of 'Seniority, Merit and Efficiency'. As to these examinations, they, as many others, are more or less 'Luck-Lotteries'......... Mere examination success is thus not, and never ought to be, a sole and safe criterion as to an individual's merit and ability. It is a matter of very great regret that in working these rules, the said wholesome adjuncts have often been lost sight of and the Lower or Higher Standard Badge permitted to carry everything before it. And what is the result? The throttling of an even flow of grade promotions and the swarming of many upper rungs of the lower branch ladder with raw and poor material, a result surely never bargained for by Government. Sooner, therefore, vigorous steps to purge out this evil are taken, the better. Will the Divisional Commissioners, as chief controlling authorities, give the matter their serious and prompt consideration?"

Comments on the Excise Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for 1915-16.

Rást Goftár (27), 22nd Apl.

41. While commenting upon the Excise Administration Report for the year 1915-16 and the Government Resolution thereon, the Rást Goftár takes the temperance reformers to task for making undeserved allegations against the Excise policy of Government and points out with satisfaction that the Report goes to prove that there has been a steady decrease in the sale of liquor and a corresponding steady increase in the Excise revenue. It is of opinion that the Advisory Committees are greatly influenced by the agitation of temperance reformers and so suggests that the right of giving permission for opening new liquor shops should be vested solely in the Collector. It notes with regret that the Government orders with respect to encouraging the sale of Toddy are respected more in the breach than in the observance by some of the Collectors who charge license fees at their sweet will or resort to the auction system. It expresses surprise that Commissioners should refuse to interfere when appeals are made to them against the orders of the Collectors. It regards Mr. Quin's administration of the Excise Department as a failure and ascribes this to his lack of appreciation of honest men and undue preferential treatment given to European officers. It expresses hope that Mr. Arthur will be able to purge the Department of incompetent and dishonest officials. It does not think that the efficiency of the Department will in any way increase by the proposed appointment of Deputy Commissioners and is afraid these appointments will tend to increase mismanagement in the Department.

Muhammadans and the Sind Provincial Conference at Shikárpur.

Sind Journal (8), 19th Apl.

42. Quoting from the Sind Moslem a passage describing the means adopted to prevent Muhammadans from going to the Sind Provincial Conference at Shikárpur, the Sind Journal remarks:—"The above extract from an organ of the Muhammadan community clearly shows that not only moral suasion but picketing even was resorted to to prevent Muhammadans from joining the Conference. This is a sad commentary on the patriotism and foresight of the Muhammadans concerned. The Provincial Conference deals with problems which affect the Hindus and the Muhammadans of Sind equally and it is suicidal to belittle the importance of an organization which seeks to advance the common cause of both the sister communities of Sind. The attendance of a large number of Muhammadan delegates at the Provincial Conference at Lárkána held under the presidentship of the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri had been hailed by the whole of non-official Sind as a happy augury for the future, though we had some lurking doubts about the continuity of that excellent record. The paucity of Muhammadan delegates at the Shikárpur sessions of the Conference, which is attributed to wirepulling, should not make us despair of Muhammadans openly throwing in their lot with the Hindus in the field of politics at no distant date. Time was when even the Honourable Mr. Bhurgri in deference to the wishes of his co-religionists kept aloof from political activities in the Province. But who can defy the Time-Spirit? Let our Muhammadan brethren take note of this fact."

Comments on the resolution to adopt Hindi as the national language of India passed by the Shikárpur Conference.

Islámic Mail (3), 22nd Apl.

43. "We admire the zeal of our Hindu friends in their endeavours to wipe out all signs of their connections with the Muhammadans, but we must confess to have been considerably amazed at the resolution passed at the Shikárpur Conference to adopt Hindi as the national language of India. Sindh has got its own dialect and Sindhi is akin to Hindi except in its script which is written in Urdu characters. It is as far situated from places which claim to speak Hindi language as the poles and we doubt if even one Sindhi gentleman can read or write Hindi. Yet it is a curious phase of the new Hindu-spirit that they would discard everything belonging to a foreigner even if it be ever so useful as the Urdu language. Urdu owes its parentage not to Muhammadans but to Hindus and its best writers have been Hindus.......... And strange as it may seem even those who condemn Urdu and advocate Hindi speak the former in their homes. They have made it, however, a national question and want to discard the borrowed feathers. But if it went to that, may we ask why should they not discard the dress which was certainly brought in by the Muhammadans and go about naked as they used to do in olden days and are still doing in remote areas such as the Malabar, etc.?"

The proposed City Civil Court for Bombay.

Sánj Vartamán (28), 26th Apl.; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 27th Apl.; Bombay Sámachár (53), 28th Apl.

44. The Sánj Vartamán endorses the suggestions made by the Bombay Presidency Association to the Government of Bombay in the matter of establishing a City Civil Court with jurisdiction over civil suits, between Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 5,000 which are now tried by the High Court. It favours the proposal for establishing a separate Civil Court instead of increasing the powers of the Small Causes Court and believes that two Judges working without long vacations will be able to cope with the work that will come before it. It suggests that the Court may be housed in the new building that is being erected for the Small Causes Court or in the High Court building and expresses a hope that Government will not fail to consider the claims of Indian lawyers while making appointments of the Judges of the new City Civil Court. [The Jám-e-Jamshed writes in a similar strain. The Bombay Samáchár while agreeing with the proposals made by the Presidency Association suggests that Government might extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes and lessen the long vacations if the expenditure involved in the creation of a new City Civil Court is found to be too great to be met in the present times.]

Government should issue a Press Note regarding the Gokak Canal Project.

Belgaum Samáchár (82), 23rd Apl.

45. Fears were generally entertained that the Gokak Canal Project would either be indefinitely postponed or wholly dropped on account of the war. His Excellency the Governor, however, in his reply to one of the addresses presented to him during his tour in the Southern Maratha Country gave an assurance that the project would not be shelved. We hope, therefore, that the construction of the canal will be taken in hand soon after the war is over. As the canal is to be fed with water from a large reservoir some 30 or 40 villages will be submerged under its waters. We request Government, therefore, to publish a Press Note in sufficient time giving full details of the lands that would have to be acquired, to enable the people whose lands are likely to be taken up to make their own arrangements in time.

EDUCATION.

Comments on the Calcutta University Commission.

Young India (10), 25th Apl.

46. "V. V. R." writes to Young India:—"Lord Chelmsford has appointed a Commission to inquire into the affairs of the Calcutta University. We do not know what the Government have up their sleeves and we prefer to wait. Our previous experience of these Committees and Commissions has been rather of an unfortunate character......... Our Universities were modelled on the London University. But of late it has been the fashion to decry the Universities of an affiliating type. Some of the old Universities in India, notably Calcutta and Madras, have been in great haste to convert themselves into teaching universities. India is a vast and poor country and unless we are to make higher education a play-thing of the rich only, we cannot confine ourselves to the residential university. It is granted that our universities should come more into our life and that they should not rest content with examining students only. If there is lack of control, by all means let the universities exercise more control over the colleges affiliated to them. But any proposal to withdraw the Honours' Course only to the metropolis or to concentrate higher education only in a few selected places in the Presidency and to deny higher education for all ages to all other places deserve to be condemned outright. The Patna University Bill which tried this dangerous experiment had to be recast wholesale. All these devious attempts to avoid the necessity of opening new colleges and centres of enlightenment are bound to fail. After all the problem of problems is whether there is to be an extension of higher education or a denial of it in the name of so-called efficiency. People will never tolerate any restrictions put upon the proper development and progress of higher education in the country. New colleges at convenient centres should be opened and wherever possible and practicable they should teach all the highest courses allowed by the university. The last Commission was responsible for the death of 25 second-grade colleges. Let us hope that the new Calcutta Commission will not be responsible for any more destruction of colleges."

The Muhammadan University.

Akhbár-e-Islám (50), 26th Apl.

47. The Akhbár-e-Islám asks those newspapers who are opposed to securing a charter for the Muhammadan University on the lines of the Hindu University to sink all their differences and to use their influence to hasten the steps that will lead to the early establishment of the purposed University. It does not think that the University will secure better terms from Government if the question of its establishment is deferred till after the war and believes that Government will always treat the Hindu and Muhammadan Universities alike, but it hopes that Government will relax their control over these Universities when they find that they proceed with their work in a satisfactory manner.

RAILWAYS.

The practice of reserving compartments for Europeans and Eurasians should be stopped.

Islámic Mail (3), 22nd Apl.

48. "In these days when the restriction of train service on railways has caused the greatest pressure of traffic and the inevitable overcrowding, the practice of reserving compartments for European and Eurasians is causing a great deal of discontent. The authorities at headquarters of railways can have no idea of the rush of passenger traffic, especially by passenger trains.......... But a whole compartment is kept empty for European and Eurasian passengers whose number is never very large. The sight is often seen of the solitary figure of a dark woman or man easily lolling in this compartment by virtue of his or her European dress whilst more respectable Indian women and men wander about despairingly in search of accommodation. The grievance has become so palpable and unbearable that when we brought it to the notice of the popular Agent of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, Mr. Holmes, he promised to redress it at once, and we are informed that no distinction now exists in the accommodation of European and Indian passengers. Major Hepper is known to be a friend of the people, and, a lover of justice and fairplay as he is, he would no doubt remove this unjust distinction and let the Europeans and Anglo-Indians travel in the same way as other Indians."

MUNICIPALITIES.

Comments on the Government Resolution on the request of the Poona Municipality to be entrusted with the drainage works of Poona City.

Mahrátta* (4), 29th Apl.; Dnyan Prakásh (33), 24th Apl.

49. Under the heading "A Specimen of Official Courtesy" the Mahrátta writes:—"The charge of the pumping station connected with the Drainage and the settling tank connected with waterworks, Poona city, was assumed some time ago by Government with the clear understanding that at the end of one year the charge would be handed back to the Poona City Municipality. The Municipality requested Government in October 1916 to hand over the works to that body. Government have replied by publishing a resolution evidenty based on the views expressed by the Commissioner, C. D., the Collector of Poona and Mr. Mandy, the author of the Poona Drainage system. In expressing their views these officials have made allegations against the municipal administration, which we believe to be wholly undeserved and have used language which no self-respecting public body would tolerate.......... The reason for the resolution is obvious. Government desires to impose an official commissioner on the Municipality. The dog must be given a bad name before it it hanged; so runs the unwritten law. The allegations against the Poona municipal administration have come to be made in accordance with this law. We are glad the Municipality has not taken the allegations lying down. Last Wednesday it unanimously entered a strong protest against the wantonly insulting language used by the Divisional Commissioner. In the speeches on the resolution of protest the allegations were declared to be baseless, and the action of Government in relying blindly on their officials and refusing to bide by the clear understanding between them and the Municipality was criticised as unfair and improper." [The Dnyan Prakásh also makes similar comments.]

Gujaráti (12), 22nd Apl.; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 25th, 26th and 27th Apl.

50. Referring to the recent resolution passed by the Poona Municipality to the effect that all members of all the bodies enjoying local self-government should hereafter be elected by the people, the Gujaráti expresses the hope that the resolution will not fail to receive support from the Bombay Municipality as well as the municipalities of other big cities. It attributes the appearance of the caucus movement in the local Municipal Corporation on particular occasions to the present system of Government directly nominating sixteen members and allowing the Justices of the Peace, who are themselves appointed by Government, to nominate other sixteen members on its board. It inquires what special interests of theirs the Justices of the Peace have to safeguard that they should be entitled to return sixteen persons as their representatives on the local Municipal Board. The paper then proceeds to observe:—People have been kept very backward in the Bombay Presidency in the matter of local self-government and that fact has caused discontent among the general public. The resolution of the Poona Municipality is primâ facie evidence of the extent to which the public opinion in the Presidency has advanced in this matter and the officials who claim to know the opinion of the public and to safeguard their interests have to learn a lesson from it. Discussion during the last session of the Bombay Legislative Council has proved that the officials are ignorant of public opinion. The people have been, for the last five decades, hearing about the lip-sympathy of Government and their officers in the matter of local self-government and therefore the charge courageously made by the Honourable Mr. Patel during the session above referred to that the officials of the Bombay Presidency are not anxious to liberate the Municipalities and the District Boards from their own trammels is really commendable. People cannot understand why officials should be afraid of public opinion being in the majority in the Municipalities, District and Taluka Local Boards, and in the village punchayets. [Sympathising with the resolution passed by the Poona Municipality the Praja Mitra and Pársi regrets that the Bombay Municipality should continue to put up with the present system which permits it to have only half the number of its members elected by the people and which constitutes a sort of insult to it in view of other municipalities in the Presidency enjoying a wider franchise. It urges the muncipality to take up the question for the sake of its own prestige and suggests that Government should allow the tenant class to exercise the municipal franchise and should do justice to the City by allowing that class to return 16 representatives to the Corporation in lieu of the Justices of the Peace who at present enjoy that privilege. In the next issue the paper expresses its disagreement with the plea advanced from the other side that adequate provision would not be made for the representation of minorities on the municipal bodies if all the municipalities that at present elect their presidents by a two-thirds majority were to be given the right of electiug two-thirds of their members. It supports itself by referring to the demand made by Muhammadans for separate communal representation and remarks that even those who have been making such a demand do not prefer to be nominated by Government. The paper hopes that Lord Willingdon will not, in the matter of local self-government, allow the opinions of ordinary Civilian officers to outweigh the views of authorities like Lord Ripon and Lord Morley who have emphatically declared themselves in favour of allowing the people as great a share as possible in the administration of their municipal affairs. In the subsequent issue it attritutes the mismanagement of municipal affairs in such places as Borsad to too much official interference and control.]

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

Comments on His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir's speech before the Empire Parliamentary Association.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 3rd May; Sánj Vartamán (28), 3rd May; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 3rd May; Hindusthán (16), 2nd May.

1. Commenting upon the speech made by His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir before the Empire Parliamentary Association, the Bombay Samáchár writes:—We hope the Maharaja's speech will make an impression on the minds of those people who are misdirecting their energies in the hope of securing swarájya very soon. India should thank the Maharaja for wishing that she might ultimately secure self-government by a gradual advance and for asking an instalment of political reforms after the war. These utterances of the Maharaja lead us to hope that the legitimate aspirations of the people will be satisfied by their rulers in due course. The Council of Princes, to which the Maharaja made a reference in his speech, is likely to be established in the near future. [The Sánj Vartamán is of opinion that the Maharaja's speech is likely to create the wrong impression in the minds of the people in England that the Congress and the Moslem League are contending that full self-government should be immediately given to India. It repeats its contention that Indians want a responsible share in the administration of the country and a control over its finances. It asks Mr. Chamberlain to pay a visit to India after the war and to see things for himself. If he does so, the paper feels sure he will give up his present erroneous views. The Jam-e-Jámshed, while agreeing that India is not ripe for full self-government, dwells upon the disabilities of Indians in the matter of the higher posts and complains against the continuance of official majorities in Municipalities and Legislative Councils. It hopes Government will satisfy Indian aspirations by granting the demands made by the non-official representatives of the Imperial Legislative Council. It favours the early formation of the Council of Princes with a view to ensuring closer relations between Government and the Indian Princes. The Hindusthán also asserts that no one in India has asked for complete self-government and that the Indians would for the present be satisfied with the reforms asked for by the Indian members of the Viceregal Legislative Council. It wishes that the deputation contemplated by the Congress and the Moslem League would soon be sent to England to place the Indian view before the English public and to counteract the mischief that is likely to be done by those who pose as her representatives.]

Message (5), 2nd May; Mahrátta* (4), 6th May.

2. "His Highness the Maharaja of Bikáner seems to have become quite a favourite at the India Office and with the narrower and conservative elements of British public life. He has altogether eclipsed his other two colleagues from India and taken to run the show for them.......... The Maharaja is a Ruling Prince enjoying sovereign power within his own territories and is besides not a Congressman. Thus, however much he may sympathise with the Indian aspirations, he cannot and will not identify himself with those aspirations, because it would in the end reflect on his own State and the subjects of progressive Bikáner would be demanding before long that their Ruler do occupy a constitutional position similar to that of His Majesty the King-Emperor in regard to the great British nation. There is one more factor also, and that is that the Suzerain Government in India, whose strings are being pulled from behind the scenes at the India Office in London have committed themselves to a particular statement of policy. This policy was clearly, briefly and pointedly defined the other day by His Excellency Lord Chelmsford as 'self-government for India, not yet, but step by step', or to quote the latest phraseology adumbrated by the Great Mogul of the India Office: 'The realisation of this (self-government) could only come with time and as the Indians qualified themselves for it,' or as the Prime Minister of England, re-echoing these forces, has said: 'As Indians developed a political sense and a feeling of nationhood'. The policy has now become fairly well stereotyped. And His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner as 'our Ally' cannot in decency and fairness go in advance of it and adumbrate a new policy for British India, for he said at the lunch given by the Empire Parliamentary Association, the Indian Princes did not desire 'either to interfere in the affairs of British India or outside interference in their own affairs'.......... Thus, by his own admission the Maharaja of Bikaner is not the accredited nor even the competent spokesman of the Indian aspirations. And in the name of fairness and decency the people of India beg of His Highness to leave alone Indian politics to be fought out between themselves and Government of India. By his untimely and ill considered—we might add irresponsible—expressions of opinion not derived by close or intimate touch with the current of thought in India, he is doing an irreparable amount of harm rather than good, as these views will be seized upon 'in time' by the opponents of Indian aspirations to be used as the big stick to beat them down." [The Mahrátta writes:—"We wonder why men who ought to know better should reiterate ad nauseum that 'India is not at present ripe for full self-government'. When the authorised Congress-League scheme of Reforms stops a long way short of demanding full self-government 'at present', the question of 'full self-government at present' does not arise at all.......... Let us assure His Highness that everyone including the most extreme 'revolutionary' will thankfully accept the constitution recommended by the National Congress for the management of Indian affairs as a sufficiently advanced one for the present."]

Comments on Mr. Lloyd George's speech on the occasion of receiving the freedom of the city of London.
Kesari (92), 1st May.

3. Commenting upon the Premier's speech on the occasion of receiving the freedom of the city of London, the Kesari remarks:—It is worth noting that Mr. Lloyd George mentioned India along with the Colonies at every point in his speech. In his first speech as Prime Minister he had omitted India and the people of India naturally resented it. Probably his mistake then was an unconscious one, or it may be that a little experience has taught him a good deal. Whatever that be, it is essential that we take advantage of his new line of thought, and our representatives are no doubt engaged in doing this work. But if they are supported from outside they would welcome it, and it is with this intention that the All-India Congress Committee has resolved to send its deputation to England. If two people begin to demand rights Government will naturally prefer to comply with the lesser demand. The birth of the extremist party drew Government nearer the moderates, and if the Congress Deputation goes now to England and agitates, the Imperial Ministers are likely to comply with the demands of our three representatives. It is a well-known and universally admitted doctrine that at least a little is gained when much is asked for.

Mahrátta (4), 6th May.

*4. Commenting upon Mr. Lloyd George's speech on the occasion of receiving the freedom of the City of London and his references therein to the need of consulting India and the Colonies, the Mahrátta remarks:—"The Premier must know—and if he does not know it, he must be made to know—that the action of England, or rather the inaction, in leaving the Indian bureaucracy to manage our home and foreign affairs for us according to their sweet will and pleasure has resulted and is daily resulting in infinite trouble for us and is costing us millions of precious lives! Millions die of starvation—who need not. Millions have to live a stunted life—which is worse than death—who need not live such a life. A reasonably national policy in industrial and administrative and educational matters would mend matters considerably. But who cares? Without a real surging sympathy in high quarters for the people of the soil the daily increasing load of misery which weighs alike on the illiterate and the enlightened in India must continue to embitter Indian feeling. Is it a desirable situation? In the interests of all concerned, an early grant to Indians of a fair instalment of 'real partnership' in the management of Indian affairs is a supreme necessity. When Mr. Lloyd George talks of India as being entitled to real partnership in the Empire we wonder whether he subscribes to the position that India must be autonomous in her internal affairs. As a consistent statesman he must accept this position."

Comments on the grant of the freedom of the city of Manchester to the Indian representatives on the Imperial War Conference.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 29th Apl.

5. The presentation of the freedom of the City of Manchester to the Indian representatives of the Imperial War Conference leads us to think that after careful consideration Manchester has been convinced of the folly of agitating against the enhanced import duties on cotton goods and thus playing into the hands of Japan. Japan is the greatest rival of India in the cotton trade and it has already commenced to develop its trade in Mesopotamia before India or Manchester has given a thought to the subject. It has, therefore, deeply resented the increase in the import duties. As stated by the Premier, there is very little of real competition between India and Manchester. Japan is the rival both of India and Manchester and steps should, therefore, be taken to guard against this rivalry developing into a curse in course of time. The Government of Great Britain has taken the initial step in this direction by allowing India to increase the import duties on cotton goods. This step will prove of immense use when Government will think of safeguarding the interests of the Empire as a whole in connection with the question of tariffs after the termination of the war. It is only fiscal autonomy that will enable India to give preferential treatment to the goods manufactured within the Empire over those manufactured elsewhere. India then will be able to work hand in hand with Manchester without any conflict of interests and to successfully compete against any other nation. It is possible that Manchester has been stimulated to honour our representatives in the Imperial Conference because it has been brought to its senses by the steps Japan is taking to capture the markets in Mesopotamia.

India and the Imperial Conference..

Indian Social Reformer (2), 6th May.

6. "While gratified at the exceedingly hospitable treatment which the Indian delegates to the Imperial War Conference received at the hands of the British Government and people, we must confess to some uneasiness at some of the conclusions to which they would seem to have subscribed at the Conference. The daily newspapers printed on Friday certain resolutions of the Imperial Conference, which were, it was stated, passed unanimously. Two of them relate to the need of co-ordination between the different parts of the Empire as regards military and defence matters. It is not clear how, as things stand, Indian co-operation is to be ensured in such co-ordination. Reuter had telegraphed some days back the resolution of the Conference favouring the full representation of India at future Conferences. We trust that future representatives will all be Indians and will be selected by some more constitutional process than the delegates to the present Conference. The resolution relating to the principles on which the constitutional relations between the component parts of the Empire should be readjusted after the war, is most disquieting. These, we are told, should be based on the full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of the Commonwealth, and of India 'as an important portion' thereof. If it means anything different from the Round Table scheme, Government will do well to say what it is without delay. Then, as regards reciprocity in the matter of trade and emigration, the Indian public will be anxious to know what exactly they are being committed to. We should much wish that the memorandum on the position of Indians in self-governing colonies, which the Indian delegates are said to have presented to the Conference, will be soon made available to the Indian public."

Dnyán Prakásh (33), 3rd May; Indu Prakásh (35), 2nd and 4th May.

7. However high a place India may obtain in the Empire it will be merely ornamental unless there is swarajya in India. If the Secretary of State is to speak on our behalf it means an additional vote for great Britain and the colonials are not likely to consent to such an arrangement. In that case our position may be higher than it is now, but we shall not receive any advantage. Side by side with our growing status outside, we should become masters at home and should be able to manage our own affairs. The European and other officials who rule over us as masters should become our servants.

There is no question of creating new difficulties for Government at the present time. But the work that is done by responsible associations in ventilating the public view that political reforms should be soon undertaken on a large scale, should also be carried out in villages. We must bring it to the notice of Government that we have settled views in this matter, also, as we did in the case of indentured labour. [The Indu Prakásh says :—The awakening in India is an intelligent one ; it is not a mere hankering after the moon. The educated classes in India feel that non-Indians have very few chances of knowing the heart of Indians. The strength of those who are loyal to the Empire and to themselves is increasing and therefore if India is given internal autonomy the virtues of Indians will have full play and they will attain a great position. So far as foreign relations are concerned India will be loyal to the Empire. So far as Indian national affairs are concerned, Indian public opinion should have full scope. To put it differently, Indians hold that the administration should not be carried on by Europeans who know but little about Indian affairs. In a later issue the paper says :—The present bureaucratic system is out of date, at least it is not approved by the educated classes. The heart of every educated man is torn to pieces by the humiliating thought that his intelligent opinion has no value in the national development. Every reasonable educated man is thoroughly loyal. Our educated men do not consider that every I. C. S. man is better informed and more reasonable than themselves, nor do they think that he looks after public welfare more efficiently than they do. They feel and think that they can more easily understand their own religion, customs and languages than the European officials. They feel it poignantly under these circumstances that they have no scope to do national work and it is not strange that some impatient reformers have gone to the length of holding that India will remain loyal to the Empire only in case the present administrative system is totally abolished.]

Praja Bandhu (24), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

8. " The resolution unanimously passed by the Imperial War Conference to admit of India being fully represented at the Imperial Conferences that may be convened in future ought to set at rest all doubts in the matter. Not only that, but the fact that the resolution in question should have been moved by Sir R. Borden, the Canadian Premier, and seconded by Mr. Massey, the New Zealeand Premier, is extremely significant.......... While welcoming this act of justice to India we desire to thank the Canadian and New Zealand ministers for their sympathy and liberal-mindedness with regard to this matter."

Comments on the recommendations of the Imperial War Conference.

Mahrátta* (4), 6th May; Káthiáwár Samáchár (62), 2nd May; Hind Vijaya (58), 2nd May.

9. Commenting upon the statement issued by the Colonial Secretary respecting the work done by the Imperial War Conference and the various recommendations made by it, the Máhrátta writes :—" The only remarks that we propose to make on these recommendations of the conference are the following :—The recomendations regarding consultation of India in matters of Imperial policy and the ' reciprocity of treatment ' as between the colonies and India are acceptable—but so long as our Government is not representative of our will, they can do us but little good. As to the other recommendations noted above India will be a distinct loser by the arrangement. Both as a producer and as a customer India has nothing to gain by her markets being restricted—unless the restriction is based entirely on a national development policy. The suggested restrictions are based on the Empire development policy which in practice will largely mean the development of the Colonies and the United Kingdom at the expense of India. To moderate the harmful results of the policy, a Home Rule Government skilfully utilising its restricted fiscal freedom is a pressing necessity." [The Káthiáwár Samáchár expresses gratification at the fact that full representation is to be given to India at future Imperial Conferences and expresses a hope that the interest that is being manifested in Parliament about Indian matters will lead to the reconstruction of the Indian Administration. The Hind Vijaya considers that the promise of full representation at the Imperial Conference is tantamount to an assurance that the aspirations of the Indian people in the matter of self-government will be satisfied and hopes that India will soon be placed on a footing of equality with the self-governing Colonies.]

Comments on Sir James Meston's suggestion that Dominion journalists should visit India.

Young India (10), 2nd May.

10. Commenting on Sir James Meston's suggestion that Dominion statesmen and journalists should visit India, Young India writes:—"We believe Sir James would have with characteristic generosity placed the hospitality of his Government House at the disposal of the Dominion statesmen and pressmen, if he were only sure of his tenure of office till such time. It must be an unkind fate which deprives him of the opportunity of reciprocating in his own 'House' the lavish hospitality which has been extended to him and also assisting the deputation to study Indian problems at first-hand. Perhaps, he may leave behind him Sir Valentine Chirol and his super-journalist chum to guide the suggested deputation when it visits this country."

Disabled Indian soldiers and the Imperial War Conference.

Shetkari (37), 29th Apl.

11. The question of disabled soldiers is awaiting solution at the hands of the Imperial War Conference. Indian disabled soldiers will of course return to India. Sir James Meston who is one of the representatives of India at the Conference has invited Colonial statesmen and representatives of the Colonial press to visit India. This invitation must have some connection with this question before the Conference. We are sure the invitation will be accepted, for where is the Colonial who can be so hard-hearted as to decline an invitation of 'India's' representative? This gives us an idea of how this question will ultimately be solved.

Death of the Honourable Lieutenant Frederick Thesiger.

Rást Goftár* (27), 6th May, Eng. cols.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (20), 6th May, Eng. cols.; Message (5), 5th May.

12. "Their Excellencies' loss—the soldier's death in Mesopotamia of their eldest son, The Honourable Frederick Thesiger, R.F.A., is India's loss. And our hearts go out to them in silent sympathy in the midst of their sorest earthly trial. Such lives are never lost. They remain an imperishable memory to profit and ennoble mankind.......... India, with one heart, grieves for Their Excellencies. India is also proud of her young hero." [The Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—"He has died a noble death, fighting for his King and his country in Mesopotamia. Their Excellencies may expect the cordial sympathy of the millions over whom they rule in this hour of their heavy bereavement." The Message remarks:—"Genuine regret and sympathy will be felt for Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Chelmsford in the sad bereavement that has befallen them. The Honourable F. Thesiger, whose death in action has just been reported, was not many months ago in Simla and had endeared himself during his short sojourn among Simla society. We offer Their Excellencies our deep and sincere sympathy in their great loss."]

Gujaráti (12), 6th May., Eng. cols.

13. "The sad news of the death in action in Mesopotamia of Lieutenant the Honourable F. Thesiger has been received by the Indian public with deep regret.........The people of India had to mourn the losses that were suffered by Lord and Lady Hardinge and Lord and Lady Willingdon and some other high officials and will readily extend their heart-felt sympathy to Lord and Lady Chelmsford in their hour of distressing bereavement. In grief and sorrow brought on by the war we are all one, exactly as we are all united in heart and mind in the prosecution of the war. It is not for us to offer any consolation to Their Excellencies, but on behalf of our countrymen and countrywomen we offer our deep and heartfelt sympathy to Their Excellencies in their grievous loss."

Bombay Samáchár (53), 3rd May; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 4th May; Hindusthán (16), 3rd May.

14. The Bombay Samáchár remarks that the news of the death of His Excellency the Viceroy's son has produced among all sections of the Indian public feelings of deep sympathy for His Excellency Lord Chelmsford in his sad bereavement. It, however, believes that the Viceroy will derive consolation from the fact that those heroes who sacrifice their lives on the field of battle in a sacred cause like the defence of one's Empire immortalise their names. The paper observes that every Indian will cordially pray that the Almighty may grant His Excellency the fortitude to bear his great grief. [The Praja Mitra and Pársi remarks that the whole Indian nation sincerely condoles with the Viceroy in his affliction. It is of opinion that the event must teach all the Indian communities the lesson of service and self-sacrifice. The Hindusthán sincerely sympathises with Their Excellencies in their sorrow and prays to God to grant eternal peace to the soul of the departed hero.]

Indu Prakásh (35), 3rd May.

15. The Indu Prakásh gives a brief account of the career of the late Lieut. the Honourable F. Thesiger and after expressing its deep sympathy with His Excellency the Viceroy remarks:—This terrible war has taken toll from almost all the illustrious families of England. The losses, grievous as they are, are being borne with the characteristic spirit of Englishmen. A glance at Indian History will show that such experiences were not novel to us Marathas in the past, although we are strangers to them now because we have been rusting for so many generations. Given suitable opportunities we will show that we can also sacrifice our sons willingly on the field of battle instead of merely contenting ourselves with verbal expressions of sympathy as at present.

What the war has done for India.

Young India (10), 2nd May.

16. "Naturally, people in this country have been profoundly interested in the doings of the Imperial War Cabinet and Imperial War Conference.......... In the last few days, few weeks, many pronouncements have been made—some noteworthy, others fundamentally foolish or absolutely antiquated. But in none of these, is there an indication of a desire to transcend the limitations, which at present circumscribe the Imperial outlook. Their outlook of the Indian situation has been egregiously faulty, if it is not also selfishly narrow.......... We have been reminded that it is for the first time that India's representatives are allowed to sit side by side with the representatives of our 'great dominions' and that it is a matter for which we ought to be grateful. We have been so long grateful for small mercies, that we do not consider this demand for our gratitude as in any way extravagant or ungracious.......... Apart from this, the war has already achieved many things. It has turned the tide of history.......... Last, but not least, it has quickened the pace of thought and consolidated national feeling in this country. We are no longer content to be moving in the grooves of old world ideas, when the tallest amongst us bent his head in reverent submission before the European and 'paid worship to colour'. We are no longer content to feel that we are not fit for managing our own households. We have learnt to realise at last that 'freedom is justified of her children'. We want power and we want responsibility so that we may effect our own characteristic national development.......... It would be the crowning triumph of the great British democracy were they to help us in securing freedom for ourselves as they have been doing for Belgium, Poland and Russia. With India in shackles, the reality and beneficence of the Empire of which Mr. Lloyd George spoke would be a sham, mere hypocrisy. It would be a great pity if a Prime Minister like Mr. Lloyd George succumbs to the Tory humbug about India's want of political sense and feeling of nationhood, so assiduously propagated by Lord Sydenham and his chelas. As Mr. Lloyd George has himself stated, one of two things must happen: 'either India must be admitted into the British Commonwealth along with the self-governing Dominions or India must be governed by the federal Parliament', consisting of the representatives of the peoples of Great Britain and the present self-governing dominions. The second alternative is destructive of the very principles for which we are fighting and would ultimately spell disaster to the Empire."

Why the War Loan is so popular in Bombay as contrasted with the other provinces.

Islámic Mail (3), 29th Apl.

17. In the course of a lengthy article in which it exhorts the people, especially the Muhammadans, to subscribe to the War Loan, the Islámic Mail writes:—"The loan has not made any appreciable progress in other provinces, not because of want of capital and money. If you were to look to the returns of export of bullion from Bombay published weekly in the papers you will find that more gold and silver are purchased by upcountry people than in Bombay. What is known as the hoarded wealth of India exists in the North where the modern methods of investment have not yet penetrated. The slow progress of the War Loan is therefore due to the inability of the people to realise its advantageous terms. People in Bombay are keen business men and they know that the War Loan is the best and the most profitable investment; hence they take advantage of its favourable terms in a large measure. People upcountry know nothing about business......... What surprise is there then, that the War Loan has not appealed to them as an investment? In fact people are so ignorant about it that a very large number of uncountry residents regard it as a chanda (subscription)......... Even those who ought to know something about it, such as Mahajans and Banias, consider it as something like a subscription. We were talking the other day with a prominent Mahajan in Lucknow who being asked how much he had contributed to the War Loan said that he was a poor man and had already given more than enough of his share of the war and relief funds. He was fairly astounded when we told him that it was not a chanda, but a profitable investment. Our belief is that if the authorities and the leaders of public opinion who stand in the name of the people and claim to represent them took a little trouble to explain to the people the advantageous terms of the War Loan and to impress upon them the great opportunity that they have of investing their idle funds in a manner which will bring them an excellent rate of interest and always leave their money at call, there will be no one in India who will not put his money in it." [Elsewhere the paper writes:—"People outside Bombay naturally feel surprised at Bombay's magnificent display. Most of them ask what means have the Government of Bombay adopted to achieve this tremendous success? The reply may be summed up in one word—Sympathy. There can be no gainsaying the fact that the immense success of the War Loan in Bombay is as much due to the popularity of the Governor and his officers as to the good sense and loyalty of the people of Bombay. The generous regard and sincere affection which Lord and Lady Willingdon have for the people of their charge, the sympathetic way in which they have helped the public in each and every thing, the liberal spirit which inspires their actions have given them a firm hold upon the hearts of the people which they can easily touch and have touched with this glorious result. Much praise will go to Lady Willingdon for the striking success of her personal efforts in enlisting the active sympathies and co-operation of the Indian ladies, whose contribution equals the total contributions of some provinces. By her generous kindness and nobility of heart, Her Excellency has achieved a singular popularity among our women and as a lady told us 'they would do anything for her.' We congratulate Their Excellencies upon the success which the War Loan has attained in Bombay. It is mainly due to their personal efforts and to the indefatigable exertions of their officers and they have every right to be proud of it."]

Complaint about official pressure in connection with subscriptions to the War Loan.

Hindusthán (16), 28th Apl.; Kaiser-i-Hind* (20), 6th May, Eng. cols.

18. The Hindusthán reproduces the complaint against official pressure in connection with subscriptions to the War Loan published by the Bombay Chronicle and remarks:—The complaint is couched in mild language and does not give us a true idea of the real state of things. The oppression practised by certain over-zealous officials in the name of loyalty over poor people can better be imagined than described. Many such cases have come to our knowledge. Is it right to make the war loan a success by resorting to terrorism? Would not such a process imply the trampling under foot of the high ethical principles for which the war is being waged? We do not think a very large sum would be realised by coercing the poor to subscribe to the war loan. Such behaviour on the part of Government servants gives rise to a misunderstanding of the situation and to wild rumours. Government should put down with a strong hand any pressure that their servants exercise on the people in the matter of the war loan and thus put a stop to the discontent to which it has given rise. They should issue a notification prohibiting their servants from taking any steps to popularise the war loan and entrust the work to the popular leaders. We hope Government will take prompt steps to satisfy the people by instituting enquiries in the matter. [the Kaiser-i-Hind remarks :—" We have not the slightest doubt that it is only some idiotic officer, who has been bullying the people into subscribing for the War Loan out of all proportion to their means. It is high time that Government immediately institute an inquiry into the antics of this mountebank officer, and deal with him as he deserves. In times like these it is nothing short of a crime for any one who resorts to acts that discredit the War Loan and indirectly the war itself."]

Alleged objectionable character of the War Loan lotteries.
Gujarāti (12), 29th Apl.

19. The Gujarāti objects to the countenance given by Government to the lotteries started in many places for promoting the war loan, as in its opinion such a step is inconsistent with the dignity of Government and conduces to degrade the morals of the people. If lotteries are to be permitted in connection with the War Loan, why should they not, it asks, be permitted in behoof of churches and temples, darmashalas, roads, for the benefit of the famine-stricken, etc? Why should people not be allowed, it asks, to try their luck in opium gambling? It, however, goes on to write with approval about the sys tem of premium bonds adopted by the Municipality of Paris and declares that if such a system had been adopted in the case of the War Loan, it would have been rendered more attractive.

Comments on the proceedings of the Bombay Exemption Tribunal.
Message (5), 4th May.

20. "The proceedings of the various Exemption Tribunals are not without their humorous side, though it is a grim humour that runs through them. Exemptions have been claimed for various persons for various reasons and one of these reasons overdoes every other conceivable reason ever put forward. That reason is that liquor production is a work of first rate national importance in India! If the applicant who put forward this excuse was foolish the Tribunal which seriously entertained that excuse was absolutely silly. Among other reasons which have been put forward by the applicants for exemption is that they are indispensable in their work, possibly as indispensable as Messrs. Hilton and Boyer of the Poona Pumping Station and Settling Tank fame. Leaving the private applicants alone, the claim put forward by the Bombay Secretariat on behalf of certain persons is preposterous enough. One of the claims considered by the Poona Tribunal on Tuesday was the one from the Secretary to Government, Political Department, in regard to Messrs. D. Macdonnell and C. R. Johnstone, Assistant Superintendents in the Bombay Secretariat, for whom partial exemption was claimed. We presume that these two gentlemen were indispensable to the Political Department in the Bombay Secretariat, as their work as Assistant Superintendents could not be discharged by anybody else. Similarly, the Bombay Secretariat has claimed exemption for a number of eligible clerks in the Secretariat, because these clerkships cannot be filled by others who are non-liable to military service. When such is the case with Government departments and Government institutions, should one wonder that the exemptions are granted to private applicants on the flimsiest pretexts? Somebody has called the proceedings of the various tribunals a mere farce, and we think we may well endorse that view."

Comments on Mr. H. G. Wells' letter to the London Times regarding republican feeling in England.
Message (5), 1st May; Mahrātta* (4), 6th May.

21. "If, as the London Times says 'clever men could sometimes write very foolishly,' super-journals like the Times could write still more foolishly not sometimes but many times. The occasion for the outburst of the Times is Mr. H. G. Wells' sin in writing to its columns 'urging that the time was ripe to give a clear expression to the great volume of republican feeling always existent in the British community.'.......... The Times has taken the opportunity of preaching a homily on the doctrine of monarchy, as if that was in question, and goes on to add that loyalty to the Crown is as wise in this Empire of the democrats as it is natural and just. But the most obvious reason for this magniloquent outburst is that any form of Government, but the rule of the King-Emperor would be alien to the most cherished ideal of all the peoples of India.' Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. It is not certainly convenient for the Times to remember that people in India realise as much as any other people do what the rule of the King-Emperor is. They know and they realise that that rule of the King-Emperor is nothing but the rule of the British Parliament composed of the King, the Lords and the Commons or the three estates of the realm and latterly, the virtual rule of party politicians and party principles....... We presume that His Highness the Maharaja of Bikánir took his cue from the Times. Otherwise, there is no meaning in his volunteering to repudiate with scorn Mr. Wells' letter as something unholy. We could understand His Highness if he had spoken for himself and his brother princes. With all deference to him, we beg to submit that in a matter of this kind he is the least competent person to speak for the feelings of the great masses. In the first place, it is most foolish to imagine that the masses think anything at all of this matter and much less of the views and suggestions of Mr. Wells, for which the Maharaja feels an unspeakable horror.......... The Maharaja of Bikánir might have well reserved his remarks for an Indian audience, instead of presuming to tell the British democracy what is right or what is wrong. The speech was, we think, more enthusiastic than discreet." [The Mahrátta remarks :—" We are sorry to observe that His Highness the Maharajah of Bikaner went out of his way to repudiate the 'views and suggestions' of Mr. Wells not only on his own account but on behalf of his brother Princes and also on behalf of the masses of India and of the Indian Army.......... We assure His Highness the Maharajah of Bikaner that even in this country of 'Rajahs and Maharajahs' there are persons who fully sympathise with the views and suggestions of Mr. Wells."]

How to popularise the Home Rule movement.
Sandesh (100), 1st and 2nd May.

22. The Sandesh discusses in a series of articles the question of popularising the Home Rule movement. It says that newspaper stands should be established in places frequented by the people and that itinerant lecturers should be appointed to read out papers to the masses. It advocates meetings of ladies also wherein periodical literature may be read out to them. It holds that loyal national dramas and novels should be written and it makes a suggestion that the cinematograph should also be utilised in pushing the Home Rule propaganda. The agency of temples, Kathas and Puranas, it continues, should be made use of by Home Rule Leagues. It adds :—Where independent lecture halls cannot be had, a temple with a lecture hall may be more welcome to the people. It is our natural right to make such use of temples, since national service and service of God, loyalty to God and loyalty to the King, devotion to God and devotion to the constitution, are one and the same. Kathas and Puranas have been our free schools from times immemorial and there is no other easier medium for the education of females and the masses in current politics. [In a later issue it declares that Home Rule Puranas, Bhajans and Cries should be instituted in order to win over pilgrims. It also publishes some verses the purport of which is that there is no treason in demanding Home Rule, that even death is afraid of loyal Home Rulers and that the master is ready to give but that the steward raises an outcry. The paper holds that all movements in India have been religious and that it is proper and constitutional to carry on all agitation under the banner of religion.]

Comments on His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab's defence of his Government's action against Messrs. Pal and Tilak.
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 1st May.

23. The Government of the Punjab consider their province to be a sort of powder magazine which requires only a spark to cause an explosion. They apparently thought that the entry of Messrs. Pal and Tilak into it would supply this spark and hastened, therefore, to set the Defence of India Act in motion against them. In our opinion it is a great mistake to think that the Home Rule movement encourages rebels. His Honour has advised Indians to ponder over the failure of the Irish Home Rule movement.

Should not His Honour also ponder over the fact that close on the heels of the Sinn Fein rebellion the British Government is conferring Home Rule on Ireland? British statesmen realise when dealing with Ireland that people resort to violence only when all other legitimate and constitutional means of attaining their end fail; whereas in India it is strange that any seditious act by anyone anywhere is at once connected with constitutional movements, and these latter movements are equally condemned. His Honour asks us not to draw a parallel between Ireland and our caste-ridden country. Ireland, we are also told, was once under indigenous rule. Is Sir Michael unaware that India too was not always under foreign domination? It is useless, however, to argue with people who fail to see any difference between the Home Rule movement and a revolutionary propaganda. An impartial observer will find that the former is a natural development of the legitimate aspirations of the people. An Irish speaker recently reminded the House of Commons that Mr. Redmond could have struck at the very heart of the Empire by adopting a hostile attitude during the critical period of the war. We would ask the authorities to bear in mind that even if India had given no other help to the Empire, its steadfast loyalty at this crisis would in itself have been a great help.

Comments on Mr. Tilak's memorial to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay regarding his libel suit against Sir V. Chirol.

Young India (10), 2nd May.

24. Commenting on Mr. Tilak's memorial to His Excellency the Governor, Young India writes:—"Apart from the impropriety of the C. I. D. actively interesting itself on the side of one or the other of the parties to the case, the conduct of the agents provocateur of the C. I. D. is not at all creditable and if not properly checked and controlled it is sure to lower the prestige of the Government.......... The continued stay of Sir Valentine Chirol at Viceregal Lodge has already done much to give the people an impression that he is not here for any altruistic reasons. The answer given by the Local Government some time ago in connection with the lending of a few hands from the Oriental Translator's department was in itself most unsatisfactory and likely to have strengthened the impression on the public mind.......... Now that Mr. Tilak himself has moved in the matter and made a serious allegation against the police it behoves the Government to act promptly in the matter and put an end to the widespread scandal which it has caused amoung the public. Neglect in this matter for any reasons is bound to shake to the very root the faith of the people 'in the impartiality of British justice and integrity of British administration'."

Indu Prakásh (35), 30th Apl., Eng. cols.

25. "We sincerely trust His Excellency Lord Willingdon will immediately take proper steps to prevent Government servants, whether of the C. I. D. or any other Department, from interfering clandestinely in the suit between Mr. Tilak and Sir Valentine Chirol. Mr. Tilak alleges, on the authority of a reliable source, that members of the C. I. D. in several places are interfering and meddling in the affair by actively canvassing for likely witnesses in the interests of Sir Valentine Chirol. If this be true, such conduct is most reprehensible and is bound to destroy public faith in the purity of British justice. But, we are sure, these doings, if they at all take place as alleged, are done without the knowledge of His Excellency's Government, for we cannot for one moment imagine that they countenance any such illegal and unfair tactics. We trust His Excellency will order an immediate enquiry into the matter and if any Government servants are found to tamper with the even course of justice, bring them to book severely in the interest of the fair name of the British administration. The assistance by the Oriental Translator's Department to Sir Valentine Chirol has already damaged the reputation of Government to an unfortunate extent in the public eye, but that the C. I. D. should be actively engaged in the service of Sir Valentine Chirol, would be the height of indescretion and reverse of fairplay to Mr. Tilak."

Comments on the cancellation of the order passed against Mr. M. K. Gandhi by the District Magistrate of Champaran, Behar.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 29th Apl.; Kaira Vartamán (61), 3rd May; Political Bhomiyo (65), 4th May.

26. Apropos of the cancellation of the order passed against Mr. M. K. Gandhi under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code to leave the Champaran District, Behar, the Kaiser-i-Hind writes:—The authorities have realised the rashness of their mistake and have acknowledged the illegality of their action by promising Mr. Gandhi to help him in his work. There can be no greater victory for straightforwardness and for the opinion of the public than this. We congratulate Mr. Gandhi on the courage he has displayed in opposing the illegal order of the Magistrate, though unsupported by anyone. Our complaint is not so much against law as against those who put it into execution in an arbitrary manner. Government should deal severely with those officers who are found responsible for spreading dissatisfaction among the public by a highhanded application of the law. [The Kaira Vartamán expresses its gratification at the cancellation of the order passed against Mr. Gandhi. It remarks that if India can produce a dozen men of the type of Mr. Gandhi she can without any delay attain to all her legitimate aspirations. The Political Bhomiyo, on the other hand, expresses its strong disapproval of the methods of passive resistance adopted by Mr. Gandhi in South Africa and remarks that he and his followers had preferred to go to jail merely for the sake of acquiring cheap popularity. It remarks that the Gold law, License Act, Marriage Act, etc., which are at present pressing hard against the Indians in South Africa owe their origin to Mr. Gandhi's useless agitation and that he has not done right in leaving his countrymen there to their fate and returning to India before securing their repeal. The paper advises Mr. Gandhi to give up dabbling in political matters and, instead of going to a far off place like Behar, devote his attention to tackling social questions affecting the people much nearer home.]

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's views about India's fitness for self-government.

Hindusthán (16), 2nd May.

27. The Hindusthán takes exception to the expressions used by Mr. Chamberlain before the Empire Parliamentary Association to the effect that India should be made a training ground for the realisation of the natural aspirations of the people. It is afraid that this means that Mr. Chamberlain is of opinion that India is first to be made into a training ground and after that process is completed then only would Indians be given training in politics. At such a rate, it fears, Mr. Chamberlain would think of giving anything approaching self-government to India only after centuries and the injustice under which Indians are labouring would be perpetuated for ages to come. It believes that if Mr. Chamberlain were to visit India he would soon be convinced of the injustice of the opinion he has formed of India and would take steps to redress her wrongs.

Mahrátta (4), 6th May.

*28. The Mahrátta remarks:—"Mr. Chamberlain, as we have said above is vague. What is playing the full part? Whatever it may mean, does Mr. Chamberlain hold that Indians are not qualified to play it to-day? We maintain that England can safely trust us to play 'the full part' satisfactorily, as satisfactorily as the colonies play it. Even to-day we have the necessary proportion of our countrymen qualified for supplying National and Imperial 'Cabinets and Parliaments' with able brains. As to our capacity to supply fighting men of the right stamp in adequate numbers no one has any doubt. The routine duties of the civilans will find many capable hands to discharge them. Everything will go on quite as it should, even from the standpoint of the efficiency-faddist—within a decade from the day when we are put in possession of rights which constitute the necessary capital for playing the 'full part'."

The Indian public should have a voice in the financial policy of the country.

Gujaráti (12), 29th Apl.

29. In view of the fact that India is to be fully represented at future Imperial Conferences, the Gujaráti suggests that the control of the British Parliament over the Indian administration will have to be removed to place India on a footing of equality with the self-governing Colonies. It refers to the pronouncements recently made in Parliament to the effect that the the House of Commons has no direct control over the Indian Budget and that it has no power to alter or readjust any scheme of taxation which has been approved by the Legislative Council of the Viceroy and opines that early steps will have to be taken to break down the uncontrolled authority which the officials enjoy in the matter of framing the Budget and to make them responsible to the people.

Government's neglect of Indian men of science.
Kesari (92), 1st May.

30. Referring to the remarks of Mr. Innes, Director of Industries in Madras, as president on the occasion of a lecture delivered by Mr. Ramaswami Acharya on 'Weaving factories', praising Japanese and depreciating Indian artisans the Kesari says:—If Mr. Innes pondered over the question whether the defects observable in Indian artisans existed even two or three centuries ago or whether they are of recent growth he would find out the weak link in his reasoning. If he had also taken into consideration the all-round encouragement given by the Japanese Government to Japanese manufactures he would not have abused Indian merchants and manufacturers. How eager our Government are in encouraging our savants, can be judged from the instances of Professors Bose, Roy and Dutt. Professor Dutt has recently made researches on Halogenation useful in producing asphyxiating gas and the American Government have given him a grant, but our Government have no cognizance of it. If Government were to afford proper facilities to Indians and show right appreciation of their powers they would not fail to find the requisite intelligence, imagination and daring existing in Indians. But of what use are all such qualities to 'hewers of wood and drawers of water'?

Comments on the Government attitude towards the discussion by Government officials of political issues with Mr. Curtis of the Round Table.
Message (5), 5th May.

31. "There can be no harm if officials study political problems, observe the political life around them and privately discuss them with the leaders of thought. That, therefore, officials were distinctly and clearly permitted, if not encouraged, to discuss political issues with Mr. Curtis can in no manner be reprehensible. But at the same time one likes to ask whether Government would have maintained a similar wise attitude, if, instead of the Round Table Curtis, they had to deal with a Square Table Bannerjee, Motilal Ghose or Kelkar. We hear that in some cases Indian officials are not only not allowed to discuss politics with such leaders, but also with their own brothers or uncles or even parents! Why, in some few cases officials are reported to have had to definitely make it understood to their superiors that, when they go to their 'political' brother's house for marriage or any other ceremony, they would not discuss politics at all there!"

Comments on a reported speech of Mr. Wood, Principal, Roorkee College, to his students.
Young India (10), 2nd May.

32. "Regard for space forbids us from enlarging and improving upon Mr. Wood's perfect candidness. If this is the sort of 'gentlemanliness' which he would inculcate on his students, Government would be well advised in sending Mr. Wood right about. Mr. Wood has taken the most cowardly advantage of his position as principal to insult the students, and perhaps he wishes his students to imbibe their ideas of a 'gentleman' from such conduct of their principal. The remarks constitute a downright libel on Indian home-life and also show that Mr. Wood is thoroughly unfit to be the head of an institution which some day aspires to become an Imperial one. We shall content ourselves for the present by remarking that the type of Indian life he has known is the creation of the Government by his own countrymen in this country."

Indian Social Reformer (2), 6th May.

33. "We think that Principal Wood, if he said what is attributed to him, is utterly unfit to be the head of an Indian College; but that does not prevent us from recognising that he is an honest man who has the courage of his convictions. There are other Principals whose opinion of Indians is scarcely different from his, but who act on the maxim that discretion is the better part of valour, and even manage to acquire the reputation of being sympathetic friends of Indians. The truth is that the Englishman in Indian is in a false position: the more sensitive and intellectual he is, the more keenly does he feel it. If he goes to France or Japan or even China, he can give free scope to his innate desire to see the best side of the people among whom he sojourns. In India, however, he can do so only at the peril of disquieting reflections regarding his privileged position which is not always easily related to his merits or deserts. The better type of Englishman develops out of this feeling, increased humility of judgment, great considerateness towards his Indian fellow-subjects, and a keen appreciation of his duty and his obligations to India. The inferior type seeks to salve its conscience by discovering or inventing moral obliquities in Indian human nature. Not until the Englishman is put upon an absolutely equal footing with the Indian in the administration of the country, and made to depend solely on his personal merits for making his way in it, will this false and demoralising position, cease to exist. Such a change is imperative in the interest of both races.

Appeal to His Excellency Lord Willingdon to devote the remainder of his term of office to the solution of questions affecting the welfare of the public.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 30th Apl.

34. Referring to the approaching end of Lord Willingdon's tenure of office as Governor of Bombay, the Praja Mitra and Pársi declares that the people of the Presidency strongly hope that His Excellency, exercising the courage displayed by His Majesty's Government as well as the Indian Government, may now take in hand the solution of the problems affecting the advancement of the people within his charge. It remarks that His Excellency is a just and sympathetic Governor, but that he has not thus far been able to achieve the substantial results expected from a Liberal statesman like him on account of his unfortunately tenacious adherence to the principle of not participating in any controversial matter during the continuance of the war. It adds that his interpretation of this principle is quite different from that put upon it by the above-mentioned Governments. The paper does not regard the demands that are being made at present by the people of this Presidency for the expansion of education and the extension of local self-government as controversial matters inasmuch as the public are unanimous in making them, the opposition to them only proceeding from a particular set of officials. It advises His Excellency not to heed this opposition and relegate these matters to the category of controversial questions, particularly when His Majesty's Government have, in spite of their present serious preoccupations arising from the war, thought fit to take the necessary measures with regard to them. According to the paper the people cherish a strong hope that His Excellency Lord Willingdon will not be slow, during the remainder of his term of office, to try and make his governorship as memorable as those of Mount Stuart Elphinstone and Lord Reay.

C. I. D. activities against the Home Rule movement at Delhi.

Mahrátta (4), 6th May.

35. The Mahrátta quotes the communication addressed by Bar.-at-Law to the Bombay Chronicle and published in the issue of that paper dated the 3rd May 1917, complaining of the activities of the Criminal Investigation Department at Delhi against the Home Rule movement, and remarks :—" This in the capital of the country! The Home Rule movement is a legitimate movement, declared to be so by judicial authorities in more than one province and by more than one Government in the land. It is too late in the day to question its legality and constitutionality now. His Excellency the Viceroy is no lover of Home Rulers. We know it. Still we cannot believe that the abovementioned Criminal Investigation Department attentions can have or hope to have his approval. We cannot, of course, be sure. The authorities in Delhi seem to be seriously determined to frighten away the Home Rule propaganda out of their jurisdiction. But this is scarcely a reasonable policy. It is surprising that the Christian Governments of Indian territories should neglect the moral of the story of the Forbidden Fruit. The Home Rule ideal has come to stay—and to be achieved before long. There is a proverb in Marathi which literally translated runs: 'Government has long hands,' meaning that Government has ample resources to track out and punish persons who have incurred its displeasure. Are not the hands of the Moral Governor of the Universe longer? In His mysterious ways He reaches the Light Purifying to every home and individual that has been condemned to darkness by any human 'authority'. The waywardness of 'authorities' only helps to engender and foster bitterness, which is the breeding ground of revolutionary tendencies."

Comments on the treatment alleged to have been accorded by the C. I. D. to Mr. B. C. Pal during his return journey from Bombay to Calcutta.

Mahrátta (4), 6th May.

*36. The Mahrátta quotes the communication addressed by Mr. B. C. Pal to the press complaining of the way in which he was treated by the C. I. D. in his return journey from Bombay to Calcutta, and remarks:—"This is Old Russia. Babu Bepin Pal is not a common 'native'. He is one of the political instructors of India and has a following in many circles. High-strung patriotism will think bitter thoughts on a milder provocation. If the C. I. D. cannot do its appointed task in a less offensive manner it ought to be abolished. Government will not gain by the mean and insulting treatment which its servants mete out to our revered spokesmen. Such insults make revolutionaries. It would almost seem that in some official quarters peaceful India is not loved at all! 'Peace and good will between the people and Government' is 'a fad' in which some officials seem to have no faith. Forced subscriptions to war loan, the persecution of the patriots of Delhi added to the above story of Babu Bepin Pal give a fair idea of the policy (or the want of policy?) that rules in this country. There is good at the core of every evil. The fanatical (that is the only appropriate description) persecution of legitimate activities and law-abiding well-wishers of the Empire, which is now gleefully indulged in by not a few officials high and low, will, our Faith in Good assures us, bring us Better Days. God bless our persecutors!"

Comments on the Government Press Note regarding the Emigration Conference to be held in London.

Praja Bandhu (24), 29th Apl., Eng. cols.

37. Referring to the Government Press Note on the subject of the Emigration Conference to be held in London, the Praja Bandhu remarks:—"We are no doubt glad that India will be represented at the above Conference. At the same time it must be said that the character of the representation is not such as can meet with the approval of the Indian public. A mere glance at the above list will suffice to show this. The representatives, with the solitary exception of Sir S. P. Sinha, are all English officials, and as such they are not the best fitted to view the question from the Indian standpoint. As for Sir S. P. Sinha it is no doubt true that he is one of us, but he has so far not shown any special interest in or study of the question. One can well understand the desire of the authorities to appoint Government officers as representatives of the India Office, but there is another and an important aspect of the question that has evidently escaped their notice. In order that the representation may be just and adequate it is necessary that a couple of non-official gentlemen who have studied closely this problem of emigration in its different aspects, e. g., Mr. Gandhi, Mr. Polak or Mr. Andrews, should be appointed as representatives at the Conference, for none can put the Indian case there as lucidly and independently as the three gentlemen named above."

Criticism of the Government policy with regard to the period of land revenue settlements.

Hindusthán (16), 30th Apl.

38. The Hindusthán remarks that the official class in India holds the belief that the interests of Government are separate from those of the people and that both can thrive independently of each other. It maintains that such a belief on the part of Government is erroneous and tends to operate detrimentally in the matter of the advancement of the people. By way of illustration the paper refers to the alleged effects of the present system of land revenue settlements followed by Government in British India which, while filling the Government treasury, retards the progress of the people. It is of opinion that the system of revising the land revenue assessment every ten years in Sind is harmful to the interests of the people as well as Government. It deeply regrets the fact that Government do not pay heed to the demands made by the people of various provinces to increase the period of land revenue settlements obtaining in them. The paper wishes that Government may soon give up their present narrow policy in this connection. It refers to resolution brought by the elected members of the Punjab Legislative Council, urging that the present period of land revenue settlements in that province may be increased to 30 years, which was lost as a result of the President giving his casting vote against it, and it scoffs at the plea alleged to be have been advanced by Government that they did not wish to commit themselves to any fixed policy in this matter. The paper then proceeds to observe:—Do Government know how much harm accrues to the people from the absence of any such fixed policy and how deep is the discontent that has been caused among them as a result of it? If agriculture has not yet developed satisfactorily in India, is that not due mainly to these short-period settlements? And yet the fact remains that Government do not open their eyes and go on following their laissez faire policy. This policy, whether it be due to indolence or indifference or interested motives, should be at once set aside and the principle that the interests of Government and the people are identical should not only be recognised in theory but also be given effect to in practice.

Higher appointments in the Civil Medical Service should not be given to I. M. S. men.

Dnyán Prakásh (33), 4th May.

39. In 1908 Lord Morley clearly laid it down that higher appointments in the Civil Medical Department should no longer be the monopoly of I. M. S. officers. The Government of India found out a loophole to evade this order and it has since remained a dead letter. It was earnestly hoped that the Public Services Commission would at least endorse Lord Morley's decision if it made no other useful recommendations. The Commission's report in this respect, however, is wholly disappointing. The following figures for 1910 will be found interesting. Out of 464 higher appointments in the Medical Department 354 were held by I. M. S. officers. Of the remaining 110 which could be filled up in India 55 were bestowed on Military Assistant Surgeons who are necessarily not Indians. Ten posts were vacant and ten more were occupied by uncovenanted officers. This left only 35 posts to which Indians could aspire! The Government of India, however, sees nothing unfair in this arrangement. In our opinion I. M.S. officers should be entirely excluded from Civil appointments. If that is not possible their number should be strictly circumscribed. Government, however, appear unwilling to submit to any limitations to their discretionary powers. We strongly protest against this injustice and urge Government to arrive at an equitable solution of this question when the Commission's report comes under their consideration.

Recommendation that Mirza Abbas Ali Baig should be appointed member of the Bombay Executive Council in succession to the Honourable Mr. Chaubal.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 29th Apl.

40. Speculating as to who would be appointed to succeed the Honourable Mr. Chaubal who will shortly retire from his position of Indian member of the Bombay Executive Council, the Kaiser-i-Hind expresses its strong belief that the post, when it becomes vacant, will very likely go to a Muhammadan. It remarks that it should be borne in mind that this post, which is supposed to raise a citizen to the highest pinnacle of his public career, should not be treated as one that could be utilised for rewarding services done to Government, but that appointments to it should be so made that not only the interests of the public may be safe-guarded but it might enable the authorities to ascertain how far the Indians are fit for Self-government. The paper then goes on to refer to Mirza Abbas Ali Baig's career in his different official capacities and, dwelling upon his success as a member of the Council of the Secretary of State for India, suggests that Lord Willingdon should not fail to avail himself of the services of a Muhammadan officer of ripe experience like Mr. Baig, who is shortly going to return to India.

Necessity of instituting a Civil Court for the City of Bombay.

Message (5), 2nd May.

41. "The Judicial Department of the Government is the proverbial slow tortoise which jaunts along to win surely though slowly. In October last year, a circular letter went forth to the High Court and other bodies inviting their opinion as to whether it was possible to improve and extend the existing Small Causes Court or whether it was necessary to institute a full fledged City Civil Court in order to satisfy the requirements of the litigant public in the city. From all that we have come to know of the working of the Small Causes Court, it is our deliberate conviction that the time has come for reforming the Small Causes Court and instituting a City Civil Court, in order to meet the needs of the city.......... The public of the city has no faith in the virtue or wisdom of the Small Causes Court. This may be due to the manner in which the personnel is selected, and if in future the personnel is selected solely on higher considerations of merit, efficiency, legal acumen and sympathy, perhaps things may improve. But so long as hum an nature is what it is, it is impossible to expect much this way. We would r ather suggest the total abolition of the Small Causes Court, which, however convenient from the administrative point of view, is generally not conducive to the proper administration of justice, and the substitution of regularly constituted Civil Courts, with jurisdiction extending up to Rs. 5,000......... In this connection, we would also urge the imperative necessity for putting an end to the system of law touts and the interposition of attorneys between the litigant public and counsel......... As regards the question, now before Government, we emphatically regard the establishment of a City Civil Court as a sine qua non to the proper administration and cheapening of justice. Possibly, the consideration of initial cost may weigh to some extent against the establishment of the Civil Court. Even were it necessary, Government should have no hesitation in incurring it, if only to restore the confidence of the public in our courts. As it is, their faith has been almost completely shaken and many an honest litigant has come to believe that centres of justice have become prostituted by the rascality of a race of unscrupulous men to whom we have referred above."

Recent cotton fires at Colaba (Bombay.)
Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 3rd May.

42. The Praja Mitra and Pársi refers to the recent epidemic of cotton fires at Colába and attributes it partly to the absence of adequate measures, such as are being taken in other civilised countries, to prevent spontaneous combustion of cotton. It believes that Government would do well to get the services of an expert from America at the expense of the cotton merchants to advise them as to the steps that should be taken to prevent cotton fires and to point out to them the defects in their present methods of storing cotton. The paper also refers to the belief entertained in some quarters as to the probability of these fires being due to the machinations of some foreign com petitors of the Indian textile industry. It hopes that the Criminal Inve stigation Department of Bombay will not make the least delay in investigating this phase of the question. It also suggests that the report which this Department is stated to have made to Government, in connection with similar tricks supposed to have been played by German agents in previous years with the cotton stored at Colaba may be published, if its publi cation can now be regarded as harmless, so that it might enable the owners of cotton to take the necessary precautionary measures.

Thefts in Lárknáa (Sin[illegible]).
Sind Patrika (44), 21st Apl., Eng. cols.

43. "A number of petty thefts are said to have occurred this week in the town proper and some of them in broad daylight......... We do hope that the Police authorities are not uncons cious of the fact that the security of property has been much disturbed during the past few days and that vi gorous measures are urgently called for to nip the mischief in the bud. The m ischief seems to be due to local badmashes, Hindus or Muhammadans, who have of late escaped the attention they deserve at the hands of the Police......... Inadequacy of the Police force is another complaint. The Police force is said to be one-third of the sanctioned number, i.e., 40 instead of 60. It is, therefore, expedient that the deficiency be made up from the Head Quarter Police, as a temporary measure, till things assume their normal aspect.".

EDUCATION.

Comments on the statement of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab about the willingness of the Punjab Government to make primary education free and compulsory in selected areas.
Hindusthán (16), 1st May.

44. The Hindusthán expresses great satisfaction at the statement made by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in the Legislative Council of that province, declaring that his Government was re ady to make primary education free and compulsory w ithin selected local areas provided that the local bod ies were willing to make the necessary arrangements in that connection. The paper regards this as a bold stroke of statesmanship and believes that it will open a new page in the history of education in India. It also believes that the example set by the Punjab Government in this matter will stimulate other Provincial Governments and will also make the people of other provinces more hopeful. The paper hopes that the Punjab Government will fulfil their promise in its entirety and will undertake the necessary legislation without delay. It observes that progress in this direction in the whole of India will depend upon the success of the experiment in the Punjab and, therefore, opines that the funds at the disposal of the local bodies in the Punjab, if insufficient for the purpose of making primary education free, should be supplemented by help from private individuals. It trusts that the people of the Punjab will not allow the cause of free and compulsory education to be marred by failing to provide the necessary funds for it.

Protest against the proposed appointment of Rao Bahadur Artal as President of the Belgaum District Local Board.
Sandesh (100), 5th May.

45. We understand Government intend appointing Rao Bahadur Artal President of the Belgaum District Local Board. The appointment is rightly viewed with great disfavour by the people of the Belgaum District. Rao Bahadur Artal's antecedents are such as would justify this disfavour. People demand a non-official President because he is better able to command their confidence. Rao Bahadur Artal is not such a man. [In a long letter to the paper a correspondent writes :—Rao Bahadur Artal is now too old and too weak to do any useful work and is besides a man of ordinary intelligence. If Government desire to show their appreciation for his past services there are many honorary posts in their gift ; he might be appointed an Honorary Magistrate. If no other suitable person is available Government might revert to the old practice and appoint the Collector to be President of the Local Board.]

Comments on the Government Resolution refusing to hand over the pumping station to the Poona Municipality.
Message (5), 29th Apl.

46. "Yesterday we published an account of the passing of the resolution of the Poona Municipality protesting against the use of insulting language by the Divisional Commissioner and the refusal of Government to hand over to that body the charge of the Pumping Station and the Settling Tank which Works were temporarily taken over under their charge by the Government. The Collector had consulted Mr. Mandy on this matter and the latter gentleman had given the view that it would be disastrous for the Municipality to take charge of the Works, for that they required the supervision of the two experts—Messrs. Hilton and Boyer—who were unwilling to serve the Municipality. Now who is this Boyer, who is thought to be so indispensable? We shall not say to what class of super-engineers Messrs. Boyer and Mandy belong, but we know something of their past. Mr. Boyer served the Municipality on Rs. 100 per mensem and his services were dispensed with as he could not satisfy his masters. And as to Mr. Mandy, the Poona Drainage works fittingly stand as an underground monument to his reputation of ill odours. Mr. Mandy, being a super-engineer, thought himself above the elementary law, of mechanics, but the dirty sewage water in Poona, being inappreciative of the super-engineer's transcendental views, refused to give up its properties and plunged the Poonaites in distress by reason of its cursed tendency to flow downwards and not jump upwards. Again it was Mr. Mandy who spoiled a part of Poona by draining the sewage water in the Nakzari stream. Further, it was under Mr. Mandy that the Settling Tank was constructed and that some walls gave way before the work was finished. Such was the super-engineer who is consulted by the Government as an expert and who gives a certificate to Mr. Boyer, whose services were dispensed with by the Municipality for something like incompetence, stating in the certificate that he is an expert in his business, so much so that he is irreplaceable and indispensable. If the Government want to foist a Municipal Commissioner on Poona, they should do it with a better show of reason than their attitude in this matter reveals. Again, even a Divisional Commissioner is not, or should not, be above the common decencies of life. Surely, the Poona Municipality, presided over by Mr. H. N. Apte and comprising men like the Honourable

Mr. Paranjpye, the Honourable Mr. Kamat, Professor Limaye, Professor Bhagwat, Dr. Gokhale and others, does not deserve practically to be styled "foolish" by even a Commissioner."

Kesari (92), 1st May.

47. The policy indicated by Government in this correspondence is of such an insolent nature that people should fight to the end and get it changed, or if that is impossible they should hand over the municipality to Government and admit that they are unfit for local self-government. There is no third alternative that would be consistent with self-respect. The Poona Municipality has now to declare that it is better to be widowed than to live as an unhappy wife. The municipality has many eminent personages serving in it, and if the Bombay Government honestly hold that all these men combined cannot manage a settling-tank they should put a stop to the farce of local self-government, abolish the municipality and take its mangement in their own hands or entrust it to some other body—if not, they should suitably punish the shameless official who refused the plain demand of the municipality and who, in addition, dubbed it 'foolish'. Government have an excellent opportunity to show their moral courage and prove the honesty of their views, and we advise them not to lose it. The Poona Municipality has addressed a letter to Government in this connection and we await their reply to it. We shall deal with it later on when the reply is received.

Comments on the attitude taken up by Mr. Hudson, Collector of Surat, in the matter of the appointment of a non-official president for the Surat District Board.

Hindusthán (16), 3rd May.

48. Referring to the meeting of the District Board of Surat which was recently held to consider whether the Board was in favour of having a non-official president, the Hindusthán makes adverse comments upon the observations made by Mr. Hudson who presided at the meeting to the effect that if the Board decided to have a non-official president Government would appoint a person of the Board's choice and that he would in that case resign but that the members should remember that the president of a District Board has to look after many things. The paper remarks:—These words of Mr. Hudson were quite unseasonable. "Enlightened self-interest" seems to underlie them. Mr. Hudson's attitude as president was not quite desirable on that occasion. Where lay the reason for his specially reminding the meeting about the serious nature of the duties of the president of a District Board? This reminder on his part points to his unwillingness to resign his present position as president of the District Board. If that was the case and if he intended to influence the opinion of the Board from considerations of self-interest, can Government be said to have secured the unbiassed opinion of the District Board? Has Mr. Hudson done right in securing the present opinion of the Board by influencing on the spot the opinion of its less courageous members by means of the words he addressed to them? Government wanted the opinion of the Board, not that of Mr. Hudson. Why did not Mr. Hudson hold his tongue under those circumstances? [The paper then goes on to suggest that the unwillingness on the part of officials generally to give up, even to some extent, their arbitrary powers is responsible for the carrying on of the agitation for Swarajya and Home Rule. It also considers the action of those who supported the resolution in favour of continuing the present official president to be the result of their weakness and timidity.]

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

India's future position in the Empire.

Kesari (92), 8th May; Dnyán Prakásh (33), 6th and 8th May; Indu Prakásh (35), 5th May.

1. Referring to the resolution passed at the Imperial War Conference regarding the relations of the different units of the British Empire, the Kesari says:—The Colonies have perfected their Swarájya and rendered it permanent, but no mention of India is made in connection with Swarájya. Only a fine phrase has been flung at the face of India. There is to be 'full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of the Imperial Commonwealth and of India as a prominent portion thereof'. 'Of what worth is that importance which does not include the rights of Swarájya?'—What wonder is there if the people of India give vent to such an ejaculation? The importance of India is there; India does not deny it and even England cannot deny it after the war. But this importance will be only for the benefit of England! India is important because it has an army trained at the cost of India and available at any time. India is important because it produces wheat and cotton for the people of England. India is important because gold and other valuable minerals can be had in plenty in this country. India is important because it can consume crores of rupees worth of English manufactured articles. The importance of India can be described in various such ways. At the most English people may find the description sweet to their ears; what is there to charm us in it? [The Dnyán Prakásh says:—We are glad to note that the principle of reciprocity has been accepted by the Imperial Conference, but it would be foolish to give any opinion on it till we know the regulations and conditions of reciprocity. For they may be devised in a way to benefit only one party. The arrangement suggested by the Conference in connection with preferential tariffs will be ruinous to India. Though Indians are not for free trade both Indians and the Government of India were united in holding that the policy of treating on a favoured basis England and the Colonies would be harmful to India, when the question was discussed in the régime of Lord Curzon. Circumstances have not changed since then. The resolution about the reconstruction of the British Empire is also unsatisfactory. Indians will not but condemn it if there is to be any difference in the status of the Colonies and India. In a further issue the paper writes:—Indians will be contented if British statesmen accept the ideal of swarájya and promise to grant it fully in a stated number of years and immediately introduce some reforms. But the first instalment should not be merely nominal. Otherwise everything may end in confusion in the name of swarájya. There is reason to believe that the authorities intend to do something in this direction, otherwise the London Times would not have called for a declaration of policy. We should not any more remain content with showy reforms. The first instalment of reforms as suggested by the Moslem League and the Congress should be introduced in its entirety. Referring to the speech of His Majesty the King-Emperor in reply to the address from the Colonial and Indian representatives at the War Conference, the Indu Prakásh remarks:—The full extent of India's gain cannot be ascertained just at present. But the end of the indentured labour system, preferential tariffs, freedom to visit the Colonies and lastly the admission of Indian representatives at the Imperial War Conference are no small gains to begin with. This is only the thin end of the wedge. It should now be our first endeavour to secure control over the administration of our country which we do not yet possess. In order to achieve this it was essential that our relations with Great Britain and the Colonies should be clearly defined. This has practically been accomplished now.

Gujaráti (12), 6th May.

2. The War Conference has come to an end and from the various speeches made in the Conference and elsewhere it seems as if the future of India has been planned and laid out. But will India have to accept the resolutions approved of by the so-called representatives of India? The Colonial representatives know their own interests and can take action to advance them. But we do not think either Sir S. P. Sinha or the Maharaja of Bikanir has made a study of Indian questions. We are, under the circumstances, afraid that the plan of future development settled at the Conference will prove merely a mirage for India. The Conference has given its approval to preferential tariff within the Empire. Let us now consider what influence preferential tariff will have on India. In the first place India will have to sell her raw materials within the Empire and so she will have to be contented with the prices given to her in the absence of outside competition. Similarly she will have to buy what she wants at a dear rate, even though she can get them cheap elsewhere. It is said that South African merchants recently suffered losses by having to supply cocoanut kernels exclusively to England according to the order published by Mr. Bonar Law. Mr. Bonar Law is opposed to the enhancement of import duties in India and so he will use his influence to get them repealed after the war. The import duty of seven and a half per cent. on cotton goods is not on the whole very beneficial to India as she will have to pay about seven crores and a half by way of interest on the war contribution and she will get only a couple of crores by means of the enhanced import duty. An assurance has been given that India will in future be represented at the Imperial Conference. But we have no intimation as to what place India will be given in the Empire. The Maharaja of Bikanir has given out his opinion that India is not yet ripe for self-government. This opinion would look well in the mouth of an Anglo-Indian official. India now wants to know definitely what time England would take to make her fit for swarajya. Mr. Chamberlain has given expression to hopeful views about India, but people have lost faith in sweet words and want to know what position they will hold in the Empire. India is to be treated as an important constituent of the Empire by being given representation in the Imperial Conference. But it does not seem as if she has secured any powers in the matter of administering her internal affairs.

The responsibility of Parliament for the good government of India has become a mere sham.

Message (5), 6th and 11th May.

3. "It has been widely noticed in recent years that the responsibility of Parliament for the government of India has become a myth, pure and simple. In our opinion two main causes have operated to bring about the state of things which many people who lived in the early seventies and eighties are mourning to-day. Firstly, there is the tendency of the Government both in England and India to become autocratic and intolerant of outside criticism. Secondly, since the days of Bright and Bradlaugh, the members of Parliament have ceased to take any direct or active interest in Indian affairs, particularly owing to their ignorance of such affairs. Thanks to the powerful bureaucratic influences in the Council of the Secretary of State, Indian affairs are presented to Parliament in the shape of accomplished facts and members have no interest or incentive to go behind them and challenge enquiry and substantiation...... ... During the mail week, Sir Charles Henry, the Liberal Member of the Wellington division of Shropshire, interrogated Mr. Bonar Law in the House of Commons on the desirabitity of a Parliamentary Commission for the purpose of examining and investigating the policy which might be recommended by the Government of the day in connection with Indian affairs. Apart from the looseness of the interrogatory, the reply of Mr. Bonar Law was as inconsistent as disappointing. While he did not propose, as at present advised, to take the course recommended by Sir Charles, he admitted that careful consideration was being given to the whole question and the enquiry was not complete. The answer, we may take it, was consistent with the policy of a 'Government of supermen in a hurry' as the Nation describes the Lloyd George Government. In other words, while these supermen grudged an open enquiry such as a Paliamentary Commission involves, they were conducting an enquiry into Indian affairs through the Napoleons on office stools in a private personal way, because India was a family affair of their own and no one, who had not been admitted into the charmed circle of supermen, had any right to an insight into such a family affair......... The whole thing is shrouded by an atmosphere of complete unreality and people can hardly be blamed if they have lost faith in the make-believe of Parliamentary responsibility which is flung in their teeth, whenever anything goes wrong with the Indian administration. On the other hand, the bureaucratic influences have made a powerful combine to reduce Parliament into irresponsibility and well may they congratulate themselves on the dexterity with which they have managed it." [In a subsequent issue the paper writes:—"The recent 'utterance' of the Maharaja of Bikanir in England that 'no reasonable man thinks India fit for full self-government' at present only gives a very humiliating and ludicrous position of the Maharaja himself. This is the utterance of an Indian Ruler who is much praised by the very audience he was addressing as one of the most capable and cultured rulers of Indian Native States. Such being the case, we are incessantly forced to ask whether the Maharaja himself is fit to rule over a nation. If, as he says, India is not yet fit for full self-government, why should he not leave the management of his own State under the guardianship of the benign Indian bureaucracy to be better administered? His Highness might then contentedly rest in solitude, enjoying a munificent pension till such day when Indians will be fit for self-government. It may be, Mr. Chamberlain might have promised this 'able' Maharaja an 'unique' position of 'subordinate superiority' in the coming reconstruction of the Indian Administration and that is why he so very religiously and accurately dances to the tune of that one 'autocract' of the whole world."]

Comments on Mr. Chamberlain's views about India's fitness for self-government.

Gujaráti Punch (14), 6th May.

4. We are disappointed at the opinion expressed by Mr. Chamberlain at the luncheon given to the Colonial and Indian representatives of the War Conference by the Empire Parliamentary Association to the effect that India is not yet ripe for self-government. Such an opinion ill accords with the aspirations of the Indian people and is not calculated to give rise to any hopes or expectations. On the contrary the fact that Mr. Chamberlain holds such views will not in any way please the people in this country. It seems that Mr. Chamberlain is in no way conversant with the real state of affairs in India, nor can he be said to be well informed about the aims and aspirations of the Indian people. According to Mr. Chamberlain's view India is still to be made fit for self-government and that it will get self-government after its fitness is proved. It does not reflect credit upon British rule in India if India is really unfit for self-government. As long as people are not given an effective voice in the Government of the country such utterences are bound to increase their disappointment.

Alleged analogy between the position of Poland under Russian domination and that of India.

Mahrátta (4), 13th May.

*5. "Dr. E. J. Dillon's article in the Daily Telegraph, reproduced by the Times of India, dealing with Poland contains the following:—'The story of the Russian Poles—the most numerous group of the ancient kingdom—is permeated with the atmosphere of the Tsardom and bristles with ups and downs, promises and deceptions, hopes and disappointments. For well nigh half a century all the well-paid offices of State, the lucrative professions, and the material advantages flowing from grandiose undertakings were reserved for Russians who were not the best specimens of their race. This privileged class, which alone could make its voice heard in the State departments and the Palace, had therefore irresistible motives for baulking every reform conceived by the Emperor, stifling every plaintive cry for redress and thwarting any good measure which chanced to be inscribed on the Statute-book. Poland was the paradise of the ne'er-do-wells whose career had been wrecked in the centre of the Empire, and of the ambitious in quest of a shortcut to power or emolument'......... Readers will notice that India's story of the last fifty years and more may be written in almost identical terms! With Free Russia, Poland is assured Freedom. As has already been reported in the Press, the new Government of Russia has declared that the Poles will be granted the constitution that will be prepared for Poland by a constituent Assembly of Poles elected on the basis of universal suffrage. When is India to be blessed with the Sacred Goal of Humanity?"

Contrast between the educational policies of the English and Indian Governments.
Subodh Patrika (38), 6th May, Eng. cols.

6. "It is the tendency of Provincial Governments in this country, more particularly that of the local Government, to shelve aside educational questions on the score of the all-important excuse of war. Financial stringency is responsible for cutting short the settled programme of primary education. It is responsible for postponing many useful educational undertakings. If the war has taxed the resources of any country most it is of England. But there the policy of the President of the Board of Education is altogether of a different kind from that of the Government of India. Dr. Fisher has raised the school age to fourteen. He has in his budget for 1917-18 provided for agricultural education in village schools. A substantial amount has been voted for improving the salaries of school masters. Altogether the present allotment to education in Great Britain exceeds that of the previous year by nearly four millions of pounds. And this at a time when the war loan has mounted to thousands of millions sterling! What a contrast this presents to the similar performance of the Education Member in the Imperial Council? War or no war, education cannot be permitted to lag behind. Dr. Fisher has with true statesmanship realised this and has, therefore, put the needs of the country in this respect above all others. We hope the Government of India and particularly of Bombay will not fail to understand the lesson which Dr. Fisher's Budget teaches them."

Native States and the Indian Government.
Dnyán Prakásh (33), 8th May.

7. The grievances of people in British India are so numerous that they are unable to devote any time to the discussion of the affairs of the Native States. Government also have banned all such discussion in the Legislative Councils. The condition of the Indian rulers is really more pitiable than that of their subjects. Lord Macaulay said about a hundred years ago that Residents and Political Agents issued orders to Indian rulers under the guise of advice. This state of things continues to this day. The Indian rulers are not yet freed from the trammels of Political Officers. They do not get proper education and as they wield considerable power and are inexperienced they easily fall into errors and thus into the clutches of Political Officers. They then lose their complete independence and the State passes under the dual control of the Chief and the Political Officer. His Highness the Gaekwar once declared that Native States had no desire to interfere in the administration of British India and, therefore, the British Government should also not interfere in the internal administration of Native States. Recently His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir gave expression to similar views. As His Highness is one of those selected to advise the Secretary of State it becomes clear as to what the nature of the coming reforms will be.

Publication of an extract from "Swami Vivekanand, Part II," dwelling upon the wretched plight of Indians.
Kaira Vartamán (61), 9th May.

8. Under the heading "Our sorry plight" the Kaira Vartamán publishes the following passage which purports to be an extract from a book entitled "Swámi Vivekánand, Part II":—You have become really miserable and unmanly by continuously thinking such thoughts as "what can a poor wretch like me do?" Almost the whole nation has caught the infection. Once visit the countries across the ocean and see how rapidly the current of life is flowing there. And what is the condition in your country on this side of the world? In spite of having acquired so much knowledge, people here do not understand what to do beyond going from door to door humbly supplicating service like beggars. The very sense of humanity has been lost in you as a result of your enduring kicks and (beating with the) shoes. To tell the truth, you are not now worth even a pie. You have got a beautiful country which is prolific in fruits and flowers, nature in her kind dispensation can make your country bring forth in a measure crores of times larger than other countries and still you have to struggle hard for getting food and clothing How sorrowful has become your plight in this very bounteous land whose civilisation once spread in other parts of the earth! Do not your eyes still open in spite of your present miserable plight which is worse than that of despised curs? After having suffered so much, you do not yet cease from indulging in tall talk about your Vedás and Vedánta! What has a nation to pride itself upon which cannot make the ordinary provision for its own food and clothing and which has to pass its existence by looking up to others? What a variety of things are produced in India! But foreign nations carry away raw products from your country and turn them into gold at your expense, while you can find no better occupation than carrying loads like donkeys. Those foreign nations manufacture various goods from your raw products by the exercise of their skill and get wealthy while you people close the doors of your intellect and after giving away your treasure to others, cry for food in the agony of starvation.

Comments on the order passed against Mr. M. K. Gandhi by the District Magistrate of Champaran, Behar.

Gujaráti (12), 6th May.

9. Referring to the order issued against Mr. M. K. Gandhi, by the District Magistrate of Champaran, Behar, to leave that District, the Gujaráti considers it a piece of good fortune that Mr. Gandhi was not brought into the trap of the Defence of India Act, and was not made short work of under the deportation regulation of 1818, for under those circumstances, believes the paper, the people would not have got any justice in the immediate present. In its opinion the order of the Magistrate has given the public room for indulging in various surmises with respect to the condition of the Indian labourers of the Champaran District. It regards the order as an illustration of abuse of authority. The paper remarks that by his conduct in the present case Mr. Gandhi has taught the public a good object-lesson in the matter of accomplishing their object in a constitutional manner and of securing the cancellation of illegal orders. It then goes on to quote the words of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, stated to have been uttered by him in a session of the Imperial Legislative Council during the régime of Lord Elgin, to the effect that what he complained of was that the authorities forgot that Indians were human beings, and proceeds thus :—On the present occasion the authorities forgot that fact; but Mr. Gandhi proved more than a match for them. In the course of a book entitled 'A letter to the people of India', Mr. Curtis asked the Indians to co-operate with the officials. It would be interesting to know what Mr. Lionel Curtis thinks about the Commissioner of Muzafarpur in that connection. Mr. Curtis cannot have a better instance than the present case to learn how much regard the officials in India have for the people and how they oppose public movements set on foot for obtaining justice.

Comments on the Madras Government's circular regarding keeping students in schools and colleges aloof from political propaganda.

Gujaráti (12), 13th May, Eng. cols.; Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 13th May, Eng. cols.

10. "The circular issued by the Government of Madras for weaning students in schools and colleges from the influence of political propaganda involves an attempt to achieve the impossible, at least so far as certain instructions are concerned. Now and then such attempts have been made in the past. But they have failed, as they were bound to do. The renewed attempts are likely to share the same fate, unless of course Government are prepared for widespread agitation in connection with this question.......... The political propaganda which the Madras Government has in contemplation obviously refers to the agitation in connection with the question of self-government for India on the lines adumbrated by the Indian National Congress. That scheme has met with the acceptance of the leaders of Indian political thought and it is useless, if not absurd, to appeal to the parents and guardians of students to ask their wards not to take any interest in this subject of vital importance.......... We fail to understand why students should be prohibited from attending political meetings. During the last two years meetings have been held in connection with the war. Are students to be prevented in future from attending such political meetings? If not, on what principle of consistency can they be honestly prevented from attending political meetings like those of the Indian National Congress, the Provincial or District Conferences or meetings in connection with the question of indentured labour? Is it because Government disapprove of the latter, while they approve of the former?......... Prohibitive measures of a sweeping character are bound to fail in the long run......... A forbidden fruit is the very fruit that is ardently sought after and eagerly tasted, especially when the reasons for the prohibition are considered suspicious, unfair or interested. We do not think students in the Western countries are subjected to any such stringent restrictions and it is futile to seek to enforce them strictly in India only.' [Kaiser-i-Hind remarks:—" Frankly, though regretfully, we have to admit our incapacity to appreciate the wisdom of these new regulations. As we do not have the same faith in the capacity of the police that the Government seem to have, we wonder how such a regulation is going to be rigidly enforced. Assuming it is enforced, we fail to see how the end that Government have in view will at all be attained, for the most efficient police cannot prevent students from feeding their minds on unhealthy literature. For our own part we have always felt that an impracticable repression of a movement is its finest advertisement.......... As has been pointed out by several leaders of Indians, the greatest defect of Indian students is that their political ideas are so crude. The real danger lies in this crudeness. This crudeness will not be lessened but perpetuated by an order that seeks to repress all healthy interest in politics.......... The Madras Government would have been better advised, if they had passed an order, less drastic, but more sober and hence more practicable."]

Mahrátta (4), 13th May.

*11. "The Madras Government has set itself seriously to the task of 'improving' and supplementing the disciplinary regulations of the Madras Educational Rules with a view 'to meet the present situation.......... The unfettered discretion is the distinctive mark of unfettered bureaucratism. Our sons and daughters are not our wards, but the wards of the benign bureaucracy. They must see, hear, feel, think, speak, act according to rules framed for the purpose by the Educational authorities! The Madras circular beats even the Risley circular in some points. The latter asked undergraduates not to take an active part in politics. The Madras circular forbids them even to attend political meetings. Then, again, the Risley circular applied directly to 'colleges under public management' alone, while the new circular makes no distinction of management. It is more 'liberal'! We are advancing! Statu pupillari is a fine expression. But it is not a stage in which boys and girls can be safely trusted to the unsupplemented 'protection' of the Educational authorities. If we desire that our boys and girls should have active patriotism rooted in their constitution by the time they come out of Statu pupillari (and this must be provided for if progress is to be made in National advancement at a satisfactory pace), we must see that they come into touch with great political ideas even in their early years. As the students take in more and more of the knowledge available in schools and colleges, it is imperatively necessary that they should be brought increasingly into touch with active civic and national life. This is the rule in Free countries. In countries which are not free, a similar 'education' of the rising generation is not less but more necessary—if the achievement of Freedom is the goal."

What India has to learn from Japan.

Vivechak (70), Mar.-Apl.

12. In the course of a contribution appearing in the Vivechak number for the months of March-April the writer remarks that India should learn from Japan the following facts:—In Japan ninety per cent. of the people are educated whereas in India eighty-five per cent. of the population are illeterate; that there is not a single village in Japan without its school whereas in India four out of five villages are without a school; that education is given in Japan for the good of the people whereas in India it is imparted merely from motives of self-interest; in Japan every individual desires for national advancement whereas in India the feeling of self-interest is uppermost in the minds of the people: the Japanese children learn to say "my Japan" whereas the Indian children are taught to say "India of the English". [The writer then goes on to remark that as long as education in India is not placed under the control of Indians and is not made free and compulsory to hope for the necessary changes in the abovesaid ideas prevalent among the Indians is chimerical. He then refers to the fact of Japan being governed by a Japanese ruler and of the interests of Japan being identical with those of the Mikado, and proceeds:—] The condition of India is different from this. In the Imperial Parliament there is scarcely any time for the discussion of Indian affairs. The people have very little voice in the Legislative Councils and, therefore, it is not only that Bills on such subjects as village punchayats and compulsory education are lost in these Councils but in some provinces they are not even allowed to be introduced into the Councils. People are prevented from taking part in the National Conferences. Obstacles are placed in the path of those who wish to pay honour to patriots and the movement for swarajya is viewed with disfavour. The Indians do not possess arms not only to protect themselves from thieves and defend themselves against tigers and lions but for recapturing a run-away bull. They cannot speak or write with freedom. Indentured Indian labourers suffer hardships, like the slaves of ancient times, under the British flag. In the Colonies the Indians are required to give their thumb impressions, produce certificates from officials, etc. But in spite of this they have to suffer many difficulties. They are not allowed in those Colonies to exercise any municipal franchise, to purchase lands or freely to carry on their trade. Not only that, but the Colonials are loath to travel in the company of Indians in railway trains, steamers and tramcars. Indians are often insulted even in London, and Indian students have to suffer great difficulties while securing admission in English Universities. To liberate herself from all these hardships it is necessary for India to learn preliminary lessons from Japan in the direction of (national) advancement. It is for these reasons alone that the Indians want equal rights with the Colonies under the British flag—i. e., swarajya—from the Britons.

Alleged urgent need of drastic measures to rid Bombay and other places of the Pathan peril.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 9th May, Eng. cols.

13. "The Pathan money-lender is a curse and a pest and a constant danger to society. It is unthinkable that in these civilized times, outrages upon women and defenceless citizens should take place in broad daylight in a city like Bombay, and no action should be taken by the authorities in spite of appeals and protests in the press.......... We have a story, given by a reliable correspondent in Thursday's Chronicle, of a Pathan who was found dragging away a poor Marathi girl to his lodgings, because she happened to kick a stone near the ruffian's foot. It is alleged that it took not one but four police havildars to persuade this inhuman wretch to let go his victim. We cannot conceive how after such revelations the Government of His Excellency Lord Willingdon can sit quiet and do nothing. We appeal to Government to take instant measures to rid this city and Presidency of a pest which will soon become a terror to all law-abiding and peaceful citizens.......... The Pathan is a moral coward, for the bully is always a coward. A few sharp strokes, instant prosecutions, and deterrent sentences will bring him to his senses. But we are afraid the authorities have been so lax in dealing with this pest that nothing short of a law enabling the police to deport every Pathan money-lender and brothel-house keeper will have the desired effect. Unless Bombay is to become a city of horrors, immediate and urgent action ought to be taken to prevent the recurrence of any more outrages.......... Any member of this fraternity found talking to poor women in the streets should be instantly apprehended and brought to book. Unless the Pathans are made to feel in an unmistakable way that they cannot feed and fatten in our midst, they will continue to remain a pest and a nuisance."

Gujaráti (12), 6th May.

14. Referring to a recent incident in which a Pathan is alleged to have been seen dragging a young Maratha girl in the direction of his dwelling in the vicinity of Sir J. J. Hospital and with regard to which it is also alleged that it was only after four Police Constables had arrived on the scene that they were able to persuade the Pathan to liberate her, the Gujaráti remarks:—If these facts be true they do not redound to the credit of some members of the police force, and it is the duty of the head of the Bombay Police to inquire into the matter and to dismiss such cowardly Constables and thereby save the pay which they are needlessly drawing. Why should those who are not able to defend the person and property of others on public thoroughfares be retained in the police force? Another phase of the incident also requires being pondered over. It is stated that a crowd of people had collected on the spot. Was there not a single manly person among the whole crowd who could defend the girl and bring the Pathan to his senses? Is it not the duty of the State to give the people such training as would enable them boldly to come to the rescue of the weak on occasions like the one mentioned above? If the State comes forward to fight for the protection of weak nations, is it not necessary to create similar feelings among the subjects residing within the State itself? Is it not also necessary to repatriate these Pathans who behave in such a lawless manner?

Complaint about the inconvenience caused to pardahnashin Muhammadan ladies by the regulation requiring photographs to be attached to applications for passports.

Muslim Herald (118), 11th May.

15. The Muslim Herald draws the attention of Government to the rules governing the issue of passports which require the production of photos of pardahnashin Moslem ladies. It states that the necessity of getting their women-folk photographed before they proceed on a voyage has compelled many Musalmans to postpone the trip, for, according to Muhammadan ideas, it is considered a sort of disgrace to allow female relatives to be photographed. The paper admits that reasons of state demand that some such rule should be put into force; at the same time it assures Government that all apprehensions of danger or trouble arising from such a quarter as this are unfounded. It suggests the substitution of fingerprints in place of the photographs, and relates how Mr. S. M. Edwardes, late Commissioner of Police, Bombay, had made up his mind to move Government in the matter, but that he was prevented from doing it owing to illness and other causes. It concludes by hoping that Government will pay attention to this matter and remove the difficulty of the Muhammadans.

Complaint that certain remarks in a Gujarati book entitled "Biography of Sadguru Shri Gopaldas Maharaj" are calculated to excite the feelings of Muhammadans.

Political Bhomiyo (65), 11th May.

16. The Political Bhomiyo publishes a letter from a Moslem correspondent wherein the writer refers to a Gujarati book entitled "Biography of Sadguru Shri Gopaldas Maháráj", written by a Yati (Jain priest) of Cambay named Mukundáshramji, in which the author is stated to have represented that the Muhammadan emperors, after the establishment of their rule in India, held a sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, and asked the Hindus to choose between Islam and death, that the Hindus were so devoted to their religion that they chose death, but that only low class and thick witted Hindus who had no valour in them and who were ignorant of their religion espoused the Moslem faith. The correspondent remarks that the author does not understand that by such malicious and partisan writings he is exciting the minds of 40 crores of Muhammadans against himself. He asks the Yati how it is that he and the Hindu temples in Cambay, a Moslem state, are safe even up to day if it was the case that Muhammadan kings ruled India with the sword. He further remarks that there was no necessity for the Moslem kings to use the sword when their Hindu subjects had surrendered themselves to them and were living under their protection. The correspondent believes that the author has made such a mess in his book either as a result of want of college education or knowledge of history on his part or on account of his having been actuated by interested motives.

Are the so-called representatives of India on the Imperial War Conference her real representatives?
Indu Prakásh (35), 10th May, Eng. cols.

17. "The question naturally occurs what our so-called representatives—whatever might have been their private sentiments—did for India, now that they were called forth to do it? The Maharaja of Bikánir was a Maharaja and that means a lot. He could not speak boldly. Moreover he had neither business nor right to speak for the Indian people. It was only left for him to sing the burthen of loyalty and goodwill and this he did profusely. What should we write about Sir James Meston?......... Poor man: what could he say about India? Was he to tell the English people that the Indians were now tired of the ill-starred bureaucracy? How could he? Was he not the representative of that very system? So the only member who ought to have done his best in giving expression to the opinions and sentiments of India was Sir S. P. Sinha. India is loyal. No Chirols or Curtises could deny that. Her sacrifices will plead her loyalty before the English people. The thing which they ought to have known was the political psychology of India of the present day and this Sir S. P. Sinha never told them. With one exception, he too followed the lead of the Maharaja. He had a unique opportunity.......... His speeches were eagerly heard and lustily cheered. General Smuts who had no better name for Indians in South Africa than coolies did not think it humiliationg to sit with him in the Conference. The angle of vision was changed, but the late president of Indian National Congress kept silent."

Adverse comments on a speech of His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir in England.
Message (5), 8th May.

18. "We have never felt confidence in the competence of His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir to voice Indian aspirations, feelings and sentiments in respect of the war and the post-war readjustments. If anyone had ever recognized him as the representative of the people of India he could not have made a greater blunder. The pronouncement of His Highness the Maharaja at the Guildhall is not therefore disappointing to us. The pity of it is that the Maharaja, whom we have in the past regarded as an enlightened ruler above the petty-fogging limitations of his class, has not been able to discard the traditions of environment.......... The comments of the British Press, which in Reuter's opinion consist of the Times and The Daily Telegraph, are even more illuminating than the speeches themselves at the historic scene at Guildhall. The Times has gone into hysterics over 'the loyalty, generosity and insight' of the Maharaja of Bikanir's speech, because he is not a political agitator and he is so overcome with considerateness for the permanent officials of the India Office as to publicly compliment them by repeating their views. As the Times goes on developing its theme, one comes to see where the key to this enthusiastic outburst over the Maharaja's speech lies. It urges that an authoritative declaration on the subject of India's future should be made now and not as a reply to agitation after the War. We have a presentiment that this is an inspired statement, reflecting the opinion of the India Office and we may look forward to such a declaration before long. This declaration is not likely to be any more statesmanlike than many of those in the past, unless it can be taken for granted that British statesmen will disdain to stoop to the level of the Times and its guides like Lords Curzon, Milner and Sydenham."

Subodh Patrika (38), 6th May, Eng. cols.

19. "Of the Indian delegates to the Imperial War Conference His Highness of Bikánir is the most distinguished by reason of his position. He has been also the most articulate at public functions—at any rate Reuter makes him so. On more than one of those occasions His Highness made Indian affairs in general the subject of his remarks; and if he had confined himself to the sphere of Native States everyone would have to recognize that it was a subject in which he was directly interested and on which he had some authority to speak. But when His Highness roams into the domain of Indian politics in general and travels out of his own peculiar province he cannot blame people if they remind him that he is going astray into unaccustomed regions which may have pitfalls for him. The speech made by His Highness at the lunch given by the Empire Parliamentary Association is a case in point.... ... His Highness remarked: 'No reasonable person would contend that India was at present ripe for full self-government but many thought there was room for further political reforms'. As we all knew this is the creed of those among the official class who call themselves progressive in these epoch-making times of Irish Home Rule and Russian manhood suffrage......... Responsible Indian publicists, like the late Mr. Gokhale and others, who formulated the demand for self-government have known perfectly well where and to what extent the administrative shoe was pinching, and what they were asking for; but the Maharaja has clearly had no experience whatsoever of it, and was talking of what he did not know. Apparently the temptation of touching a subject of such general interest as 'Indian Reforms' in a distinguished assemblage was too much for him."

Comments on Sir James Meston's speech on the occasion of receiving the Freedom of the City of London.
Gujarâti (12), 13th May, Eng. cols.

20. Commenting upon Sir James Meston's speech on the occasion of receiving the Freedom of the City of London, the Gujarâti writes:—"Sir James Meston spoke in the vein of the overcautious, timid and suspicious bureaucrat who is anxious to discover difficulties in the path of progress rather than to create facilities and opportunities for taking a forward step in advance in a spirit of trust, courage and generosity.......... The theory of the slow process of regeneration has been carried to disastrous lengths in this country so as to stop further progress in some directions or prevent even the initiation of progressive measures in others. All kinds of pleas have been urged, the validity of which the foremost leaders of the people of India have never recognised. The report of the Public Services Commission presided over by Lord Islington is the latest instance in point and no amount of special pleading on the part of the interested advocates of vested interests will convince the Indian public of the wisdom and sincerity of those who are responsible for the production of that extraordinary and reactionary document. Sir James Meston assigned to the Indian Civil Services and their sister services the rôle of interpreters between the Government and the people of India. We do not think this duty has been successfully discharged by the Services. Sir James Meston pointed out that the Services had to do their duty in an inhospitable climate, and often in solitude and anxiety. But those were self-imposed hardships for which the Indian taxpayer has been remunerating the Services on a princely scale......... We wish the Services looked upon the 'trust and affection of the people their highest reward' and endeavoured to win it in a whole-hearted spirit. It is, however, an undeniable fact that the people do not come across many such instances, though no doubt the Services do what they regard as their duty to do with ability and due sense of honour........ Narrowness, timidity and distrust and not breadth of view, depth of insight and boldness of conception have been the traits of bureaucrats everywhere and English bureaucrats in India have not been an exception to this rule, no matter how able and conscientious they have been in the discharge of their official duties and responsibilities."

Comments on Sir James Meston's speech at the Empire Press Association's banquet.
Gujarâti (12), 6th May.

21. At the banquet given to the representatives of the War Conference by the Empire Press Association, Sir James Meston is reported to have said to the effect that India did not render the help she was expected to do because she was not told what she would do and that India was eagerly waiting to place all her resources at the disposal of the Empire and that she merely wanted a lead in the matter. It is surprising that Sir James has not gone to the root of the question. Why did not England ask India to join and why did not the officials awaken the people? Did England keep our officials in the dark? Sir James should have publicly announced the fact in England that help was not asked in a confiding spirit from India because certain officials have created the wrong impression in England that the people of India were desirous of becoming independent. India has unhesitatingly and enthusiastically offered her help, but England availed herself of it in an hesitating and cautious manner. Even now the members of the C. I. D. are shadowing editors of newspapers and popular leaders under the impression that Indians are traitors, and are creating fear in the minds of the authorities that it would be difficult to manage Indians if they are given military training, India will not be able to render all the help she can and England will not be able to fully avail herself of India's help as long as the higher officials continue to be guided by the Criminal Investigation Department and other advisers who are equally distrustful of Indians.

India and the deliberations of the Imperial War Conference.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 7th May; Sánj Vartamán (28), 5th May; Hindusthán (16), 7th May.

22. Commenting upon the deliberations and conclusions arrived at by the Imperial War Conference, the Bombay Samachár writes:—The recommendations made by the Conference with respect to the relations of the various constituent portions of the Empire are of special interest to India. We know that India has not been treated on a footing of complete equality because she has not yet reached a stage when it can be so treated. We cannot, however, fail to express our gratification at the recommendation about allowing India to have a voice in international politics. The establishment of a 'Bureau' for the development of the resources of the Empire will go a great way in ensuring the solidarity and safety of the Empire. The recommendation about reciprocity of treatment within the Empire will, we hope, tend to solve the knotty question of Indian emigration to the Colonies and will confer upon Indians the right of settling in any part of the Empire. [The Sánj Vartamán also expresses gratification at the prospect of India being given representation at future Imperial Conferences as recommended by the War Conference and at the prospect of the early solution of the question of the disabilities of Indians in the Colonies. The Hindusthán is afraid that the system of preferential tariff recommended by the Conference will prove inimical to the interests of India.]

Sandesh (100), 6th May.

23. The Sandesh writes:—The Imperial Government seems to have realised that it is no longer possible to completely disregard Indian public opinion and that it is necessary to enlist the co-operation of some at least of the popular leaders. After dividing thus the popular party against itself Government are able to deal with those who persist in their opposition. They have hit upon the convenient plan of laying hold of a few big persons who are on their side and appointing them as their representatives. There would have been no distrust about the Maharaja of Bikanir or Sir S. P. Sinha if they had been chosen by the Chiefs and people of India. We do not suspect the good faith of the Honourable Mr. Sastri when he tells us that the scheme outlined by the Indian National Congress does not constitute a demand for self-government, but is only a step in that direction. On the contrary there is universal disapprobation when His Highness the Maharajah of Bikanir declares that Indian leaders are not yet prepared to demand self-government and that without granting it in the immediate future Government can effect many reforms in the existing administration. We do not of course blame His Highness for this. The system of nominating representatives is to blame. We note with satisfaction that the Conference has not hurriedly disposed of the intricate question of Imperial reconstruction, thus giving us time to clearly formulate our demands. It now rests with Indian leaders to take full advantage of their opportunity. The proposed deputation to England will prove of very great use in acquainting the British public with the Indian point of view. The question of inter-imperial trade after the war does not appear to have been solved satisfactorily. Reciprocity is all very well if it does not injuriously affect Indian interests. Mr. Chamberlain avows his intention of making India a prosperous country. There will be keen discontent among the people if he acts contrary to his protestations, although there will be nothing strange in it if he does. We hold that it is the duty of His Highness the Maharaja of Bikánir and Sir S. P. Sinha to issue, as Indian representatives, an authoritative statement containing a full report of the proceedings of the Conference. This will leave no room for any possible misunderstanding about their attitude towards our aspirations.

Appreciation of His Majesty the King's reference to India's services in the reply to the address of loyalty presented by the Members of the Imperial War Conference.

Bombay Samâchâr (53), 8th May; Jâm-e-Jamshed (19), 7th May.

24. The Bombay Samâchâr expresses its gratitude to the King-Emperor for the reference made by His Majesty, in the reply to the address of loyalty presented by the members of the Imperial War Conference, to the services rendered by India and hopes that it will stimulate Indians to add to their contributions towards the War Loan and to help the Empire in various other ways and thus to deserve the praise bestowed upon them. The paper looks forward with joyful expectation to the visits of the children of the Royal family to India and suggests that members of the Royal family should be appointed as Viceroys and Governors with a view to strengthening the bonds between England and India, and ensuring cordial relations between India and the Colonies. [The Jâm-e-Jamshed also expresses its gratitude for the reference made to India by the King-Emperor and hopes that His Majesty's words will have the effect of making the Colonies sympathetic towards Indians and of inducing them to give them fair treatment.]

The applications made to the Exemption Tribunals show that the Anglo-Indians want to shirk their responsibilities in connection with military service.

Islâmic Mail (3), 6th May.

25. "We have carefully noted the ratio of exemption applications to the numbers eligible for service and we are staggered to find that not even half of our Anglo-Indian friends are willing to fight for their country. It is a curious phenomenon that whilst Indians fret at not being put under conscription, Anglo-Indians who are treated as the favoured sons of lords are doing their utmost to evade conscription.......... In the matter of monetary contribution too, the Anglo-Indian Community has not made any great display. Whether you take up the war funds or war loan the men of the ruling class have done comparatively very little. They have lorded the shows here and there or secured prominence as office bearers but they have made very little contribution in substance. If this is so how can they claim superiority over us."

Alleged scandalous proceedings of the Exemption Tribunals under the Defence Force Act.

Message (5), 11th May.

26. "Day by day, the Defence Force Exemption Tribunals are assuming more of the character of a scandal rather than an earnest endeavour to separate the 'indispensable s', from the general lot. Just the other day, the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces got exemption for eighty officials under him. Similarly, wholesale exemptions have been granted to a number of persons in Burma and elsewhere. Are all these 'indispensable' for the work they are doing? Cannot their places be managed by Indians just a step below them in their offices? Is the gulf between the coloured and the 'colourless' so unbridgeable? Then, again, is there no one rule for the so many tribunals in dealing with similar questions? To-day we see a tribunal refusing exemption to some teachers saying that the teaching profession is not of 'national importance', the next day we see another tribunal granting exemption to a number of teachers. To-day we see a tribunal styling commerce as a whole to be of national importance; the next day we see another tribunal doing just the contrary. We, in the name of commonsense, may ask what all this means. Is it to squander away India's precious wealth that these 'tribunals' have been brought into existence? Are we to suppose that these tribunals are nothing more than a counterfeit of the so many 'Commissions' that have come and gone in this land?"

Europeans who are British subjects by nationalisation or birth in India should not be allowed to escape the provisions of the Indian Defence Force Act.

Sind Observer (9), 1st May.

27. "It has been brought to our notice that certain Europeans who are British subjects by naturalisation or by birth in this country have not been included in the Defence Force because they do not claim to be European British subjects. Surely such persons do not desire to evade military service simply because of a technicality of the law. They enjoy all the rights and privileges of British subjects, and should shoulder some of the irksome duties attaching to British citizenship and lighten the burden of others who are roped in under the Defence regulations. The Exemption Tribunal might look into the matter."

Complaint about official pressure in connection with the War Loan.

Praja Bandhu (24), 6th May, Eng. cols.; Islámic Mail (3), 6th May.

28. Referring to the complaint published in the Bombay Chronicle about official pressure in connection with the War Loan, the Praja Bandhu writes:—"The allegations are serious enough in all conscience, and as such they indicate an urgent necessity for a thorough and impartial inquiry at the hands of responsible authorities. The incident also incidentally reveals the risk of entrusting the work of such a delicate nature to subordinates who often possess more zeal than discretion, and who labour under the delusion that their competence or otherwise will be judged according to the extent to which they get the War Loan subscribed by people under their jurisdiction. As has been more than once declared by high officials, Government desire that no pressure should be used in connection with the War Loan subscriptions. In the light of this fact, if any subordinate does so he evidently acts in direct opposition to it, and thus discredits the fair name of Government. The most effective way of preventing this is that the work should be left entirely to a non-official agency especially in the mofussil where people are generally too timid to raise their voice even against petty officials, such as Talatis and the like." [The Islámic Mail, on the other hand, writes:—"A zealous officer in a talukdari estate exceeds the bounds of moderation and makes the people contribute a little sum to the war loan. The fact they could pay is borne out by the stern logic of facts—they have paid. Paid What? not a Chanda, not a bribe, not a Nazrana but invested their money in a very profitable business. After a certain time they will get their money back with a handsome profit. The overzealous officer—we must confess we admire him for his excessive zeal in the cause of the country—is not a Government official or his condemnation by our valiant contemporary would be justifiable. He is a Talukdari officer, and according to the ethics of our Congress friends none but a Government officer deserves condemnation. We only wish our friend had known something of the old days when people were tortured to death by warring chiefs to get money for the compaigns. At least if he had heard of the ways in which Chauth was collected by our Mahratta sepoys in the days of the Peshwas he would not have been so hard upon an overzealous Talukdari officer. We wish Mr. Horniman were living in Germany, and then he would have known what official exactions mean. Our one duty is to win the war, and if people would not contribute to the war loan they may have to pay extra taxes."]

Kesari (92), 8th May.

29. The Kesari advises one and all to subscribe to the war loan and says:—The wish for the continuance of the British in India for some days more and the confidence that they will remain in India can be shown by subscribing to the war-loan, and we can also serve our self-interest thereby. We cannot but suggest to the Government officials that they should check the temptation to which they have fallen victims in some few places to tyrannise over the poor rayats about the war loan. We have already referred to such complaints from a few places. Since then we have received complaints from Walwa Taluka (district Sátára) and Chándor Taluka (district Násik). Though His Excellency may like that people should subscribe to the war loan we think that he certainly does not like that people should think that they are forced to the loan. We humbly request him to give a proper warning to the lower officials in this connection.

How the War Loan can be made popular in the districts.

Chandrodaya (30), 7th May.

30. Collections have been begun for the War Loan in the villages and we are given to understand that many villagers have confounded the War Loan with the war fund. Those who raise the War Loan should kindly explain to the people that their money would be returned with interest. We suggest that the names of those who have subscribed to the War Loan together with the amounts paid should be posted in the chavadi every week or at least once a month.

A Committee representative of Indian tanning interests should associate with the Hide Examiner.

Kaiser-i-Hind (20), 6th May.

31. The Kaiser-i-Hind refers to certain complaints made by the tanning merchants of Dharawi (near Bombay) against the alleged highhandedness of the Hide Examiner who is said to make an arbitrary use of certain powers vested in him under the new rules issued under the Defence of India Act, and asks Government to appoint a Committee representing Indian tanning interests to co-operate with the Hide Examiner with a view to remove the complaint of the tanning merchants and to facilitate the work of Government.

Alleged rumours in Bombay about the sinking of steamers by the enemy.

Hindusthán (16), 7th May; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 6th May.

32. The Hindusthán declares that for some time past there have been rumours afloat in the city about particular steamers having been sunk. It believes that they are rumours pure and simple and that they must be creations of mischief-mongers. In its opinion it is not wise to give credence to them, and it asks the public not to attach any importance to these unfounded stories. The paper, however, wishes that Government would enlighten the public in this connection and remove all doubts. It maintains that a more extensive circulation of such rumours and a prolonged hold of the doubts created by them over the minds of the people are likely to cause great harm to commerce. It, therefore, hopes that its above suggestion will receive attention from Government. [The Prajá Mitra and Parsi refers to the rumour about two steamers with a cargo of piece-goods for Bombay and Karáchi having been sunk by the enemy. The rumour, however, the paper remarks, does not seem to have affected the present dullness of the market in respect of piece-goods.]

The C. I. D. and the political activities of the people.

Kesari (92), 8th May.

33. Elsewhere we publish a brief account of the celebration of the first anniversary day of the Home Rule League at different places in the Karnatak and Maharashtra. In reply to an interpellation in the Bombay Legislative Council Government have declared that the police make an inquiry about the members of Home Rule Leagues under Government orders. As Government have confessed that they take such a keen interest (!) in the work of the Home Rule League it becomes one of the duties of the people also to help them in this work. We have given also the names of prominent persons who took part in the celebrations with the view that public information about prominent workers of the Home Rule League in different places would facilitate the work of Government and that it would also save the trouble of the police to that extent. If the police are after us simply because we are engaged in some public service, they are quite welcome. It has become now necessary for the people to understand and for Government to realise that such an experience will, if at all, lessen gradually the people's fear of the police and that public work will not be stopped thereby. It is now necessary for us to hold up to ridicule the superfluous official activity in setting the police after the servants of the public. The best and most beneficial way to do so is to produce so many servants of the public and so many public occasions that Government may find it difficult to supply sufficient police to shadow them. The fear of being included in the black list will continue only so long as the list is a small one. When thousands will enter into the service of the public how long will even Government continue to fill in the list?

Chandrodaya (30), 7th May.

34. So long people used to be afraid of working for the Congress and Conferences. Many used to keep themselves aloof from the movement with the idea that Government would deem them to be seditious and that their names would be included in the black list. Now even Sirdars, pensioners, Rao Sahebs and Rao Bahadurs are not afraid of being Chairmen of the Reception Committees of such institutions or of speaking there as delegates. The black list maintained by Government is no longer such a terror. People do not attach much importance now if the C. I. D. take down notes of their speeches. What can we do if we receive the title of Seditionist for describing what aches us in the stomach? What reason is there for Government to be discontented if we attain political progress by constitutional means?

Comments on alleged C. I. D. activities against the Home Rule movement at Delhi.
Deshi Mitra (57), 10th May.

35. The Deshi Mitra gives a substance of certain letters appearing in the Bombay Chronicle about the alleged harassment by the C. I. D. of the Lady Superintendent of a girls' school at Delhi and some people who frequent the Home Rule Library in that city, and adds:—The European lady has thus been subjected to many annoyances. The managers of the school deserved to be congratulated on their adherence to the Home Rule movement in spite of the bad treatment given to them. Can it be said that the members of the C. I. D. and the executive officials of Delhi are following the path of justice? If the Home Rule movement is unlawful why is it not publicly banned and put a stop to? People will continue to participate in the movement as long as it is not openly prohibited. It is really not proper to harass the people. We hope Government will ask their officials not to harass people who take part in such a legitimate political movement.

Comments on Mr. B. C. Pal's letter to the press complaning about the way he was shadowed by the C. I. D. during his journey from Shikarpur to Calcutta.
Kesari (92), 8th May; Prakásh (99), 9th May.

36. Though one who works for the public need not be afraid of the police, there must be some limit to the insolence of the C. I. D. while they are on duty. We have to complain when they exceed their limit. Political agitators are not fugitives and they do not travel secretly. They travel openly and often in the second class. [Here the paper gives a summary of Babu Bepin Chandra Pal's recent letter to the press about the doings of the C. I. D. while he was travelling from Shikarpur to Calcutta, and continues:—] The police did not fail to dishonour publicly Babu Bepin Chandra Pal in as many ways as were possible without actually arresting him. All this is sheer tyranny. They do not similarly treat even real suspects; they behave towards them in such a way as not to give a clue to them or to other persons. Why should not the political suspects also have the benefit of such skilful behaviour? Why should they alone be so insulted? Will such conduct create in the minds of the people content or discontent? [The Prakásh writes:—When we think that this force which fattens on our money harasses our selfless and revered public leaders, we cannot but feel indignant; and when we see a large number of these C. I. D. men employed in shadowing our noble leaders we feel how beneficial it would be if this force were abolished and if the money spent on it were spent on education. But we feel dejected when we remember that in our present dependent state we have no control over the purse.]

Comments on the Honourable Mr. Srinivas Sastri's speech at the Bombay Provincial Conference at Násik.
Mahrátta (4), 13th May.

*37. The Mahrátta thus concludes its article on the Honourable Mr. Shinivas Shastri's speech at the Bombay Provincial Conference at Násik:—"Whatever our programme on paper, success in the self-government campaign depends upon the 'military' qualities which the army of the Indians engaged in this campaign will exhibit. Our active numbers, compared with the population of the country, must necessarily be small. Greater, hence, is the necessity for people of the self-government creed, whatever their differences of opinion in minor matters, acting in close co-operation. And as such co-operation is facilitated by 'regular military training', Mr. Shastri urged upon the young men of India to eagerly embrace the first opportunity, however small and restricted, of getting that training. Opposed as we are to an organised force of bureaucrats on the spot, 'loyally' helped by their caste-brothers in England, our task is no easy task. And let it never be forgotten that the task is to convice the Imperial Government and the British Nation that if our demands are not granted there will be more harm than if they are granted."

Need of extending the period of revenue settlements especially in Sind.

Sind Journal (8), 3rd May.

38. The Sind Journal thus concludes a long article on the subject of the period of revenue settlements and the debate in the Punjáb Legislative Council on the resolution moved by the Honourable R. B. Bakshi Sohan Lal for a 30 years' settlement for the province:—"The whole debate has shown the necessity of changing the constitution of the Legislative Councils in India so that the will of the people may prevail. In Sind also we have to labour under the grave disadvantage of short-term settlements, and if the wishes of the people were to be consulted the period of settlement should be 60 years as was strongly urged by the Sind Provincial Conference held recently at Shikárpur."

LEGISLATION.

Comments in the Bombay Medical Registration Act Amendment Bill drafted by the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel.

Bombay Samáchár (53), 10th May; Jám-e-Jamshed (19), 10th May.

39. The Bombay Samáchar expresses the hope that the Bombay Medical Registration Act Amendment Bill proposed to be brought in the local Legislative Council by the Honourable Mr. Patel will be favourably received by Government. It endorses the suggestion embodied in the Bill in favour of allowing hospital assistants and sub-assistant surgeons to be elected as members of the Bombay Medical Council and regards their present disability in this respect as anomalous. It believes that the extension of this privilege to the above-mentioned officers will not fail to enhance their prestige in the eyes of the public. The paper also approves of the provision in the Bill for fixing the meaning of the term "unprofessional conduct" used in the Medical Registration Act and believes the application of the term to the conduct of those who take interest in the development of the Ayurvédic and Unani systems of medicine to be very far fetched and improper. It also opines that the adoption of Mr. Patel's suggestion to give the medical graduates of the Bombay University the right of electing two more representatives to the Bombay Medical Council than at present and to reduce the number of members nominated by Government to four will tend to preserve the independence of the Council as well as that of the medical profession. [The Jam-e-Jamshed also writes in appreciation of the last mentioned suggestion and believes that its adoption will make a public body like the Bombay Medical Council win the confidence of the public and will also render it more popular with the medical profession. It remarks that the fanciful interpretations put upon the term "unprofessional conduct", as was done in Bombay in the case of Dr. Popat Prabhuram and in Madras in the case of Dr. Krishnaswami Iyer, should no longer be possible under the amended Act.]

RAILWAYS.

Grievances of third class railway passengers will not be redressed so long as there is no Home Rule.

Message (5), 9th May.

40. Mr. V. G. Javadekar writes to the Message:—"Railway Grievances form one of the proposed subjects which the Provincial Conference that meets at Násik is going to consider. The following is a copy of the letter I have addressed to the General Traffic Manager of the East India Railway and which I hope you will be good enough to publish for the general information of the public. [Here follows the letter in which grievances of third class passengers are given in detail. The writer concludes:—] Although this letter was written nearly a month ago, I have yet had not even an acknowledgment of it. God knows what may have become of it and how it may have been disposed of! This is all because we go without 'Home Rule' and are not masters of ourselves."

Grievances of pilgrims travelling by rail.

Kalpataru and A'nand-vrit (90), 6th May.

41. The Government of India appointed a committee for each province to inquire into the grievances of pilgrims travelling by rail. Most of the committees have reported that the pilgrims owe their miseries to the mismanagement and indifference of the Railway Companies. There is widespread discontent on account of overcrowding in carriages and the use of goods waggons for the conveyance of passengers. Most of the vehicles, especially the goods waggons, are not provided with latrines. Similarly water is not made available at all the Railway stations. The committees express the opinion that all these grievances can be easily remedied if the Railway Companies will take a little more trouble. It is evident from the indifference hitherto shown by the Railway Companies that they will not look to the convenience of passengers. We request Government, therefore, to compel the Companies to adopt the suggestions made by the aforesaid committees.

MUNICIPALITIES.

Government should not give any weight to the opinion expressed by the Surat District Local Board in favour of continuing the existing system of official presidents.

Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 7th May.

42. In view of the cry that is being raised at present in all parts of the country for an increased measure of local self-government, the Praja Mitra and Pársi regards the decision recently arrived at by the District Local Board of Surat in favour of continuing the system of official Presidents as both regrettable and surprising. It however, attributes this decision to the presence of the Collector who presided at the meeting of the Board that was held to consider the question. The paper believes that the Collector would have done well to absent himself from the meeting when the very character of an appointment in which he was concerned was to be discussed. It also remarks that Collectors of Districts wield very great power within their territories and people do not dare express in their presence any views that may be in conflict with theirs. The paper, accordingly, believes that the action of the Collector in reminding the meeting about the nature of the duties of the President of a District Board was tantamount to influencing indirectly the opinion of the meeting. It hopes that His Excellency Lord Willingdon will not allow himself to be influenced by the opinion expressed by the meeting but will be guided by the liberal principles laid down by statesmen like Lords Morley and Hardinge in the matter of local self-government.

Protest against alleged proposal to levy a house-tax at Lárkána (Sind).

Sind Patrika (44) 28th Apl., Eng. cols.; Lárkána Gazette (42) 28th Apl., Eng. cols.

43. "A very disquieting rumour is afloat since the last few days that something like house-tax is being proposed by some of our Muhammadan brethren in their burning desire for special representation in the Lárkána Municipality. The object seems to be to increase the number of Muhammadan voters but we fail to see how that could be achieved by these means, Hindu house-owners being many more than Muhammadans. To do away with halalkhore cess and to put an offensive and oppresive tax in howsoever a mild form is, in our opinion, a most suicidal step that could be taken in utter disregard of the interests of the people in general, Hindus as well as Muhammadans, many of whom are hardly able to pay the petty halalkhore cess even. We have been discussing the matter with some of our Muhammadan friends and gentlemen during the past few days and we are glad to see that they also agree with us and regard the above proposal as a calamity upon the town.......... We, therefore, hope and trust that the sensible section of Muhammadans will realize the situation and oppose with all their might the said proposal which is frought with serious consequences." [The Lárkána Gazette also writes in a similar strain.]

Condemnation of the administration of the Hyderabad (Sind) Municipal Committee of Management.

Sind Jorunal (8), 3rd May.

44. In the course of an article in which it criticises the administration of the Hyderabad (Sind) Municipal Committee of Management, the Sind Journal remarks:—"The Committee of Management feels no responsibility to the public and is hopelessly out of touch with public sentiment. The most drastic rules framed by it for the control of milk-supply which evoked a strong protest are a glaring instance of that. The way in which proposals for the enhancement of octroi and [illegible] taxation were made in the early part of the Commitiee's regime clearly showed that the Committee wanted to increase its revenue anyhow. The same idea underlies the rules framed by the Committee for levying private water service fees and the general water rate which have caused a widespread dissatisfaction. The Committee while anxious to enhance its revenue by any means, has decided to discontinue a few vernacular schools to effect some economy. The Committee has been increasing its expenditure on establishment without any justification, but is depriving some poor boys of the opportunity to pick up some knowledge of the three R's.......... The whole of India is agitating for free and compulsory primary education, but the Committee of Management, Hyderabad, in its superior wisdom, is thinking of closing down schools.......... The several protests against the actions of the Committee in the Press as well on the platform must have reached the ears of Government; but still the Committee goes on its usual way."

POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

No permanent peace is possible so long as races like the Indians are held in subjection by dominant races.

Mahratta (4), 20th May.

*1. Commenting on General Smuts' address at a meeting of the League of Nations Society in London, the Mahratta writes:—"'There must be no patchwork peace or peace which is simply a compromise of conflicting interests. Every nation must have the choice of its own destiny and not be cut and carved to please the Great Powers.' This observation is of course specially related to the immediate end in view—the peace that is to terminate the present war. But it affirms a principle which is of wide application. Every nation must have the choice of its own destiny: this is a proposition which though easy enough to formulate is not so easy of practice, when 'the passion for gain or conquest' rules the responsible authorities of nations.......... Any nation, he proceeded, not wishing to run straight must be compelled to realise that as a last resource the world will use force to make it run straight. This idea of straight-running is a very good ideal. But who is to define straight-running? If the signification which the words possess in the mind of the unsophisticated reasoner is to be taken as identical with what General Smuts and men of his 'station' mean by the expression, we must come to the conclusion that these generous-hearted men will side wholeheartedly with India—not to speak of other conquered and ill-used peoples of the Earth—in her demand for self-government. England must accept undivided responsibility for the crooked running which has been the order of the day for years past. Compare American policy in the Philippines and the Japanese policy in Japan with English policy in India —policy not as expressed in proclamations and other worthy 'scraps of paper', but as practised in the actual management of Indian affairs. Are there not evident differences which mark out the English policy as the one to be avoided by those who would be champions of straight-running? Here is a reflection occurring in an article headed 'Promise and Performance' in India of the 13th April:—'It is melancholy to reflect that as far as India is concerned, the German and not the British model is the one which has found most favour with the governing bureaucracy.' The difference between the treatments given to Britons and Indians even after a century and more of British rule cannot rouse the most grateful feelings within our bosom. We have been promised a good many times that race or creed or colour would be no bar to Indians rising to the highest offices in the land. Equal treatment with British-born subjects has been promised to us time and again. But there has been a wide divergence between promise and performance. That is not straight-running surely! Will the world use force against England to make it run straight? That is a question for the future.......... Germany's 'Crimes' are easily observed. Her procedure in 'punishing' Belgium and other small nations for their patriotic stand has been whole-heartedly condemned. But crimes at home escape notice. It should not be difficult for wide awake statesmen to realise that there are such things as Peace-cruelties as there are War-cruelties. We Indians, 'enjoying' as we have been 'a peace' long unbroken by foreign aggression, have not been free, however, from the cruelties which are inseparable from alien unsympathetic domination. We may acknowledge that there have been a few kind rulers in the long train of temporary satraps to whose care our affairs have been entrusted by 'British policy'. But the system of rule itself being 'a despotism', a few kind 'despots' could not make any great difference, as regards the steady exploitation of the country in the interests of the foreigners and the keeping down of 'native' aspirations. These are the cruelties of Peace which we have been enduring for a long time now. And it were well for England to realise that the Indian broods over these cruelties, as the Belgian must be brooding over the War-cruelties inflicted on him by Germany.......... Permanent Peace is a great idea, but it is almost permanently impossible in view of the conditions which surround us. Peace Idealists and nations satiated with conquests and possessions will join hands to work for a permanent peace. But on the other side will be Idealists of Rights and Nations chafing under bondage or swayed by ambition.......... What the Peace-Idealists would, therefore, be well-advised to do is to bring home to the dominant nations the necessity of realising the universality of the love of Freedom. Every people, however admiringly it may gaze for a period at the civilised shows stalking their soil, soon learns to hate the foreign yoke. If every nation must have the choice of its own destiny, it follows that every subject people must sooner or later be restored to Freedom, for Freedom is the only destiny which commends itself to a people which has become self-conscious. Internal autonomy is the least that any people can be satisfied with.......... As things stand, the States ruling over alien peoples will agree neither in keeping their proteges permanently helpless, nor in universally quickening their progress. Peace cannot, therefore, long establish itself on this much suffering Earth. Wars must come now and again as a result of the heart-burning of half-developed subject nations making common cause with the ambitions of jealous free ones. That is the prospect as it impresses itself upon our brain. We may be wrong. And we shall be glad if events prove us to be wrong."

The Bureaucracy in India should resign as it does not represent Indian interests.

Mahrátta (4), 20th May.

2. Commenting on the Honourable Nawab Syed Ali Chaudary's resignation of the presidentship of the Bengal Provincial Moslem League, the Mahrátta remarks:—"As the Honourable Nawab has gained the good opinion of those who do not agree with him by resigning the place, which only a true reprasentative of the community has a right to fill, so will the bureaucracy of India gain our good opinion if it works for its own removal on the ground—which is a very valid ground—that it has ceased to 'represent' the best opinion of India. Time was when our 'educated' and our 'masses' felt that for all the defects that must go with a foreign bureaucratic rule, India had a balance of advantages to be grateful for. In those times, our bureaucracy might be said to rule us with our consent and so in a sense to 'represent' us. Now that India's claims upon Britain and India's actual gains and losses due to her connection with Britain have, in the light of advanced knowledge, been re-appraised, and the Indian bureaucracy has been discovered, in the process of re-appraisement, to have done and to be doing us more harm than good and, further, as it has been proved that the bureaucracy can only go from bad to worse as years pass, we can no longer speak of the administration of India as administration by consent, tacit if not expressed. The demand has been clearly formulated that the bureaucracy must be dethroned and the people enthroned. It is supported by the vast majority of those whose opinion ought to count as 'informed opinion.' The masses who are 'inarticulate' are represented as favonring the present despotism and opposed to the demand for popular government. This is a gross misrepresentation, almost criminal. So long as a plebiscite is not taken, the opinions of the educated leaders must be accepted as representing those of the masses who, in every country, even the most enlightened, generally leave the thinking to be done by those who are better situated and equipped than themselves. The masses suffer under the present rule. Their sufferings due to their being kept in dark illiteracy and to other conditions easily remediable by a sympathetic Government need no enumeration. In one word Indian bureaucracy has become 'unfit' for the place it fills and will deserve our grateful thanks if it tenders its resignation. But such a 'generosity' is of course an impossibility. It is not an affair of one Nawab. The bureaucracy is a stronghold of hundreds upon hundreds of Nawabs, who live by their bureaucratic trade, and upon whom depend numerous families for their bread and 'station in life'. Hence it will not be reasonable to expect that our bureaucracy will 'go out' of itself. It will have to be turned out. Our Home Rule or Self-government Campaign is in one aspect an attempt to enlist the sympathy of the Sovereign British electorate with a view to oust our bureaucracy from the position of dominance which it occupies in this country's affairs to the infinite harm of the people of the soil."

Moderates and Extremists are all alike in the eyes of Government.
Kesari (92), 15th May.

3. The Honourable Nawab Ali Chaudhry has submitted a separate memorandum on Indian Reforms and his demands may be considered to be moderate ones. But the point is: are Government willing to accede even to these moderate demands without any complaint? If Government are not willing to listen to the moderates how will the moderates glory in their moderation? Where lies the sense of discriminating between moderates and extremists? Government themselves have destroyed the class of moderates throughout the country by their unreasonable policy of ignoring moderates and extremists alike. In what way can the people be blamed for it? Let Government not listen to the extremists; but are they willing to comply completely with the request of the moderates? No! And, therefore, both alike have lost all faith in the wisdom of Government.

What is "disaffection"?
Young India (10), 16th May.

4. Mr. L. G. Khare writes in Young India:—"Policemen get anxious about the movements of Mr. Pal, they deliver him over from the C. I. D. adminstration of one province to another like a bundle of goods, they exaggerate to him the terrors of the Defence of India Act, because he is said to be 'disaffected.' Now what is disaffection? There lies the difficulty of a definition. One can understand what affection is; one can understand even what Political affection is. When the heroic Danish children in Schleswig-Holstein refused to sing that vulgar banality 'Germany, Germany above all', they showed their political affection for the patriotism of their race; but in British India it is difficult to understand what disaffection means, disaffection when it has reference to British rule in India. I can understand sometimes under incongruous circumstances what affection for British rule means. It is the 'dis' that works the trouble. When the Governor of an Indian province went to open some time ago a Technological Institute, and made a speech not on Technology but on the War Loan, the circle of C. I. E. hunters that surrounded him applauded and, I am sure, were 'affectionate' towards British rule in India. What, then, is 'disaffection' towards British rule?...... If I had met as a child a certain Superintendent of Police, just a few years ago, and not saluted him, he would have certainly have called me 'disaffected.' In fact, as the report of the case runs, he would have visited this exhibition of disaffection with corporal punishment there and then..........Is it 'disaffection' if an Indian youth feels hurt, and expresses his resentment in no uncertain manner, as a result of his reading Mr.—now Captain—Percival Cristopher Wren's novels? Is it disaffection when he thinks that this great teacher of Indian youth has libelled educated India in his 'Dew and Mildew,' where—as the Indian youth would put it—the Dew is presumably the European, and the Mildew—the 'native'? Is it disaffection when an Indian writes to the press asking if anybody would explain the riddle why, if any inebriate planter were to kick a coolie into accidental death that coolie is always supposed to have had an enlarged spleen? One comes to conclude that disaffection in British India cannot be defined. It is like the English weather, a thing liable to sudden and startling changes. The intepretation of what it is, depends sometimes upon the wisdom of some brainless, h—less Englishman, who finds himself in the position of a police-sab."

Comments on Mr. Gandhi's inquiry regarding labour on the indigo plantations in Behar.
Mahrátta (4), 20th May.

*5. "The Honourable Mr. Maude, member of the Executive Council of Behar, has recently had a conference with Mr. Gandhi who is investigating the question of the relations of the planters and the ryots in Behar. This conference is said to have been the result of the deputation of the Planters' Association which waited on Government at Ranchi. It is reported that the deputation urged before the Government that the inquiry which is being carried on now has created a great stir and agitation amongst the ryots and asked that either this inquiry should be stopped or that, in the alternative, Government should appoint a commission, including representatives of planters and ryots, to hold a public inquiry. The Muzafferpore branch of the European Defence Association have also through their parent body in Calcutta submitted a representation to the Government of India on the subject. This is good news. 'A stir' among the ryots is a necessary preliminary to their grievances receiving any adequate attention. For, 'the meek shall perish' is the Commandment of the Gospel of Might. This Gospel rules on the plantations, and not exclusively there. Mr. Gandhi deserves grateful thanks for having engaged upon an inquiry which promises to end in a rectification of gross abuses on the Behar plantations. It is reported that a factory at Olaha in the outworks of a huge indigo concern has been completely burnt down by fire, and that the planters suspect it as a case of incendiarism. For aught we know, it may be a pure accident, or a deliberate act of some aggrieved tenants or perhaps a desperate trick of some ill-wishers who are wroth with Mr. Gandhi for his 'audaciousness' and wish to prejudice the inquiry he is conducting by any means, fair or foul."

Comments on the order passed against Mr. M. K. Gandhi by the District Magistrate, Champaran, Bihar.

Islámic Mail (3), 13th May.

6. "Our friends in the Congress Camp are jubilant over Mr. Gandhi's triumph in what is now known as the Bihar Notice case. It was indeed very wrong of the District Magistrate of Motihari to issue a notice under section 144, Indian Penal Code, which he could not maintain and had to cancel. A man of Mr. Gandhi's position who knows how to twist the lion's tail should not be dealt with in the careless manner that this officer appears to have done and the jubilations in the Congress Camp at his defeat are quite justified. The effect of a foolish act like this is often very dangerous. It impairs the authority of Government and gives a severe blow to their prestige. If what the Bihari reports is true, that not only was the notice withdrawn but Mr. Gandhi was promised every assistance in his enquiries, then the Government of Bihar have committed a great mistake. We have every sympathy with our great patriot Mr. Gandhi and would have been much pained if any untoward incident had happened to him. But the defiance of law and authority and the baneful effect it has upon the impressionable people of India is not conducive to public peace or to good government, and put it whatever way you like, Mr. Gandhi's action amounts to that. Perhaps there is some truth in what our Congress friends say that public influence is more helpful than official favour. We do not bring our conscience to abuse Government and we are called khushamadis and supposed to be in official favour. But if we were to write half as acrimoniously as our friend of the Chronicle does, we would not find life worth living. Yet simply by virtue of his abusive language Mr. Horniman is in the good graces of the public and for all intents and purposes treated as an official favourite."

Comments on the Madras Government's orders for keeping students from political propaganda.

Hindusthán (16), 12th May; Praja Mitra and Pársi (25), 14th May.
